The jurors took two days to organize themselves, but by the third day of deliberations they began working through the counts one by one, according to Douglas Baggett, an administrator for a corporate legal department, who described the mood in the jury room in an interview at his home.

"After not being able to discuss the trial this whole time, the biggest thing we did in deliberations was to talk about how everybody felt," he said. "There were differing opinions."

The jurors said that they found it appalling that Mr. Lay had mismanaged his own finances and was selling his own Enron shares even as he assured employees and shareholders that the company was fiscally sound.

"I thought that was a disgrace," Donald Martin, an electrical designer, said.

A moment later Mr. Delgado echoed that thought. "That was very much the character of the person that he was. He cashed out before the employees did."

For Mr. Lay the decision came as a heavy blow that he went out of his way to prepare himself for. Just before the jury returned to the courtroom, Mr. Lay told his lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, that he would like to sit with his wife in the first bench of the visitors section.

"It's just never been done before," Mr. Ramsey told him.

"Why not?" Mr. Lay responded. "It's just as much her life as it is mine."

To Wendy Vaughan, Mr. Lay "very much wanted to be in control when he spoke."

"He kind of commanded the room, I thought," Ms. Vaughan, who owns a gym and a roofing business, added. "He answered questions. He just seemed very focused, a little bit of a chip on his shoulder."

Some added that they would have still found the men guilty had they not taken the stand, though they would have been disappointed. "I would have always had questions if they had not taken the stand," said Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher.

Judge Lake commended and thanked the jurors for sitting through often obtuse and conflicting testimony. During the trial, they were shown thousands of pages of corporate documents and spreadsheets; they took 27 boxes worth of evidence with them into the jury room where they deliberated.

One juror contrasted their determination with Mr. Lay's and Mr. Skilling's approach to their top positions at Enron.

"Those of us that have full-time jobs, we did our jobs at night when we went home so tired we hardly knew who we were," said Carolyn Kuchera, a payroll manager. "We were responsible, we were always accountable and we always found a way to circle back around to tie up the loose ends."

"And I think those employees," she said about Enron workers, "were entitled to the same thing."

The jurors said they had become like a family and planned to drive in different directions at the end of the news conference and meet at an undisclosed location to celebrate the end of the trial.

Mr. Baggett said he and his wife planned to go out of town on Friday to celebrate their anniversary.

When asked what they had learned, several said they better understood corporations and the legal system.

Mr. Delgado, the principal, said he realized that "if I ever had to be defended, I would go with Mr. Petrocelli," he said, referring to Daniel Petrocelli, the well-regarded Los Angeles-based lawyer who defended Mr. Skilling. "If I had the money."

The jurors said they vacillated during the trial as prosecutors and defense lawyers offered competing explanations of the events going on at the company.

"Through 16 weeks of testimony, I would go home one night swayed in one direction," Mr. Baggett said. "The next day, when cross or direct began, it would go the other direction. And I think we all felt that — you felt like a Ping-Pong ball."

DOJ_NMG_0029884

There did not appear to have been one inflection point when the jury became convinced of the defendants' guilt. Rather, they gradually made up their minds as they went over the voluminous evidence and the testimony by former Enron officials like Ben F. Glisan, a company treasurer who pleaded guilty and has already served the bulk of a five-year sentence. He was granted immunity from further prosecution to testify.

"I don't think I had made up my mind one way or the other until we entered into deliberations, and it all came together," Mr. Delgado said.

The jurors said they had at least some concern about the credibility of virtually every witness who took the stand, but decided that the sum total of the testimony and the evidence was enough to convict Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling.

"We turned to the evidence," said Ms. Smith, a human resources manager. "We put our own timeline in place and we thrashed it out."

Ms. Vaughan, the entrepreneur, said she wanted to believe the defendants but in the end could not square their version of events with the evidence and the testimony of other Enron executives.

"Early during the trial, I had an admiration for both men — just what they had accomplished in their careers," she said. "And it was sad to see that in the end it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner, having to hurt so many people to get there."

Defendants Sunk By Their Testimony (WP)

By Carol Rust

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON, May 25 -- Jurors in the Enron trial made it clear that it would have been better for former executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling if they'd kept their mouths shut and stayed off the witness stand.

Speaking shortly after a federal judge read their verdict, jurors said Lay's indignant outbursts while testifying in his own behalf made him seem "that he very much wanted to be in control -- he commanded the courtroom," said Wendy Vaughan, a Houston business owner.

"He was very focused, but he had a bit of a chip on his shoulder that made me question his character," she said.

As for Skilling, who spent days explaining the tedious financial inner workings of the once high-flying energy company, the jurors couldn't understand how he could know so much about that and not be aware of illegal business maneuvering, whether or not he was responsible for it personally.

"Skilling was supposed to be a hands-on individual," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "It's hard to believe a hands-on individual wouldn't know what was going on."

"When he got on the stand and knew what a [technically complicated] chart was and how it worked, we knew he was involved," Delgado said.

Elementary school teacher Kathy Harrison said she was glad Lay and Skilling took the stand during their trial. Had they not, "I would have always had questions," she said.

Jurors, who appeared from the start of the trial to form a close and cohesive unit, collectively hissed when one brought up Lay's testimony about how he felt his employees' pain, given his repeated multimillion-dollar stock sales in the weeks leading up to Enron's bankruptcy. During that time, Enron's human resources department was switching to a new savings program and employees couldn't sell their stock, which for many was their life savings.

Lay's stock sales "meant a lot," said legal department manager Doug Baggett. "It defined the word 'intent.' " "It went very much to the character of the person he was -- cashing out at the expense of employees," Delgado said.

Juror Carolyn Kuchera, a payroll manager, said most jurors worked nights and on weekends to maintain their personal and professional lives during the four months of testimony and less than six days of deliberations.

"The responsibility of Lay and Skilling -- all I can do is relate that to what we had to do," she said. "We did our jobs on nights, weekends and holidays. We would leave here to go to work. We were accountable -- those [Enron] employees deserved the same thing."

Speaking early Thursday afternoon in a sixth-floor jury assembly room, the jurors -- who dressed in red for Valentine's Day, wore Mardi Gras beads on Fat Tuesday and dressed in Western clothing on Texas Independence Day -- sometimes finished each other's sentences and voiced confidence that they had made the best decision possible after the biggest collective challenge in their lives.

"We answered all the questions, we tore the boxes [of evidence] apart and we looked at all the evidence," said jury forewoman Deborah Smith, who works in human resources. "We won't have to worry about this [decision] later because we did it right the first time."

"We didn't have a target of today. We were prepared to stay as long as it took to reach the verdict," she said. "We thrashed it out."

Beginning deliberations on such a complicated case, which practically required them to learn a new vocabulary of financial and business terms and Enron vernacular, "was like having a 25,000-piece puzzle dumped on the table," said Vaughan, who owns a roofing company and a fitness company and is a mother of two.

"And not all the pieces were there," added another juror.

Smith said they started by building their own timeline based on numerous dates and events they believed were pivotal to determining what happened in the company's final year, the time frame for the events that led to most of the government's charges.

They also reached conclusions on the credibility of the witnesses who took the stand, especially the government's witnesses, many of whom had pleaded guilty previously and whose testimony could affect their possible punishment.

"The people with plea bargains we questioned from different angles," said Don Martin, an electrical designer. "All their answers led to one result."

"Fastow was . . . Fastow," Martin continued, referring to former Enron finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who faces 10 years in prison for stealing millions from the company. "We knew where he was coming from, and we kind of discounted some of what he said, but we weighed all the stuff the government witnesses said, and their answers all came to the same conclusion."

Whenever there was doubt about credibility, jurors dug through the 10 crate-size boxes to find evidence to support or discredit the testimony.

The jury delivered not-guilty verdicts on all but one of Skilling's 10 insider trading charges. In deciding the answer to each charge, forewoman Smith said, "We went by the judge's instruction: 'Not guilty' means 'not proven.' "

Baggett said the government didn't provide enough evidence for insider trading.

At one point Wednesday, jurors sent a note to U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, requesting the trial transcript. Usually, jurors can have part of trial testimony read back to them, although Lake asked them to be more precise in their request. In that note, jurors also asked for additional copies of the list of evidence.

On Tuesday, they requested speakers for the computer they were using. During the trial prosecutors had played tapes of conference calls to investors, which Lay and Skilling held several hours after they released quarterly earnings reports, as well as the tape of an employee meeting during which Lay encouraged his employees to buy more Enron stock, calling it "an incredible bargain." Government prosecutors revealed that Lay sold millions of dollars worth of Enron stock the same day.

"I don't think it's over," Vaughan said of Thursday's outcome. Both defendants plan to appeal. "Now that we have made our decision, it will be interesting to know if justice will be served or whether the almighty dollar will win again."

Several Factors Influence Sentences (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, May 26, 2006

After a Supreme Court ruling last year that gave judges more leeway to sentence criminals, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling could face prison terms of anywhere from 10 years to life, some legal experts say.

Amid the legal confusion, “There is ample discretion in the guidelines to impose what could essentially be a life sentence,” said Barry Boss, an attorney at Cozen O'Connor.

Skilling's counts carry a maximum prison sentence of 185 years; Lay's, a maximum of 45 years, not including his separate convictions in a bank fraud case.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake will base their prison terms on several factors, including total dollar loss to investors, the number of people hurt by the fraud and whether Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, obstructed justice by lying on the witness stand.

If the judge finds that investment losses are more than $100 million, current guidelines recommend 10 to 12 years. If the losses are higher, the years rise, too.

Enron once had a $60 billion stock-market value, and if Lake finds Lay and Skilling responsible for a loss of 1%, that's $600 million, said law professor Peter Henning at Wayne State University.

Lake also will study other sentences before the Sept. 11 hearing, such as the 25-year prison term for former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers, said Douglas Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission adopted tougher guidelines in 2003. But defense attorneys called the longer sentences draconian, including a 24-year prison term for Jamie Olis, a former Dynegy energy trader convicted of fraud, which was tossed out by an appeals court.

Last year, the Supreme Court ruled the guidelines “advisory,” not binding, which makes it “much harder to predict what the courts will do,” Henning said.

Enron's Impact On The Corner Office (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0029886

By Ron Scherer And Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

BRYN MAWR, PA., AND HOUSTON - The quiet, classic bank offices at Bryn Mawr Trust are a far cry from the hustle - and self-dealing - of Enron Corp., the former energy powerhouse of Houston.

But the tale of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, the Enron executives who were found guilty of most charges by a jury Thursday, has prompted change even at the gracious offices of the 117-year-old bank.

"This is the highest profile white-collar trial in the past 20 to 30 years and it has literally been watched by the world," says Thomas Ajamie, a securities-fraud lawyer in Houston. "The broader message to people in corporate America is: 'Don't lie to your investors or you'll go to jail.' "

Just ask the Bryn Mawr Trust's chairman and CEO, Ted Peters, who has been a banker for most of his career. Today, he can reel off the provisions of a reform law Congress passed in the wake of the corporate scandals of the late 1990s. The one that really gets his attention is his personal liability.

"I could get 20 years in jail and a $5 million fine if [I] do something wrong purposely," he says during an interview at the white, limestone bank.

This is just one of the ways life for a CEO has changed since 2001, when the Enron collapse stunned the business world. The jury's quick - and overwhelming - verdict Thursday is likely to hammer home that sense of diligence to corporate America.

The jury found Mr. Lay, Enron's founder, guilty on all six counts of conspiracy and fraud against him. It found Mr. Skilling, the former CEO, guilty on 19 of the 28 counts he faced. Lay was also found guilty of four counts of bank fraud in a case heard the past few days by US District Judge Sim Lake.

Lay faces a maximum of about 165 years in prison and Skilling about 85 years, but they will both realistically get between 10 and 25 years each, says Gerald Treece, assistant dean of the South Texas College of Law in Houston.

Others expect the punishment will be greater. "I believe it will be the stiffest sentence for corporate crime in our history," says Jacob Zamansky, a securities fraud lawyer in New York who attended much of the Enron trial.

Today, CEOs can no longer use the excuse that they can't be responsible for other people robbing the company. They can't reward friends with a seat on the board of directors - today, the board must consist of knowledgeable people who will challenge company procedures when it's necessary. And, CEOs, if they choose to ignore the changes, could well be out of their jobs.

"This is part of a unified effort by state and federal authorities to wage war on white-collar crime," says Christopher Bebel, a former federal prosecutor and economic-crimes expert in Houston.

"This has undoubtedly had a powerful effect on the corporate mind-set. CEOs from Main Street to Wall Street are going to be more hesitant to deceive investors while lining their own pockets," says Mr. Bebel.

Since Enron, forced turnover at the top has doubled.

"The CEO used to be the pinnacle of a career, the reward for a long, hard slog," says Paul Kocourek, a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton in San Francisco. "Now, it boils down to your performance - if it's not there you are probably not either."

One reason boards are starting to exert themselves more are changes in how board members are chosen. In the case of the Bryn Mawr bank, Mr. Peters says his predecessor, who had held the job for 20 years, would pick each board candidate. "He would announce, 'Here's Joe and he's from Villanova' and everyone would applaud, he would sit down and that would be that," says Peters.

"Now, it's an independent group that brings up names, and there is a whole involved process to get people with the right skill sets. A new director then meets me, and I spend a few hours with him or her talking about my vision for the company."

In the post-Enron era, a CEO must go beyond being a good manager, says Michael Kendall, a partner in the law firm of McDermott Will & Emery LLP based in its Boston office. "The concept is crisis management instead of risk spotting," he says. "You have to manage the crisis before it consumes you."

Peters's way of managing a crisis is notifying his board of directors as soon as he identifies a problem. "You tell the board right away," he says. "And if there are documents involved, you don't shred them, you don't delete e-mails, and you don't touch a thing."

The problems at Enron have highlighted to many companies the importance of implementing a code of ethics. Enron actually had a lengthy code of ethics but it was largely ignored.

One thing Peters has learned from the corporate scandals is that ethics comes from the top down. "A CEO has to make clear to people who work for him or her that ethics are non- negotiable," he says.

For example, the bank discovered an employee who used bank stationary to dispute personal claims with the Internal Revenue Service. He was fired, says Peters. "That might seem extreme, but it was against our code of conduct."

However, many executives today rail against what they see as the more onerous parts of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. A group called the Free Enterprise Fund is mounting a constitutional legal challenge to part of the act. It particularly wants to ease the financial burden on small- and medium-size companies.

"Sarbanes-Oxley was designed to prevent" the kind of fraud that brought down Enron and its top managers, says Bebel, the former federal prosecutor.

Peters can certainly relate to the added cost of running a company in the post-Enron era. Today, it costs the company about $300,000 per year to manage its new responsibilities. "Hopefully, we get some good benefits from it," says Peters.

Verdict On An Era: Arrogance And Recklessness At Enron (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Guilty of crimes — and a whole lot more.

Regardless of whether the jury verdict against Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling is upheld, testimony from 56 days of trial has sealed what is sure to be history's judgment — one that is unlikely to be vulnerable to appeal.

The Enron case will forever stand as the ultimate reflection of an era of near madness in finance, a time in the late 1990's when self-certitude and spin became a substitute for financial analysis and coherent business models. Controls broke down and management deteriorated as arrogance overrode careful judgment, allowing senior executives to blithely push aside their critics.

Indeed, it could be argued that the most significant lesson from the trial had nothing to do with whether the defendants, both former Enron chief executives, committed the crimes charged in their indictments. Instead, the testimony and the documents admitted during the case painted a broad and disturbing portrait of a corporate culture poisoned by hubris, leading ultimately to a recklessness that placed the business's survival at risk.

"Enron is one of the great frauds in American business history," said James Post, a professor of management at Boston University. "But it is also a symbol of a particular era of management practice. The excesses of Enron point pretty clearly to what was going on in mainstream companies across the business landscape in the 1990's."

That may go a long way toward explaining how corporate America became infused in the late 1990's by what appeared to be a near endless amount of greed and criminality, leading to scandal at an array of corporate giants, from Enron to WorldCom, from Adelphia to HealthSouth.

It was not simply that the ethics of the corporate world changed overnight; the ever-rising bubble of market prices created a sense of invincibility among corporate executives, who read market delusions as proof of their own genius. Arrogance gave way to recklessness, which in turn opened the door to criminality.

That message was repeated throughout the trial of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. Paula Rieker, an executive with the company's investor relations group, testified to her fear of correcting Mr. Skilling when he made what she considered to be false statements to investors. Vince Kaminski, a top risk analyst, spoke of how Mr. Skilling became increasingly difficult to contradict as Enron won plaudits from the marketplace. And Ben F. Glisan Jr., the treasurer, portrayed an "Emperor's New Clothes" culture, where no one was willing to challenge the rule-bending and recklessness as the company's executives charged into one ill-considered business line after another.

"I would think that most observers of this trial would be shocked and surprised that Enron was such a poorly run company for so long," said Stephen Meagher, a former federal prosecutor who now represents corporate whistle-blowers. "But as long as the checks kept coming in and the stock price kept going up, it was easy to look the other way and ignore the obvious clues that there were deep problems there."

Attention to the mundane details of business — debt maturity schedules, available cash, companywide risk — appeared to be almost second thoughts among the senior ranks of the company, if thought about at all. Instead, the focus was centered on marketing the image, not only of the company, but of its senior executives. It was an approach that met widespread success and was emulated throughout corporate America.

"This was the era of the story, the shtick, the celebrity," said Mr. Post of Boston University. "Lay and Skilling delighted in that, they loved becoming business and civic celebrities. They created the model for that kind of superexecutive C.E.O. in the 1990's. Meanwhile, they left all the details to people who were being driven by a troubled culture."

In the end, although many in the public seem to believe this was a case about the collapse of Enron, that had little to do with the criminal charges. In the closing arguments, the government made sure to separate allegations of criminality from responsibility for Enron's collapse.

The testimony suggested that the bankruptcy was much more about a company gone out of control, with executives pushing to the financial edge on deals that received little attention and supervision once the transactions closed. But as that recklessness rotted the company from the inside, the jury found, Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay falsely portrayed a corporate ship where everything remained steady.

The testimony and evidence suggested that Enron executives could not even agree on what the company's business was. There was no doubt that Enron made the bulk of its profits from trading natural gas contracts. But trading companies rarely win stratospheric stock prices; the risks and requirements for credit in such businesses temper potential market enthusiasm. So some executives argued that Enron was not a trading company, but a logistics business — one involved in every step of the production and delivery of commodities — and therefore deserved its once-lofty stock price.

Putting new labels on the old wine didn't change the financial underpinnings of the business. Most trading companies, because of the knowledge that a sudden market bump can cause available cash to disappear maintain credit ratings of A and above to protect them in the downdrafts. Enron chose instead to maintain a credit rating just notches above junk, apparently in the belief that a bad day would never arrive.

That freed capital and allowed for borrowings that otherwise would not have been available, driving Enron's supposed "growth" strategy into new business lines, which almost all proved to be debacles. Throughout the trial, there was repeated testimony about Enron's disastrous forays into international power plants and water operations, which led to the company's acquiring billions of dollars in assets that lost huge value, becoming a financial albatross.

A result, when Enron finally faced a crisis, was that it was financially unable to weather the storm. Credit lines were largely tapped out, few assets had the equity necessary for additional borrowings and the liquidity needed for the trading business rapidly dried up. Those factors combined to push Enron toward collapse.

The trial underscores that neither defendant fully accepted what happened at the company. Mr. Lay testified that the collapse was largely caused by short sellers, critical articles in The Wall Street Journal, and a resulting panic in the marketplace.

But short selling, negative press and market concerns are issues that scores of companies deal with every year, without collapsing. Indeed, to some degree, Mr. Lay's argument was a bit like blaming a match for igniting a basement filled with gasoline. In this case, the accelerant was the poor condition of Enron's financial structure.

Those lessons about the importance of quality management and strong finances in avoiding scandal, experts said, have not been lost on the audiences that perhaps matter most: the managers of corporate America and the government regulators who keep an eye on them.

"Some people say this is the end of an era, but I don't think it is," said George A. Stamboulidis, a partner with Baker & Hostetler who was appointed a monitor at Merrill Lynch as part of that firm's settlement of an Enron-related case. "This fuels the government and boards and investors to continue to push for more accountability, more transparency and better management."

Those continued efforts, coupled with the changes of the past, should mean that the kind of troubles that emerged at Enron are less likely to appear on the corporate landscape.

"Hopefully," Mr. Stamboulidis said, "the ways businesses are run in 2006 are very different from the ways the businesses were run in the 1990's."

But others expressed fear that as long as huge sums of money can be earned by executives for cutting corners and being dishonest, collapses and scandals like Enron will continue to be part of corporate America.

"One of the things we know from social psychology is that incentives and greed really blind" corporate executives, said Arthur P. Brief, a professor at the A. B. Freeman School of Business at Tulane University. "And those incentives are still with us."

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (AP)

Jury Convicts Former Enron Chiefs Kenneth Lay, Jeffrey Skilling of Conspiracy, Fraud

HOUSTON (AP) -- Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling were convicted of conspiracy and fraud Thursday by a federal jury that laid blame for one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history squarely on Enron Corp.'s two former top executives.

Jurors found that the men, who received tens of millions in pay and stock options, repeatedly lied to cover up accounting tricks and business failures that led to the company's 2001 demise. The collapse wiped out more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

The verdict came in the sixth day of deliberations following a criminal trial that lasted nearly four months. Lay was also convicted of bank fraud and making false statements to banks in a separate, non-jury trial before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake related to Lay's personal finances.

The conspiracy conviction was a major win for the government, serving almost as a bookend to an era that has seen prosecutors win convictions against executives from WorldCom Inc. to Adelphia Communications Corp. and homemaking maven

Martha Stewart. The public outrage over the string of corporate scandals led Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies" said Rep. Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

Lay was convicted on all six counts of conspiracy, securities and wire fraud against him in the corporate trial and all four in the personal banking trial. Former Chief Executive Skilling was convicted on 19 of the 28 counts in the corporate trial, including one count of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine.

Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11. The charges against Lay, who is 64, carry a maximum penalty in prison of 45 years for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial. The charges against Skilling, 52, carry a maximum penalty of 185 years in prison.

As Lake read the verdict from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched Linda Lay's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

After Lake left the courtroom, Lay's family and some friends gathered around him as the ex-chairman, red-faced and fighting back tears, hugged them and thanked them for their support.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

The sentencing will come five years almost to the day after Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Skilling told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

"We're going to stand behind him," his lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said. "As I told him, we've just begun to fight."

Skilling's $5 million bond, which restricts him to the continental U.S., remains in effect. Lay, who surrendered his passport, posted a $5 million bond secured with family-owned properties at a hearing following the verdict.

The Enron founder was also ordered to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado, avoid contact with any victim of the offense charged, report to pre-trial services regularly and must not own a gun or use alcohol excessively or drugs.

"I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said following the hearing. "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the lord."

Jurors found through their verdict that both men had repeatedly lied to cover a vast web of unsustainable accounting tricks and failing ventures at Enron.

Both men testified in their own defense. But the panel rejected Skilling's insistence that no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives skimming millions in secret side deals, and that bad press and poor market confidence combined to sink the company.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying, very much so, and there were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned," juror Wendy Vaughan said after the verdict was announced.

Lay was a campaign benefactor who President Bush nicknamed "Kenny Boy" when the two were up-and-comers in Texas. The Center for Public Integrity, a Washington-based nonprofit group, said the Lays had given $139,500 to Bush's political campaigns over the years.Those donations were part of $602,000 that Enron employees gave to Bush's various campaigns, making the company the leading political patron for Bush at the time of the company's bankruptcy in 2001.

Early in 2002, the White House disclosed that Lay sought help from two Cabinet members shortly before the company collapsed, but neither offered aid.

Speaking for the president on Thursday, White House press secretary Tony Snow congratulated the Justice Department on "successfully concluding a highly complex conviction."

The government's victory caps a 4 1/2 year investigation that garnered 16 guilty pleas from ex-Enron executives, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow and former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey.

All are awaiting sentencing later this year except for two, who either finished or are still serving prison terms.

"You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," prosecutor Sean Berkowitz told reporters outside the courthouse.

He expressed sympathy for the Enron employees who lost their life savings when the company collapsed.

"Nothing that happened today is going to bring that back for them. ... What we do hope is that today's verdict lets them know that the government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it."

Former employee Sherri Saunders, who lost $1 million in retirement savings when the company collapsed, found a bit of closure.

DOJ_NMG_0029890

"To me, God has spoken to him with this verdict," Saunders said. "I guess it gives me a little comfort, but it doesn't put back my retirement money."

Prosecutor John Hueston, who sparred with Lay on the stand, said the founder had missed "a golden opportunity to save Enron.

"He made that choice to put his own interests ahead of that of the shareholders and investors. And he did that by choosing not to tell the unvarnished truth and he did it by choosing not to ask the hard questions."

Asked what was next, Berkowitz joked, "We're probably going to step aside and go get a well-deserved drink and an afternoon off."

The Enron case tested the government's ability to prove complicated corporate skullduggery. Its implosion and the subsequent scandals scared off investors, increased regulatory scrutiny over publicly traded companies and prompted Congress to stiffen white collar penalties.

The vast federal investigation seemed to stall until Fastow pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy and paved the way for prosecutors to secure indictments against his bosses. Fastow also led investigators to Causey, who was bound for trial alongside Lay and Skilling until he broke ranks with their unified defense and pleaded guilty to securities fraud just weeks before the trial began.

Philip Hilder, a former federal prosecutor who represents ex-Enron finance executive Sherron Watkins, said the convictions were "absolutely a comprehensive government victory," particularly given the speed of the jury's decision. Watkins tried to warn Lay of financial problems in the fall of 2001.

Hilder said that both men likely face "north of 20 years" in prison.

"This verdict encourages us ... to continue to combat corruption wherever we find it," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, at the Justice Department in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was recused from the Enron case because he once was a partner at Houston law firm Vinson & Elkins LLP, which represented Enron.

Enron Jurors Find Lay, Skilling Guilty (HC)

By Mark Babineck, Mary Flood And John Roper

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

A federal jury convicted former Enron chiefs Ken Lay on all counts and Jeff Skilling on most counts today, marking the climax of one of the most notorious corporate scandals in U.S. history and nearly ensuring prison time for two of Houston's best-known executives.

The jury heard 16 weeks of testimony and arguments and made its announcement early on its sixth day of deliberations. The eight-woman, four-man panel found Lay guilty of all six counts. They convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 counts against him.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake set a sentencing date of Sept. 11. The two men remain free on bond.

In Lay's separate personal banking fraud trial, Lake found Lay guilty on all four counts.

After the verdict, Skilling and his attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, talked to the media outside the downtown courthouse and promised an appeal.

"Obviously, it did not come out the way we hoped. It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron and it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence," he said. "As I told (Skilling), we've just begun the fight."

When asked whether he could admit that he had broken the law, Skilling replied, "No. I didn't."

"We fought the good fight," Skilling said. "Some things work; some things don't."

Shortly before 3 p.m., Lay also made a brief statement to the media outside the courthouse: "Despite what happened today, I'm still a very blessed man. At my left is this beautiful lady that's my wife. I have a very warm, loving family. And, most of all I believe God, in fact, is in control and that, indeed God works all things good for all who love the lord. We love our lord, all this will work for good."

The jury panel spent 16 weeks listening to often diametrically opposed testimony, with the government calling 25 witnesses plus three more on rebuttal. Several had struck cooperation agreements with the government and acknowledged crimes, and most claimed Lay and Skilling were part of a conspiracy to profit personally by duping the world about Enron.

"We stole. We all benefited financially at the expense of others," said former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, who is expected to serve a 10-year prison sentence after admitting he masterminded fraudulent bookkeeping schemes and bled Enron to the tune of $45 million in the process.

The defense impugned Fastow's character and told jurors he was a liar then and he's a liar now, implying he fabricated evidence and testimony that Skilling approved of "bear hug" deals with Fastow's LJM partnerships to hide Enron debt and guarantee Fastow wouldn't lose money.

The defense called 31 witnesses, including Skilling and Lay, many taking the stand in brief stints to rebut specific points raised by the prosecution. Of course, the most important men to testify were Skilling and Lay themselves.

Skilling, 52, went first on April 10 and testified over eight days, much of it on direct examination by his Los Angeles-based defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli.

Petrocelli, a career civil attorney trying his first criminal case, methodically took Skilling through each charge in four days of direct examination. Skilling had a reputation for being controlling and abrasive, but he seemed relaxed and downright professorial while telling jurors he committed no crimes, that most of Enron's dealings were legitimate and that the real criminal was Fastow.

One of Skilling's dramatic moments came on April 13, when Petrocelli seized on bubbling emotion and engaged his client in powerful exchange about what Skilling perceived as abuse of power by the Justice Department.

"We are innocent. And by 'we' I mean Enron Corporation," Skilling said. "It was a fine company. I am innocent of all of these charges, and I will fight for that for a long time."

Enron Task Force Director Sean Berkowitz began cross-examination the next week, and Skilling surprised many by keeping his cool despite pointed questioning that sometimes turned embarrassing and personal, such as his $180,000 stake in an ex-girlfriend's Internet startup company called Photofete that did business with Enron.

"Would you agree with me that this may be a conflict of interest, at least within the (company's) code of ethics?" Berkowitz asked.

"It may be," Skilling replied, appearing humbled.

Defense lawyers cited Photofete as a prime example of prosecutors seeking to smear Skilling and Lay, who also was an investor, by throwing information at the jury that is not part of the indictment.

"Don't come to Houston, Texas, and lie to us," Lay attorney Chip Lewis shouted at prosecutor John Hueston during closing arguments, referring to Photofete.

Lay, 64, took the stand April 24 and testified over six days. Contrary to Skilling's calm demeanor, Lay seemed easily irritated by defense attorney George McCall 'Mac' Secrest. Secrest was substituting for lead defender Michael Ramsey, who bowed out for much of the trial because of surgery.

Lay's demeanor turned from grouchy to hostile once Hueston began questioning, with fireworks popping as soon as cross-examination began when the prosecutor accused Lay of trying to contact potential trial witnesses to get their "stories straight."

Lay, sometimes snarling into the microphone, shot back at Hueston.

"I don't have a story. I have my recollection of the facts and they are totally different than Mr. Fastow's," Lay said.

In closing arguments, Berkowitz seemed to agree jurors should pay close attention to what Lay and Skilling said in the ninth-floor courtroom and contrast it to what they were told actually happened on the 50th floor of the Enron Building, a few blocks down Smith Street.

"They lied to investors and omitted critical facts," Berkowitz said. "And they lied to you, ladies and gentlemen, from the stand."

Berkowitz also reminded the jurors that justice for Lay and Skilling, who invested at least $38 million combined in their united defense, should not be bought.

Ramsey, who recovered in time to make some closing arguments, warned jurors that only they could judge the facts and not the host of politicians, columnists, jilted investors and prosecutors who want to see Lay and Skilling behind bars.

"There may be a court in America that bends to political pressure but it's not this court! There may come a day when an American jury yields to a media mob, but it's not this jury," said Ramsey, one of Houston's most-respected criminal lawyers. "We're going to have a fair jury here."

The attorneys and Lake took one day to pick the jury that heard the case. Many among the panel knew little about Enron, although some confided in questionnaires and in court that "greed" or misdeeds took the company down.

Tuning out Enron has been a neat trick in the Houston area over the past five years as the ruination of what was dubbed the nation's seventh-largest company has remained the dominant U.S. corporate scandal among a flurry of such implosions around the turn of the century. Scandal also enveloped companies like Worldcom, Tyco and Adelphia, but Enron always has been at the forefront.

That's especially so in Houston, where thousands of employees lost their jobs — 4,000 at once the day after Enron filed for bankruptcy on Dec. 2, 2001. Many lost their retirement savings, which was invested in near-worthless Enron shares.

SLICK EXECS TAKEN DOWN (NYPOST)

By Andy Geller

The New York Post, May 26, 2006

May 26, 2006 -- Former hot-shot execs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, who guided Enron through its spectacular rise and crashing fall, were convicted yesterday of orchestrating a massive fraud that made the energy company the symbol of corporate deceit in America.

After four months of testimony, a Houston federal jury, on the sixth day of deliberations, found Lay and Skilling guilty of fraud and conspiracy for lying about Enron's crumbling fortunes - to investors, employees and government regulators.

Lay, 64, the firm's ex-chairman, and Skilling, 52, its former CEO - who together spent close to $70 million on their defense - could spend the rest of their lives behind bars.

Enron's collapse in December 2001 wiped out $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

It led to a crackdown on corporate crime in which federal prosecutors won convictions against CEOs and domestic diva Martha Stewart. And Congress passed a law to make company executives more accountable.

Jurors said they didn't believe the claims of Lay and Skilling, who testified for a total of 131/2 days, that they were kept in the dark about Enron's problems.

"To say you didn't know what was going on in your own company was not the right thing," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary-school principal.

"I think both defendants said they had their hands firmly on the wheel, so they didn't know what was going on?" he added. "Personally, I can't say, 'I don't know what my teachers are doing in the classroom.' I'm still responsible if a child gets lost."

Juror Wendy Vaughn agreed.

"I felt like in the position they were in, it was their duty to know what was going on and they should have gone farther to know what was going on," she said, adding that Lay's attitude on the witness stand may have worked against him.

He had "a little bit of a chip on his shoulder," she said. "It made me question his character at that point, how controlling he might be."

Lay - called "Kenny Boy" by his pal President Bush, to whom he made hefty campaign contributions - was convicted of six counts of securities fraud, wire fraud and conspiracy. In a related bench trial, he was also found guilty of bank fraud and making false statements to banks.

He faces a total of 165 years in prison.

As Judge Simeon Lake pronounced the first "guilty," Lay slumped, sighed heavily and shook his head.

As the judge repeated the word nine more times, Lay clutched the hand of his wife, Linda, and she leaned forward and began weeping.

Two other women sitting with Lay - his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team, and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn - also began sobbing.

After the judge left the courtroom, family and friends gathered around Lay, whose face was red and who was fighting back tears.

Lay, the son of a Baptist preacher, hugged them and thanked them for their support, saying, "God's got another plan right now."

He then clasped hands with them and they stood in a circle to pray.

"We'll all come through this stronger and more reliant on God," he told them.

Later, he proclaimed his innocence, declaring, "We believe that God in fact is in control and indeed he does work all things for good for those who love the Lord."

Skilling, who was Lay's protégé, was convicted of 19 counts of securities and wire fraud, conspiracy, making false statements to auditors and one count of insider trading. He was acquitted of nine other counts of insider trading.

He faces 185 years behind bars.

Skilling, sitting with his brother, Mark, appeared shaken at the verdict and left the courtroom quickly.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," he said outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

His lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said he would appeal.

"We've just begun to fight," he said.

"We've had a trial, and obviously it did not come out the way we hoped. It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron. And it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence," he added.

The prosecution was jubilant.

"The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it," said lead prosecutor Sean Berkowitz.

DOJ_NMG_0029893

"You can't lie to shareholders, you can't put yourselves in front of your employees' interests. No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

The defendants will be sentenced Sept. 11 - almost five years to the day that Skilling sold 500,000 shares of Enron stock for $15.5 million, for which he was convicted of insider trading.

Lake allowed Skilling to remain free on $5 million bond, rejecting a prosecution request to place him in home confinement.

Lay, who also remains free, was ordered to surrender his passport.

"I'm not letting him leave this building until his passport is surrendered," the judge said.

The former Enron chief was also ordered to post a $5 million cash bond.

It was a stunning reversal of fortune for Lay and Skilling, who transformed Enron from a sleepy natural-gas company into the nation's seventh-largest corporation and the world's largest energy-trading company.

Enron was one of Bush's biggest backers, with company employees donating $602,000 to Bush's political campaigns. Lay and his wife donated $139,500.

Then came the fall.

In December 2001 the company filed for bankruptcy, revealing it was little more than a house of cards that used accounting tricks and off-the-books partnerships to hide billions in losses and company debt.

In the wake of the collapse, the feds cracked down on corporate crime.

CEOs of WorldCom, HealthSouth, Adelphia Communications and Rite Aid were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries.

All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial in Alabama on unrelated bribery charges.

Public outrage led to the passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, designed to make company executives more accountable.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), the lead author, said "we should punish the bad apples and that's obviously what happened in Texas. They undermined confidence in our markets."

"The jury's verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies," agreed Rep. Michael Oxley (R-Ohio), the co-author. "Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

In presenting their case, prosecutors did not accuse Lay and Skilling of creating the off-the-books partnerships and accounting tricks.

Instead, they argued that the two men knew about them and repeatedly lied to cover them up.

In Lay's case, one of those lies was a lie of omission. When he urged employees to buy Enron stock in September 2001, he failed to tell them he had sold $70 million in stock back to the company.

And just before the bankruptcy, he used stock proceeds to pay off the mortgage on his home.

Those facts infuriated juror Don Martin.

"I thought that was a disgrace," he said. "It was horrible. People had all their money tied up [in pensions] and they can't touch it and he's out paying his house payment."

Delgado added, "It was very much the character of person he was. He cashed out before the employees did."

The witnesses against Lay and Skilling included a parade of ex-Enron executives.

Former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow testified that Skilling encouraged him to set up the partnerships to hide losses, "juice" the company's earnings and help meet quarterly forecasts.

The feds' investigation seemed to stall until Fastow pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy, paving the way for prosecutors to win indictments against his bosses.

Skilling impressed the jury - and hurt his defense - when he stepped off the witness stand and used a complicated chart to explain Enron's trading activity.

"I would have always had questions if they had not taken the stand," said juror Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher. "That helped reaffirm it for me."

Added Delgado: "To say he's [Skilling] not involved, that's not credible."

In the end, the jurors said they were convinced by the tales of the witnesses that Lay and Skilling knew more than they were willing to admit.

"There was too much evidence interlinked," Delgado said. "Even if the government persuaded them, twisted their arm, whatever, you cannot get all of them to say the same thing and point to the same evidence." With Post Wire Services

Lay, Skilling Convicted Of Fraud That Doomed Enron (Update9) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, who built Enron Corp. into the nation's seventh-largest company and then drove it into bankruptcy, were convicted of orchestrating a fraud that made the energy trader the symbol of corporate deceit in America.

Jurors in federal court in Houston deliberated six days before finding Lay, Enron's former chairman, and Skilling, its former chief executive officer, guilty today of fraud, conspiracy and other charges for lying to investors about the company's finances. The panel heard four months of testimony before reaching its verdict.

``The government will not let corporate leaders violate their trust and get away with it," said Sean Berkowitz, head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which conducted the prosecution. ``You can't lie to shareholders and put yourself in front of your employees' interests."

Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, face at least 25 years each in prison after being convicted of using off-the-books partnerships to disguise Enron's debts. Skilling faces additional jail time over his conviction for using inside information to sell Enron stock. Lay was also convicted on bank fraud charges after a trial that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake held without a jury while the panel in the main case deliberated.

``Obviously I'm not real happy with this," Skilling said in the courtroom after the verdict. ``It is what it is." Skilling maintained his innocence and his lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said he would appeal.

Surrender Passport

Lake said he would sentence the defendants on Sept. 11. Skilling is allowed to remain free on $5 million bond and doesn't have to be put in ``home confinement" as prosecutors sought, Lake said.

Lay surrendered his passport after the judge said he wasn't allowed to leave the courthouse until he did so. Lay posted a $5 million bond, co-signed by his wife and children. He's restricted to living in Colorado and the southern district of Texas, and the routes to and from those places.

``I firmly believe I'm innocent of the charges against me," Lay said outside the courtroom. ``We believe God in fact is in control and he does indeed work all things for the good."

Both men face spending the rest of their lives in prison if they are given maximum sentences. After the verdict was announced, the color drained from Lay's face and his wife and daughter burst into tears. Skilling's wife wasn't in the courtroom.

``We've had a trial, and obviously it did not come out the way we hoped," Petrocelli said. ``It doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron. And it certainly doesn't change our view of Jeff Skilling's innocence."

Government Crackdown

Enron, once the world's largest energy trading firm, had more than $68 billion in market value before its December 2001 bankruptcy filing wiped out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. Investors suing over the company's collapse claim accounting fraud at the Houston-based firm caused at least $25 billion in losses.

``I think investors can feel validated in that the legal system worked here," said Mark Ross, partner at Sichenzia Ross Friedman Ference. ``On a bigger picture, it will instill confidence back in the capital markets in America."

In the wake of Enron's meltdown, government prosecutors cracked down on corporate crime. CEOs of WorldCom Inc., HealthSouth Corp., Adelphia Communications Corp. and Rite Aid Corp. were prosecuted for accounting fraud or looting company treasuries. All were convicted of fraud except HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy, who now is on trial on unrelated bribery charges in Alabama.

Punish Bad Apples

We should ``punish the bad apples and that's obviously what happened in Texas," said Senator Paul Sarbanes, a Maryland Democrat. Sarbanes is the co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, passed to improve corporate reporting. ``They undermined confidence in our markets."

The eight-woman, four-man jury convicted Skilling on 19 of the 28 charges against him while finding Lay guilty of all of the six counts against him. The government presented a total of 25 witnesses against the men, including a parade of former Enron executives.

``It's safe to say each of them is facing north of 20 years real jail time," said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of Federal Sentencing for Business Crimes. The calculation of the size of the fraud will play a part in determining the exact sentence. ``There's going to be a mini- trial on sentencing issues."

`Kenny Boy'

Prosecutors should feel vindicated as well, said Behre, now a partner at Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker in Washington. ``This case epitomizes a new paradigm of corporate criminal prosecutions. We now hold the highest-level executives responsible for the misconduct of the company. These two guys are as high as they get."

Enron contributed nearly $6 million to federal parties and candidates between 1989 and 2001, more than two-thirds to Republicans, according to OpenSecrets.org, the Web site of the Center for Responsive Politics.

More than $2 million of that money came during the 1999-2000 election cycle, when the company became one of the biggest backers of President George W. Bush's bid for the White House. Lay personally raised at least $100,000 for the campaign, and Bush used to refer to him by the nickname ``Kenny Boy.''

White House spokesman Tony Snow said today the Justice Department was to be congratulated for concluding a ``highly complex'' case. ``The administration has been pretty clear, there's no tolerance for corporate corruption,'' Snow said when asked about the guilty verdicts.

Fastow Testimony

Former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow told jurors Skilling helped orchestrate a scheme to use off-the-books partnerships to hide billions in losses and debts racked up by the company. Other executives said Lay took over the effort to deceive investors about Enron's finances after Skilling stepped down as CEO.

Lawyers for the two men argued that prosecutors sought to criminalize normal business practices and that their clients were victims of thieving subordinates like Fastow.

Fastow, who pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's collapse, told jurors that Skilling encouraged him to set up the partnerships to ``juice'' the company's earnings and help meet quarterly forecasts. Fastow agreed to serve 10 years in prison for committing fraud at the company.

The defense sought to discredit Fastow, noting he'd stolen more than $20 million from Enron in partnership-related deals and had hidden his actions from Skilling and Lay.

Glisan Effective

Former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan testified that Skilling endorsed using the partnerships to overvalue assets and disguise losses and touted them because they allowed the company to ``circumvent accounting rules.'' Glisan pleaded guilty to fraud charges and is serving five years in prison. After the verdict was announced, a juror said the jury referred to Glisan's testimony throughout its deliberations.

Glisan said Lay assigned him in August 2001, after Skilling left as CEO, to lobby credit-rating companies to allow the company to write off more than $1 billion in losses without suffering a debt rating downgrade.

Other witnesses, including former Enron investor relations executives Mark Koenig and Paula Rieker, testified that Lay misled analysts about the performance of some of the company's units as the firm deteriorated in the fall of 2001.

Lay and Skilling took the witness stand to try to convince jurors they hadn't presided over fraud at Enron and that prosecutors strong-armed their former colleagues into testifying against them.

Life on the Line

Skilling, who told jurors his ``life was on the line'' in the case, said the government investigation of Enron became a ``witch hunt'' that resulted in the charges against him and Lay.

Skilling denied being part of any effort to manipulate earnings and dismissed Fastow as a thief and a liar. He sparred with prosecutors, accusing them of twisting facts about Enron's performance to blame the company's demise on him and Lay.

Lay, whose father was a Missouri farmer and a Baptist preacher, earned a masters degree in economics from the University of Missouri in 1965. After a stint with Humble Oil in Houston, he joined the Navy in 1968 and worked as a purchasing officer at the Pentagon.

After the Navy, Lay worked at the Federal Power Commission and then the Department of the Interior. After that he joined Florida Gas Co., eventually becoming president. He moved to Transco Energy Co. in 1981 and joined Houston Natural Gas Corp. in 1985, where he was chief executive officer.

In 1985, Houston Natural Gas merged with Omaha, Nebraska- based InterNorth Inc., another pipeline company, and Enron was born.

Great Fall

`It's a stunning verdict,'' said John Carney, a former federal prosecutor now at Baker & Hostetler. ``It's the end of a chapter but not the end of a book. Enron was an icon of American business. Ken Lay was one of the most revered and respected CEOs in the country. To see him go like that is probably one of the greatest falls in business history.''

Skilling joined McKinsey & Co., a management consulting firm,, after his 1979 graduation from Harvard Business School. McKinsey counted Enron's predecessor, InterNorth, as a client, and Skilling joined Enron in 1990. He became president and chief operating officer in 1997 and chief executive officer in February 2001, upon Lay's initial departure from the company, only to quit in August.

``I've had my fingers, my legs and everything else crossed hoping this verdict would come down in the manner and form that it has,'' said Raymond Plank, chairman of Houston-based oil and gas producer Apache Corp. ``I feel justice has been served. My primary interest is to see them serve a long, long sentence.''

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Lay And Skilling's Day Of Reckoning (CNNM)

By Shaheen Pasha And Jessica Seid, CNNMoney.com staff writers

CNN/Money, May 26, 2006

Enron ex-CEO and founder convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges; sentencing slated for September.

HOUSTON (CNNMoney.com) - Enron former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay were both found guilty Thursday of conspiracy and fraud in the granddaddy of all corporate fraud cases.

On the sixth day of deliberations, a jury of eight women and four men convicted the former executives of misleading the public about the true financial health of Enron, whose collapse in late 2001 symbolized the wave of corporate fraud that swept the United States early this decade.

Ex-Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling walks away from reporters in Houston after a jury found him guilty of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, false statements and insider trading.

Skilling was found guilty on 19 counts of conspiracy, fraud, false statements and insider trading. He was found not guilty on nine counts of insider trading.

Lay was found guilty on all six counts of conspiracy and fraud. In a separate bench trial, Judge Sim Lake ruled Lay was guilty of four counts of fraud and false statements. (Click here for the defendants' reactions)

Both Lay and Skilling could face 20 to 30 years in prison, legal experts say. And Lay will also face an additional hefty term in prison for his conviction in the bank fraud case.

"I think absent a successful appeal, they will both die in prison," said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation at the international law firm Paul Hastings. "When you're a judge that's concluded that two men have lied to you for hours and hours and hours, light sentences aren't going to flow."

Judge Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11 and ordered Lay to surrender his passport and post a $5 million bond. No home confinement was ordered but homes owned by Lay and his children were used as an assurety for the $5 million bond.

Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, told reporters outside the courthouse, "We will have a full and vigorous appeal."

"The jury saw it differently," Petrocelli said, referring to his client's maintaining his innocence. "We'll take it from here."

Wareham said the defendants don't have a large amount of appeal platforms, but he expects lawyers will try to raise the issue that both men were tried in Houston, the epicenter of Enron's implosion. Defense attorneys had attempted unsuccessfully to have the venue changed prior to the trial saying it was impossible to get a fair trial in Houston.

Jurors react

All 12 jurors and three alternates speaking to reporters after the verdict insisted that the decision was one of the hardest they had to make, given compelling arguments from both sides. But ultimately, they agreed that the evidence, corroborated by the line of witnesses presented by the prosecution, proved too strong to ignore.

"This is undoubtedly the most difficult, heart-wrenching experience I've ever had in my life," said Kathy Harrison, an elementary school teacher who served on the jury. "I performed my duty as an American citizen. I've never fought on a foreign battleground (but) I fought on this battleground for American justice."

Jurors said of the 22 witnesses for the prosecution, the first witness, Mark Koenig - who served as Enron's head of investor relations - and Ben Glisan, the former treasurer of Enron who is the only executive currently serving time in jail, were the most persuasive given their knowledge of details at the company.

But Andrew Fastow, Enron's former financial chief who was long considered to be a star witness for the prosecution, was less effective, jurors said.

"Fastow was Fastow," said Donald Martin, an electrical designer who served on the jury. "We knew where he was coming from."

The defense has long contended that Fastow's treachery brought down the company and he cut a deal with the prosecution, requiring him to testify against his former bosses, to receive a lighter sentence.

Wendy Vaughn, a juror who owns two businesses, said that from the beginning she admired both Lay and Skilling's brilliance and talent as businessmen building up Enron. But she said "it was sad to see in the end, it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner."

She added that Lay's demeanor on the stand ultimately worked against him.

"He seemed very much wanting to be in control," she said. "He seemed to have very much of a chip on his shoulder... it made me question his character."

And the jurors said both men seemed to be hands-on executives, making their testimony that they relied on the advice of others questionable.

"Both said they had their hands on the wheel," said Freddy Delgado, an elementary school principal. "I can't say I don't know what my teachers are doing. To say that they didn't know what was going (on, it) wasn't right they said that."

Delgado added that the jury pored through the facts and he didn't believe anyone could question the fairness of the Houston jury.

"Houston should be proud," he said.

Tears in the courthouse

Skilling stood stone-faced as he was convicted on most of the counts he faced. Skilling's wife and children were notably absent.

Petrocelli had his hand on his client's shoulder, bracing him.

As Lay's verdict was read, his daughter Elizabeth Vittore, who has been one of his attorneys during the case, began to sob uncontrollably. His wife, Linda, clutching his hand, wiped tears away silently. All of his children sat in the front row with other members of the family. One of his sons put his face in his hands and wept.

Lay clutched his wife's hand and looked straight ahead.

Speaking to reporters outside the courthouse, Lay expressed shock at the verdict and continued to maintain his innocence as his wife Linda stood by his side.

"I firmly believe I am innocent of the charges," he said. "Despite what has happened I'm still a very blessed man."

Outside the courtroom after court was adjourned, Skilling said, "We fought a good fight. Some things work. Some things don't."

"Obviously I'm disappointed, but that's the way the system works," he added.

Enron employees rejoiced at the verdict. (Click here for full story.)

A huge scandal

The verdict is a major victory for the government, and marks the end of one of the most scandalous chapters in the history of corporate America.

The Enron government task force exited the courthouse at 2 p.m. ET and was greeted with applause. In a statement to the press, lead government prosecutor Sean Berkowitz said, "The eyes of the world have been on this courthouse and they have seen the justice system at work."

"No matter how rich you are, you have to play by the rules," he added.

Berkowitz said that he was proud of everybody on his team and the personal sacrifice they had made, adding they would all "go out and get a drink."

In Washington, Department of Justice officials praised the Enron prosecutors and said the conviction will encourage the government to go after more such cases.

"Our laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as against street criminals," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. "No one is above the law."

The White House had no comment on the verdicts except to congratulate the Justice Department for winning convictions in a "highly complex" case. Lay was a major fund-raiser for President Bush, who gave him the nickname "Kenny Boy."

"The administration has been pretty clear - there is no tolerance for corporate corruption," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Houston-based Enron, once one of the hottest companies on Wall Street, imploded in a matter of months after Skilling abruptly resigned as CEO in August 2001. Lay, who was chairman at the time, postponed his retirement plans to return to the helm.

Enron's collapse marked the first of the high-profile corporate scandals that rocked the nation, followed by WorldCom, Global Crossing, Adelphia and Tyco. The wave of fraud led to passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that tightened oversight of how American companies are audited.

After a government investigation that took 4-1/2 years, prosecutors presented evidence that Lay and Skilling orchestrated a conspiracy to artificially inflate profits, hide millions in losses and misrepresent the true nature of the company's finances.

The long-awaited trial began Jan. 31 in Houston.

Enron's bankruptcy, the biggest in U.S. history when it was filed in December 2001, cost 4,000 employees their jobs and many of them their life savings. Investors lost billions of dollars.

Over 16 weeks, the government presented 22 witnesses, including former top executives, who testified that Skilling and Lay fostered a culture that put the company's image and stock price above everything else, at any cost.

Sixteen people pleaded guilty for crimes committed at the company, and five others, including four former Merrill Lynch employees, were found guilty at trial. Eight former Enron executives testified against Lay and Skilling, their former bosses.

Jurors: Ex-Enron Execs Not Credible (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling said they always relied on the lawyers and accountants who signed off on Enron's earnings statements. Jurors said they should have relied on the truth.

In a decisive conclusion to an epic trial here Thursday, a federal jury convicted the two men of lying to investors five years ago about the financial health of Enron, the company they both led as CEOs.

By convicting the pair of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and related crimes, the 12 jurors rejected Lay and Skilling's primary defense: that they believed Enron's earnings statements were fair and accurate because those statements had been blessed by internal accountants and lawyers.

Instead, the jury agreed overwhelmingly with government prosecutors, who argued that the men used their power to bully and cajole subordinates into painting an artificially positive picture of Enron's earnings for investors.

"The defense was built around a reliance on auditors, attorneys and staff, and trying to get people to believe that as CEOs, they knew absolutely nothing about fraud when they were getting paid millions," says Lynn Turner, former chief accountant of the Securities and Exchange Commission. "Other executives are going to understand that this type of defense isn't plausible anymore."

The guilty verdict in the biggest criminal case to emerge from the wave of corporate frauds that rattled investors from 2001 through 2003 is a significant triumph for the Enron Task Force. That team, formed in January 2002 to investigate wrongdoing after Enron's sudden collapse, has secured 16 guilty pleas from former Enron employees but has failed to win convictions of several prominent former executives.

It is also a significant victory for the Justice Department's push to restore integrity to the corporate boardroom. Last year, a federal jury in Manhattan convicted former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers of encouraging his subordinates to cook his company's books. The year before, former Adelphia CEO John Rigas was convicted of fraud and misuse of investor funds. Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau won a conviction last year of former Tyco CEO Dennis Kozlowski and his CFO, Mark Swartz.

The only significant failure in the Justice Department's campaign against corporate fraud occurred in Alabama last year, when a federal jury acquitted former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of masterminding a $2.7 billion fraud, even though five former CFOs testified against Scrushy.

In discussing that case after the verdict, several jurors seemed confused about what the government was trying to prove against Scrushy. In the Enron trial, government prosecutors wanted to avoid the same mistakes.

After Enron's collapse in 2001, Lay and Skilling became poster boys for corporate misbehavior and were widely blamed in the media for the fraud that was found at Enron.

But to win criminal convictions in federal court, prosecutors needed actual proof of guilt against the two men. And, because there were no e-mails tying Lay and Skilling directly to the fraud, prosecutors made a strategic decision to focus the trial on whether Lay and Skilling told the truth in public, not if Enron's accounting was illegal.

To that end, perhaps the biggest single break for the prosecutors occurred in December, a month before the trial was to begin, when Richard Causey, the former chief accounting officer of Enron, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud.

Originally, the government was going to put Causey on trial alongside Skilling and Lay. That would have made the case more difficult to win because it would have required the Enron Task Force to delve deeply into Enron's convoluted accounting, which could have confused the jury. Prosecuting Causey would also have added two months to the trial, which could have exhausted the jury.

Instead, with Causey out of the picture in a plea deal, prosecutors could focus their case against Lay and Skilling exclusively on whether the two men were honest in statements to employees, analysts and investors.

In his opening statement on Jan. 31, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Hueston said the government's case was not about accounting but the choices Lay and Skilling made when speaking to the public in 2000 and 2001.

Defense lawyers tried to divert the case into the thicket of accounting rules, but prosecutors wouldn't budge. Throughout February and March, the government elicited testimony from 22 witnesses, many of them cooperators who had pleaded guilty to lesser charges in exchange for the promise of more lenient prison sentences. With almost every witness, prosecutors banged away at the same theme: Lay and Skilling lied to the outside world about what was going on at Enron.

In April, when the defense put on its case, it was clear both Lay and Skilling had to testify. Ultimately, jurors said, the testimony of the two men wasn't as credible as what came from all the government witnesses, whose stories corroborated one another. "I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying," said juror Wendy Vaughan after the verdict. "At the beginning of the trial, I admired both men. I thought they were brilliant. It was sad to see in the end it wasn't accomplished in a respectful manner."

According to the jury, Skilling was undone by his own brilliance, which was evident on the stand. In two weeks of testimony, the former McKinsey consultant who revolutionized the energy industry by turning the mundane business of delivering natural gas into a wildly successful futures market, instructed jurors about the intricacies of Enron's businesses. At one point, he told in detail how Enron used a statistical risk model, dubbed VaR for "value at risk," to insulate itself from gyrations in commodities markets.

"For a man who knew every aspect of the business, why didn't he know what was going on?" asked juror Doug Baggett, legal department manager at a Houston company.

As for Lay, jurors said they were impressed with the many civic and charitable contributions he made in Houston, but his outward generosity didn't excuse what happened at Enron. "Outside the company, he was a very nice person," said juror Don Martin.

"Mr. Lay did many great things," added Kathy Harrison. "All of this is a tragedy. Bad choices and bad decisions don't take away from what he did for the community."

For Lay to win an acquittal, he was going to have to convince the jury that he wasn't aware of any wrongdoing at Enron. His attorneys also wanted him to tell the inspiring story of rising from humble roots in rural Missouri to the pinnacle of American business. But in telling his story on the stand, Lay sounded angry, blaming prosecutors for turning his life into a nightmare, and even snapping at his own attorney on occasion.

"He seemed very much to want to be in control," said Vaughan. "He commanded the room." Lay also seemed "to have a chip on his shoulder," she said. "It made me question his character at that point."

Worse than Lay's demeanor on the stand, jurors said, was evidence presented by the government that while Enron was collapsing, he quietly sold $70 million in stock back to Enron while urging employees to buy more.

On the witness stand, Lay explained that he had accumulated about $100 million in bank debt, secured largely by his Enron stock holdings. As the value of that stock dropped through 2001, he received margin calls from the banks and, therefore, sold his stock back to Enron to pay off his debts.

But when prosecutors confronted him with a statement he made to employees declaring that he was buying stock himself, Lay said he didn't consider "forced" sales of stock to be the same as "discretionary" sales. The distinction seemed lost on the jury.

Martin labeled the secret sales "disgusting" and "horrible," while Baggett said they provided evidence of Lay's "intent."

Michael Moran, an Enron retiree who serves as co-chairman of a special employee committee created by the bankruptcy court, said he was satisfied with the verdict: "It brings to closure one of the final chapters of the Enron saga. I would have been extremely disappointed had the jury come back and found Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling not guilty."

The Enron Task Force is currently trying to convict several executives from the company's broadband unit and has asked that three British bankers be extradited from the UK to face charges that they were part of one fraudulent scheme at Enron. But for all practical purposes, the conviction of Lay and Skilling is likely to end the Justice Department's investigation of fraud at what was once the USA's seventh-largest corporation.

It's standard practice for prosecutors to declare, even after a victory, that an investigation into wrongdoing is "ongoing." Thursday, basking in the glory of a big win outside the federal courthouse, prosecutor Hueston wouldn't go that far. Instead, he said, "The investigation may be ongoing."

Trial Fails To Answer Many Questions About Spectacular Collapse (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Some of the most tantalizing questions about what really happened at Enron Corp. remain unanswered -- and in all likelihood will stay that way.

The convictions of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay1 and former President Jeffrey Skilling2 on a majority of the conspiracy and fraud charges against them cap a long drive by the government to prosecute crimes associated with the Houston company's spectacular collapse into bankruptcy. As the Enron prosecutorial effort winds down after four years of forensic digging, it has become clear that the government moved quickly in the wake of the 2001 scandal to demonstrate to an angry public that a cop was on the beat, the guilty would be punished and the system purged of corruption.

Yet none of the trials produced new pieces of evidence that could be termed "smoking guns," despite the fact prosecutors had broad subpoena powers and access to Enron records and internal documents that weren't available to the public. Some of the big questions linger, seemingly beyond the reach of the trials.

The questions involve Enron's finances and tactics, and the motivations of many former employees. For example, it still isn't clear how much Enron made or lost off its vaunted energy-trading, energy-services and broadband units. It also isn't known how much money Enron reaped by exploiting the California electricity market during the 15-month crisis that began in the spring of 2000. Even after all the trial testimony, it isn't clear how long Enron could have continued to operate, absent the scandal that engulfed it in 2001, or just how much Messrs. Skilling and Lay knew about the company's off-balance-sheet partnerships.

"A criminal trial is not designed as a search for the truth," said Joseph Beeler, a partner at Ferrell Law in Miami and past president of the American Board of Criminal Lawyers. The mission is to "dispense justice in an individual case, and those who expect more are bound to be disappointed."

Instead of answering important social or philosophical questions, trials are adversarial contests in which prosecutors attempt to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendants committed certain narrowly defined crimes.

"The system is designed to focus on relevant and material information," and exclude nearly everything else, said Mark Biros, a former federal prosecutor who is now managing partner of the Washington office of Proskauer Rose LLP. "That's why people walk away somewhat dissatisfied."

The just-completed trial of Messrs. Skilling and Lay is a case in point. Because a third defendant, former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey12, pleaded guilty just before the trial began, the case against Messrs. Skilling and Lay became simpler and less focused on the nitty-gritty of how Enron operated. So, while the defendants insisted Enron was a healthy energy-trading company that fell victim to a "run on the bank," there was little detailed exploration of the roots of Enron's problems -- including how it became so dependent on paper trading gains that had little real cash attached to them and so vulnerable to credit calls that made it incapable of riding out a crisis.

Indeed, more than four years after the Enron scandal began, it is still impossible to say what was real at Enron and what was smoke and mirrors.

Enron was permitted to book profits through means that were volatile and risky, but that, apparently, broke no laws. It was allowed to rack up "mark-to-market" gains on its trading book rather than use "accrual" accounting that is based on the flow of actual money. A reliance on such accounting may be acceptable, in some circumstances, so long as there is real cash coming from somewhere. In the real world, companies need hard cash to pay employees and cover expenses.

It still isn't clear how much of Enron's profits came from outright financial chicanery and how much from exploiting accounting constructs such as mark-to-market accounting and the use of derivative instruments that remain legal and largely unregulated today. Prosecutors go after illegal conduct, not foolhardy business practices.

Leslie Caldwell, the former head of the Enron Task Force who is now at Morgan Lewis & Bockius in New York, said she thought it was "very smart" of prosecutors "not to get bogged down" in accounting intricacies. It might have answered some questions about the company, but it would not have advanced the case.

Nor should one expect revelatory insights from defendants. "Your own trial is not the place to engage in self-reflection," said Melinda Haag, a former federal prosecutor who is now a partner at Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe in San Francisco. "For that, you have a clergy person, a friend or a therapist."

Trials generate mosaic pieces that can be combined with other bits of information to create the big pictures that ultimately give meaning to the judicial exercise and explain the significance of the Enron saga.

"What trials aren't about is the resolution of great issues," said Anton Valukas, a former U.S. attorney for Chicago who is now a partner at Jenner & Block there.

White-Collar Crime's New Milestone (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters And Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

If there was one case the government had to make to define this as the era of corporate accountability, it was Enron.

But the Enron Corp. tale was complicated, with labyrinthine partnerships and intricate accounting entries, and no documents directly tying the guys at the top to the decisions carried out by others. It was a tough case to be a must win.

When the jury returned its verdicts -- guilty on 25 of a combined 34 counts -- it was a clear win. Jurors refused to let slide the two former chief executives who had become synonymous with corporate corruption, and who tried to blame underlings, advisers, institutional investors and the media for the Houston energy company's spectacular 2001 collapse.

"The jury says, you're the boss," said white-collar defense attorney Charles A. Stillman.

The convictions of Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling cap the Justice Department's five-year battle to hold top executives responsible for a flood of accounting fraud and corporate failures that undermined investor confidence, put tens of thousands of people out of work and hit the savings of millions of ordinary people.

Enron's 2001 bankruptcy exposed failures across the system of corporate governance, from audit companies that lacked true independence and board members who failed to ask skeptical questions to lawyers and bankers who blessed questionable deals in exchange for whopping fees. It also resulted in major changes to the regulatory system, including a federal law that requires top corporate executives to attest to the accuracy of financial statements.

When Enron was followed by a wave of scandals at companies such as WorldCom Inc., Tyco International Ltd. and Adelphia Communications Corp., it was not clear whether prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission would be able to cope with the complexity and sheer numbers of the cases. But government lawyers slowly built their evidence and, after initial setbacks, learned to streamline their cases for juries. They won convictions of WorldCom chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers, Adelphia Chairman John J. Rigas, domesticity entrepreneur Martha Stewart and the top executives of Tyco.

But none of them equaled the importance of Enron, where it all started and which involved the most complicated financial and legal schemes.

"The ordinary investor uses the word Enron to scare their kids," said University of Texas law professor Henry T.C. Hu. "These convictions are the end of a particularly important morality play. Everyone always thought that the Enron-Skilling-Lay trial would be harder for prosecutors . . . and yet the prosecutors won. That really helps in terms of deterrence."

Although the Enron convictions serve as a high-water mark for the government's efforts to crack down on high-level corporate lawbreaking, legal analysts cautioned that the case does not mark the end of white-collar crime. "Where there's money, there's going to be crime," said former U.S. Attorney David N. Kelley. "You never know what's going to surface."

For corporate executives still under scrutiny, the verdicts yesterday underscored the peril of defendants taking the witness stand in white-collar fraud cases.

As in many of the recent top corporate trials, prosecutors had few documents linking Skilling and Lay to the accounting maneuvers that hid billions of dollars in losses from investors. The case therefore came down to weighing the two men's credibility against that of the other Enron executives, who swore Lay and Skilling were involved.

That made the two men's performances on the stand that much more critical, and both of them fell short. Lay in particular came across as an irritable control freak, while Skilling strained credulity with his complicated explanations and convenient memory lapses, jurors said.

The results mirrored those of other high-profile cases: The jurors who convicted Ebbers also said they didn't believe his testimony that he was unaware of the accounting schemes in that case, and former investment banker Frank P. Quattrone torpedoed his case when he was caught in an apparent misstatement on the stand. Quattrone's obstruction of justice conviction was later reversed, and he is currently negotiating with prosecutors to avoid another trial. Most legal observers credit the lone prominent acquittal, that of Richard M. Scrushy of HealthSouth Corp., to the months he spent cultivating the black and religious communities in Birmingham, where his case was tried.

"It's Shakespearean. The CEOs who have gone down are people who literally lost touch with reality," said Yale University law professor Jonathan Macey. "Ken Lay had so internalized the idea of an imperial CEO that he blamed everyone but himself. He could not conceptualize that he should take responsibility."

More than any other case, Enron symbolized the collapse of the 1990s stock market bubble and the revelation that many of the nation's highest-flying companies were far less substantial than they seemed. "This was the stock market's 9/11. How could the seventh-largest company collapse?" said Samuel W. Buell, a former federal prosecutor who worked on the early stages of the Enron case. "The knowledge that there is going to be punishment in egregious cases has to restore investor confidence."

"The fact that significant and highly credible companies engaged in misconduct of the rankest sort, pulling the wool over the eyes not just of investors but of analysts, journalists and regulators, is a very sorry chapter in our history, and one that deserves the right type of burial," said Harvey L. Pitt, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Energized after Enron's December 2001 bankruptcy filing and the fall of WorldCom months later, Congress overwhelmingly passed legislation that forces companies to set up stronger internal controls and holds chief executives, finance chiefs, board members and auditors more responsible for financial reports.

The aftermath of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act spawned new standards by the major U.S. stock exchanges and prompted courts to review such cases more stringently, experts said.

"The failure of Enron . . . fundamentally altered the corporate governance movement forever," said University of Delaware professor Charles M. Elson. "It greatly accelerated changes in the form of more responsibility for corporate boards and auditors, and it led to a great skepticism on the part of the investing public as to the business practices in corporate America. Regardless of what happens, they have been inadvertent change agents."

Even now, however, groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce are attacking the law in the courts and in the halls of the SEC. Another trade organization, the Free Enterprise Fund, has mounted a legal challenge to the Public Company

Accounting Oversight Board as too costly and invasive. The board is a watchdog body created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act to police the accounting industry. Advocates of increased oversight warn that if that case is successful, the entire law could be thrown out.

But the law's supporters said they hope the string of prosecution victories will give would-be fraudsters pause and remind Americans of the need for corporate accountability.

"Now we have a greater appreciation of the role of watchdogs," said Anthony M. Sabino, a law professor at St. John's University. "Sarbanes-Oxley was a good idea, is a good idea. Leave it alone. We need it to prevent the Enrons of the future."

Lay, Skilling May Have Paved Their Way To Prison (AP)

By Kristen Hays, AP Business Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON — Kenneth Lay may have paved his way to prison when he testified in his own defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, snarling at a prosecutor and telling a jury of middle-class men and women that he couldn't turn off his rich lifestyle "like a spigot," despite $100 million in personal debt.

Jeffrey Skilling may have guaranteed himself a string of convictions when he couldn't counter incriminating testimony from prosecution witnesses with more than, "It's not true."

The epic undoing of the founder and former chief executive of what was once the seventh-largest company in the country and his hand-picked successor came in telling moments throughout the trial of more than four months.

Lay and Skilling entered the trial with a claim that shocked many: Not only were they innocent of wrongdoing, no fraud at all occurred at Enron. Skilling boiled it down with a statement at the end of his 7 1/2 days of grueling testimony:

"We are innocent. By 'we' I mean Enron Corp.," he said.

Prosecutors knew going in that both defendants would seek to exonerate not only themselves, but the company as well. Lay forecast that approach in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders in mid-December, while Skilling's legal team used a court filing to signal their intent.

But Enron fell so precipitously into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 from being the nation's seventh-largest company the year before that something had to be rotten, whether Lay and Skilling knew about it or not.

The government sought to show that rot, and how Lay and Skilling led an effort to hide it — a conclusion both continue to vehemently deny as they vow to appeal their convictions.

It wasn't easy. No one sat around a table in a dark, smoke-filled room and brazenly stated that they would commit crimes to fool investors into believing Enron deserved its powerhouse image.

No one even typed a memo, dashed off an e-mail or left a phone message indicating criminal intent, leaving prosecutors with little hard evidence.

Prosecutors presented their case like it was built over four years — brick by brick — with much emphasis on testimony from former executives who pleaded guilty to crimes rather than face their own trials, convictions and lengthy prison terms.

Those division heads and others said they felt pressure — tangible or intangible — from Skilling and Lay to meet earnings targets or mask bad news at any cost and to maintain Wall Street's adoration.

The government also painstakingly worked to present its cadre of 25 witnesses as an ensemble cast without any stars, to be seen as a whole.

The media eagerly touted the testimony of former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, but his testimony was in the end no more important than that of other ex-executives. De-emphasizing the importance of the man held responsible for forging schemes that helped sink Enron was among the prosecution's smartest moves.

Fastow was an easy target for the defense. He roped his wife into his crimes. He likely could have prevented her from being indicted had he cut a deal with prosecutors within six months of being indicted himself, much as junk-bond pioneer Michael Milken copped a plea to keep the government from charging his brother.

Fastow endured his first public flogging during four days of brutal testimony and cross examination. He laid bare his shame. He never minimized his culpability and greed. And he insisted he and Skilling "committed crimes together," and Lay knew disaster was imminent in the fall of 2001 when he claimed publicly that Enron was fundamentally strong.

The key was, others provided equally damaging testimony about how Lay and Skilling knew Enron wasn't what it purported to be thanks to smoke and mirrors that masqueraded as proper accounting.

Those included former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. Now federal inmate No. 20293-179, Glisan is in prison for crafting fraudulent financial structures Enron used to hide losses and bad investments — structures Lay and Skilling insisted were proper.

But others with no criminal taint added fuel to the prosecution's fire. Vince Kaminski, a former top risk analyst whom Skilling respected, said the ex-CEO swept him and his staff from a risk assessment squad, complaining they acted too much like "cops" rather than deal facilitators.

Then came the defendants, the stars among the defense's 29 witnesses. Observers expected Skilling to live up to his reputation for being temperamental and abrasive, but it was Lay who bickered and bristled, even with his own lawyer.

Lay, known for making pious-sounding religious references, arrogantly defended his extravagant lifestyle, including a $200,000 yacht for wife Linda's birthday party, despite $100 million in personal debt.

"It was difficult to turn off that lifestyle like a spigot," Lay said.

Lay, a local mover-and-shaker dubbed "Kenny Boy" by President Bush, once told prosecutor John Hueston that Enron's "corpse was on the gurney" for the government to carve up.

Lay was convicted on all counts, while Skilling was acquitted on nine insider trading charges stemming from trades of Enron stock he made in 2000. The ex-CEO was convicted on 19 other counts of fraud, conspiracy, lying to auditors and insider trading.

"This whole thing of saying there was nothing wrong at Enron, it just strains the imagination," said Gary Brown, former special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs in its investigation of Enron's December 2001 crash.

Sam Buell, a former federal prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who secured the indictment against Skilling, said the government had witnesses from myriad units — trading, finance, broadband, investor relations and retail energy — who told a story that hung together when viewed as a whole.

"I think the defense probably felt they just couldn't deviate from the playbook that says you have to give the jury an affirmative story of your own that explains the whole case — that it would be too risky just to play defense and poke holes in the government's case," Buell said.

However, the story that the government witnesses were liars or misunderstood what they thought was sinister "just wasn't plausible and undermined the credibility of everything they did and said," Buell said.

Jurors said they acquitted Skilling on the nine insider trading counts for lack of evidence. But they said when viewed overall, the government's case — despite its lack of hard evidence beyond the word of witnesses — pointed to the pair's guilt.

Enron Trial May Encourage Businesses To Adopt Low-risk Strategies (KRT)

By Greg Burns

Knight Ridder, May 26, 2006

CHICAGO - So much for the bold defense of Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling.

The pair was convicted Thursday by federal jurors who listened to both former Enron Corp. executives spin a tale from the witness stand about a truly great company that was sadly misunderstood.

From the start, legal observers questioned the strategy of promoting Enron as a "shining star," since the rest of the world concluded long ago it had been misled about the one-time Houston energy giant.

Former insiders cooperating with the government swore under oath that the company had lost its moral bearings and manipulated its financial results to deceive a gullible public.

The outcome of the case, with Skilling and Lay facing long prison terms, is likely to encourage future corporate executives targeted in criminal investigations to adopt a lower-risk approach, some legal experts predict.

The convictions underscore the conventional wisdom among defense attorneys that testifying at trial is among the most perilous steps for any criminal defendant, even the polished and educated.

They also suggest that convincing a jury of a completely different story than the one advanced by the government is especially tough in complex corporate fraud.

The Enron defendants "felt they had to roll the dice on the `Big Sell,' because the traditional defenses were going to be met with great skepticism," said David Yellen, dean of the Loyola University law school in Chicago.

Merely saying, "We made mistakes, but they weren't criminal," or, "We didn't know about the fraud," would have been insufficient in this case, Yellen explained.

Yet by attempting to "shoot the moon" with their description of a wonderful company brought low by a "run on the bank" through no fault of theirs, the Enron defendants eroded some of their best defenses, said Samuel Buell, a former prosecutor on the government's Enron Task Force now teaching at the University of Texas law school.

"That undermines the credibility of even the good stuff you've got for poking holes in the government's case," he said. "It was highly risky."

The Enron prosecution was by no means a slam dunk for the Justice Department, despite public expectations that the former corporate leaders would be convicted. It lacked a blockbuster witness, or "smoking gun" evidence tying the defendants conclusively to the fraud.

Lay and Skilling were consistent in maintaining they not only did nothing wrong, but also almost everything right. Apart from their decision to waive conflict-of-interest rules for their corrupt finance chief, Andrew Fastow, the pair aggressively defended their time at the top of the ill-fated company.

On direct examination, as they described Enron's glory days, it almost seemed they wanted the poker-faced jurors to burst into applause. Then on cross-examination, Lay all but snarled at the prosecutor questioning him, while Skilling lurched between near-perfect recall of certain events and sudden amnesia about others.

The pair should have admitted more faults and errors, said Brian Wice, a Houston defense attorney who followed the trial. "You can't come in with a stiff neck and say, `I'm perfect,'" he said. "For these guys, it not only was business, it was personal, and that's a mistake. They wanted to be vindicated."

Asked on the day the jury began its deliberations if his client sought redemption, not just acquittal, Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, replied, "That's very true. Very true."

Daniel Petrocelli, who represented Skilling, said the defense needed to knock down the preconceptions of jurors steeped in years of adverse publicity about Enron.

Skilling sought redemption "only to the extent it was needed to unlock jurors' minds," Petrocelli said. "It's not an ego thing. It's really to undo these perceptions."

The defendants' campaign for absolution began immediately after Enron collapsed. Although Lay refused to testify before Congress, taking a pounding in grim silence, Skilling talked and talked.

He shared a witness table with Sherron Watkins, the Enron whistleblower who would testify against him and Lay at their criminal trial, presenting the "run on the bank" defense that became his most prominent theme.

That impulse to blame the victims for their lack of faith in the company carried through to the trial. Far from bringing down a thriving enterprise, the "run" on Enron revealed the house of cards it had become, prosecutors pointed out to the jury. Enron lacked the wherewithal to raise enough cash to keep its operations going, even long enough to sell it at a bargain price.

The defense was seeking to "defuse the notion that this was a business that was rotten to the core from start to finish," said Buell. "Obviously, certain parts of the business were successful. That's beside the point. They had to explain how the collapse of Enron happened. It didn't work because the story was just implausible."

Symbol Of An Era Lay, Skilling Are Convicted Of Fraud (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller, Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- The convictions of former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth Lay1 and former president Jeffrey Skilling2 decimated their high-stakes argument that Enron was a law-abiding company done in by newspaper reports, short-sellers and market panic. The jury3's decision cemented the once-highflying energy company's legacy as one of the most egregious corporate offenders of the 1990s.

The verdicts yesterday against both men on numerous federal fraud and conspiracy charges cap a string of prosecutions in which hundreds of senior corporate executives at numerous companies have been held accountable for wrongdoing on their watches. 4

Once viewed as one of the biggest business success stories of the 1990s, Enron collapsed in 2001, the first of a string of corporate scandals. Its fall marked a dramatic end to the stock-market boom and the beginning of a wave of corporate and regulatory reforms, including the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law.

Juror Kathy Harrison, an elementary-school teacher, said after the verdicts that she hoped executives at other companies would realize that "those in charge have responsibility. There's too much hurt here. If something good can come out, companies can be aware that they must be conscientious." (Read more reactions5 to the verdicts.)

After delivering their verdicts, the Enron jurors said they had focused partly on the credibility of the two former executives. In a risky legal strategy, both men had argued that no crimes were committed at Enron, apart from a few largely irrelevant ones involving former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow6. Messrs. Lay and Skilling both testified during the trial, and both faced withering cross-examinations by prosecutors.

Judge Sim Lake7 read the string of guilty verdicts in a packed courtroom. Both defendants stood calmly as family members gasped and some began to sob.

Mr. Skilling, 52 years old, was convicted on 19 of 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading. He was acquitted on nine counts of insider trading. Mr. Lay, 64, was convicted on all six conspiracy and fraud counts he faced. After reading the jury verdicts, Judge Lake also found Mr. Lay guilty of all four counts in a separate banking-fraud case heard by the judge while the jury was deliberating.

After the verdicts were announced, Mr. Lay joined more than a dozen friends and family members in a circle in one corner of the courtroom to pray. One of Mr. Lay's supporters, Rev. Bill Lawson, could be heard invoking the story of Jesus, "who was convicted and even executed," he said.

"We'll all come through this stronger," said Mr. Lay, occasionally tugging at the hand of his wife, Linda, who had sat through the entire four-month trial. Later, Mr. Lawson said he advised Mr. Lay "to hang in there and trust God."

In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Skilling said that when he was pronounced guilty on the first count of conspiracy, "that floored me. God, there was no conspiracy." He said that the relatively short jury deliberations had raised his hopes. But "we were just on a tilted football field," he said, referring to going on trial in Enron's headquarters city.

The convictions came despite Messrs. Lay and Skilling putting on one of the most expensive criminal defenses ever, spending an estimated $60 million. Both men remain free pending sentencing, which is set for Sept. 11. Each faces many years in prison.

Attorneys for both men said they would appeal the verdicts, which came on the sixth day of jury deliberations that many observers had expected to stretch for weeks. The verdict "doesn't change our view of what happened at Enron, or of Jeff Skilling's innocence," said a clearly upset Daniel Petrocelli16, Mr. Skilling's lead lawyer. "We told our story and the jury disagreed with it."

At a press conference after the verdicts, several jurors said that government witnesses, many of them former Enron executives testifying as part of plea bargains, had convinced them that illegal activities had occurred at Enron, and that the defendants were responsible.

Defense lawyers had decided to put both Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay on the stand. "I wanted badly to believe what they were saying," said juror Wendy Vaughan, a small-business owner. But "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned," she said.

"Both men said they had their hands firmly on the wheel" of the company, said another juror, elementary-school principal Freddy Delgado. For the two executives to later claim they didn't know about wrongdoing, said Mr. Delgado, was "not the right thing."

During the trial, defense attorneys repeatedly portrayed Enron as a fundamentally healthy and successful business. It was destroyed, they claimed, by irresponsible news articles in The Wall Street Journal and the manipulative stock-market activities of traders looking to profit from the company's declining share price. The political and media furor that followed Enron's collapse, they argued, caused the government to search for crimes where none existed. "This is not a case of 'Hear no evil, see no evil,'" Mr. Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead attorney, told the jury during his opening argument in early February. "This is a case of 'There was no evil.'"

In his closing argument earlier this month, Mr. Petrocelli told jurors that if they accepted the government's definitions of corporate wrongdoing, "we might as well put every CEO in jail."

The defense differed markedly from those used in the trials of former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers and former HealthSouth Corp. boss Richard Scrushy. Those defendants acknowledged that financial crimes had occurred, but said the wrongdoing had been hidden from them. Mr. Ebbers was convicted; Mr. Scrushy was acquitted.

Some Enron jurors said they were bothered by Mr. Lay's stock sales. Mr. Lay quietly sold about $70 million of Enron stock back to the company, some of it as Enron's financial crisis worsened in 2001. He did not have to publicly report those transactions for up to a year.

Juror Don Martin, an electrical designer, said the stock sales "defined the word 'intent.'" Mr. Delgado, another juror, said the sales reflected "the character of the person." Deborah Smith, the forewoman of the Enron jury, said she hoped that federal regulators would tighten rules governing how executives report stock sales.

Some jurors also said they rejected defense arguments that former Enron executives testifying for the government as part of plea bargains were lying to win leniency from prosecutors. Mr. Martin said that in spite of their incentives to cooperate with prosecutors, "it was hard not to lend credence to their testimony." Mr. Delgado, the school principal, added that "even if the government twisted their arms, you can not get everyone to say the same thing."

Detailed Notes

Jurors cited testimony by Enron's former treasurer, Ben Glisan, Jr.17, the only witness currently in prison for an Enron-related crime. Mr. Glisan had knowledge of Enron's finances and kept detailed notes of some key meetings. "We kept going back to Mr. Glisan's testimony to corroborate things," said Mr. Delgado, the school principal.

In a telephone interview, juror Douglas Baggett said that outside partnerships run by Mr. Fastow, the former financial officer, contributed to the jury's decision to convict. The government said that the partnerships, known as LJM118 and LJM2, had been used to manipulate Enron's reported financial results. Mr. Baggett called the partnerships "the first domino....Most every one of the counts went back to LJM." While the defense attacked Mr. Fastow for stealing money from Enron, it defended the company's transactions with LJM as proper.

Several jurors said they wished other witnesses had been called, particularly former Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey19. Mr. Causey's name came up repeatedly during the trial as someone deeply involved in the company's most controversial financial transactions. He had been a co-defendant in the case, but in December pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud. Both the government and the defense considered calling him to the stand, but both apparently decided the risks were too great.

Mr. Causey "could have linked a lot more things together," said Mr. Baggett, the juror. But Ms. Smith, the jury's forewoman, said she didn't think his appearance "would have changed the verdicts."

The defense had frequently expressed concern that the overwhelmingly negative news coverage of Enron's collapse had tainted the jury pool here in Enron's hometown. Judge Lake's refusal to move the trial out of Houston is seen as a major issue in the expected appeal.

During questioning of potential jurors prior to the trial, one who wound up on the jury said he felt something had gone wrong at Enron, and described the two defendants as "greedy," though he added that wasn't a crime.

Some jurors said yesterday that they went into the case sympathetic to both Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. "In all honesty, at the very beginning of the trial, I admired both men," said Ms. Vaughan. "I thought they were brilliant."

Jurors said their opinions shifted under the weight of the evidence and because of the defendants' demeanor on the witness stand. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seemed "very controlling people at times," said Mr. Baggett, noting that at times they were "even telling their attorneys what to do" from the witness stand.

Mr. Lay's testimony was hampered by the absence of his lead attorney, Michael Ramsey20, for much of the trial due to health problems.

Defense lawyers had emphasized Mr. Lay's extensive civic involvement in Houston. Jurors said that didn't influence their decision. In his civic and charitable activities, "he was a very magnanimous person," said Mr. Martin. "He gave and donated a lot of money. But when he went into the company, he was a different person entirely."

Prosecutors argued that by 1999, Enron had begun to live a lie. To the public, it seemed one of the decade's great business success stories. Wall Street loved Enron, and the company's share price soared even by the inflated standards of the 1990s stock-market boom. Mr. Lay regularly rubbed shoulders with national and world leaders, including President Bush, who sometimes referred to him as "Kenny Boy."

Big Institutions Snared

Enron's 2001 collapse led to the demise of Arthur Andersen LLP, the company's outside auditor, and snared some of the nation's biggest financial institutions, including Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Merrill Lynch & Co., in litigation and regulatory actions.

It also sparked a raft of investigations, including a federal criminal probe by a specially created Enron Task Force. To date, the Task Force has filed criminal charges against 33 individuals and obtained guilty pleas or convictions against 23 of them, including Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

The case against Enron's only two chief executives prior to the bankruptcy was the Task Force's most critical. Both had made tens of millions of dollars while at Enron. Mr. Skilling allocated $40 million to his defense, a little less than half of it coming from Enron officers' liability insurance. Mr. Petrocelli, his lawyer, said all of that money had been spent before the trial began. Mr. Lay is estimated to have gone through more than $20 million. On most days, each defendant had at least a half-dozen attorneys in court. The government used a like number.

Despite the huge defense effort, the two men couldn't overcome major questions about what happened at Enron. Jurors said they didn't buy the defense argument that the LJM partnerships were legitimate outside entities that gave Enron additional financing flexibility. It appears that they didn't accept Mr. Skilling's insistence that he had quit as chief executive in August 2001, after only six months on the job, for personal reasons that had nothing to do with the company's health, which he and Mr. Lay declared at the time to be excellent. The company collapsed less than four months after he departed.

Jurors said that they were convinced that Enron had serious problems in 2001, and that defendants had to have known that when they publicly portrayed the company as healthy and growing. "There were red flags everywhere" about the company's problems, said Mr. Baggett. He cited internal company surveys, emails and the testimony of Mr. Glisan, the former treasurer, who said he had warned Mr. Lay in the fall of 2001 about a pending liquidity crisis.

The jury acquitted Mr. Skilling on nine of the ten insider-trading charges against him. Jurors said there was reasonable doubt on most of the insider-trading counts. Ms. Smith, the jury forewoman, added: "Not guilty equals not proven. It does not equal innocence."

The sole insider-trading conviction involved Mr. Skilling's most controversial stock sale: a $15 million transaction on Sept. 17, 2001, involving 500,000 shares of Enron stock. Mr. Skilling had told federal securities regulators in 2001, only days after Enron's bankruptcy filing, that he made the sale only because of concerns about the general economy following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Prosecutors discovered that Mr. Skilling had attempted to sell 200,000 Enron shares a few days before those attacks. They used that fact to pound his credibility.

"Mr. Skilling used our nation's tragedy to cover his tracks," prosecutor Sean Berkowitz told the jury in his closing argument. "That's offensive and you shouldn't let him get away with it."

Enron Pair Found Guilty (TIMES)

By James Doran, Wall Street Correspondent

Times (UK), May 26, 2006

Former chief executive vows to fight verdict 'I'm still a blessed man,' says founder

KENNETH LAY, the founder of Enron, and Jeffrey Skilling, his former chief executive, face long terms in jail after a jury last night found the pair guilty of conspiring to commit one of the biggest frauds in US corporate history.

Lay, 64, was found guilty in a courthouse in Houston, Texas, on all six charges of fraud and conspiracy against him in the Enron case. He was also found guilty of four separate bank fraud charges that were heard in a trial without a jury.

He faces a maximum jail sentence of 165 years if given the full term for each guilty verdict.

Skilling, 52, was found guilty of 19 counts, carrying a maximum jail term of 185 years. He was found not guilty of a further nine charges of insider trading.

Judge Sim Lake, who presided over both the jury and non-jury trials, asked the pair to return to court on September 11 for sentencing. Legal experts expect both men to be sent to a medium- security facility for between 12 and 20 years, which — for Lay at least — could be a de facto life sentence.

Judge Lake asked Lay to surrender his passport. Lay signed documents in court to secure his $5 million bond with properties owned by his wife and children. He was also restricted from travelling outside the southern judicial district of Texas or Colorado. Skilling had previously submitted a $5 million bond.

Skilling looked down as the verdict was read. Lay sighed heavily and shook his head as his wife, Linda, took his arm.

Skilling, in a dark suit, white shirt and purple tie, appeared outside the court immediately to announce his decision to lodge an appeal. “Obviously, I am disappointed, but that is the way the system works,” Skilling said.

Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling’s lawyer, said that the verdict “doesn’t change our view of what happened at Enron . . . or Jeffrey Skilling’s innocence.”

Legal experts said, however, that the likelihood of a successful appeal was slim because the jury had obviously considered each count in turn, rather than returning a blanket decision.

Outside court after the verdict, Lay spoke to a jeering crowd that was kept at bay by several mounted police officers. He said that he was disappointed with the outcome, but, in an outpouring of his religious faith, added: “Despite this, I am still a very blessed man.”

Lay joined in a prayer circle being led near the courthouse by Steve Wende, his close friend and pastor of the largest Methodist church in Houston. Lay’s family wept as the former Enron boss said: “God has got another plan right now.”

Jurors who spoke to the media after the verdict was read said that the evidence of Ben Glisan, a former Enron treasurer, had been pivotal. One juror, Wendy Vaughan, a small business owner, said that the testimony of Lay and Skilling, who each spent a week on the witness stand, led her to return a guilty verdict. “There were pieces in the testimony where I felt their character was questioned,” she said.

The guilty verdicts mark the most significant victory yet for the US Justice Department in its fight against corporate crime. The Enron affair raised the curtain on an era of corporate scandals in the US in which dozens of executives have been convicted.

Legal Observers Divided On Odds Of Successful Appeal In Enron Case (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Texas Lawyer, May 26, 2006

Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling spent many years getting their way in the business world, but in the courtroom, where it really counted, the men and their skilled defense lawyers could not sway a jury hearing criminal charges against them.

On Thursday, a federal court jury in Houston found Lay guilty of all six criminal charges against him and found Skilling guilty of 19 of 28 charges against him. The jury found Skilling not guilty of nine insider-trading charges.

The jury's verdict sends an "unmistakable message" to corporate America, prosecutor Sean Berkowitz, director of the Enron Task Force, said after the verdict.

"You can't lie to shareholders," Berkowitz, an Assistant U.S. Attorney, told reporters shortly after the jury verdict was announced on Thursday.

"No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules," he said.

Fellow task force prosecutor John Hueston spoke similarly: "The jury has spoken. CEOs can't hide behind accountants, can't hide behind lawyers."

The jury of eight women and four men returned their verdict at 11 a.m. on Tuesday, in their sixth day of deliberations.

The verdict came in the 17th week of proceedings in the trial, which received considerable U.S. and international coverage. Enron, once the nation's seventh highest-grossing company, filed for bankruptcy in December 2001.

The breakdown of the verdict is as follows. The Houston jury found Skilling guilty on one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud; 12 counts of securities fraud; five counts of making false statements to auditors; and one count of insider trading. Jurors found Lay guilty of one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud; two counts of wire fraud for making false and misleading statements; and three counts of securities fraud.

Upon hearing the verdict, Skilling showed little emotion. Lay's daughter and wife cried as the verdict was read.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake set sentencing for Sept. 11. Berkowitz declined to say what kind of a sentence the government would seek for Lay and Skilling.

Skilling was one of the first people out of the courtroom after Lake excused the jury. Lay couldn't leave the courthouse until after he surrendered his passport and he and his family put up enough assets to back a $5 million bond. Lay and his wife, Linda, and three of his children put up deeds to property to secure the bond.

Outside the courthouse in downtown Houston, both Skilling and Lay continued to proclaim their innocence.

Lay said he was surprised and shocked by the verdict but that he is blessed by the support of a loving family and friends.

He spoke of his faith in God: "Indeed He does work all things for the good, for those who love the Lord."

Attorneys for Lay, including lead defense lawyer Michael Ramsey, a solo practitioner in Houston, did not comment on the verdict.

Skilling's lead defense lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, a partner in O'Melveny & Myers in Century City, Calif., answered questions at the courthouse with Skilling at his side. Both men looked tired.

"We've just begun the fight," Petrocelli told reporters, later adding, "We will have a full and vigorous appeal." Asked about how he would proceed with the appeal, Petrocelli said, "I'm going to sit down and take a look at everything."

About the jury, he said, "They gave it five full days, and they saw it their way."

Petrocelli impressed juror Freddy Delgado. Delgado said, "If I was ever a defendant, I would go with Mr. Petrocelli."

After the verdict, Delgado and the other 11 jurors as well as three of the four alternates met with reporters. Forewoman Deborah Smith, who works in human resources at a large oilfield services company, said jurors didn't have a target date to reach a verdict; they were prepared to stay as long as it took.

Delgado, an elementary school principal, said, "We looked at all the facts and looked at the documents, put in long, long hours."

Jurors said they were not bothered by the fact that many of the government's witnesses had struck plea deals.

One of those government witnesses was Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer.

"Fastow was Fastow," juror Don Martin said about the testimony of the former CFO, who pleaded guilty to two criminal charges and admitted on the witness stand that he stole from Enron. "We knew where he was coming from from the outset. We kind of discounted some of it."

Juror Doug Baggett said the jury listened to and considered the testimony of every witness. "We figured they were all there for a reason," he said.

Forewoman Smith and Baggett said the jury found Skilling not guilty of nine of the 10 insider-trading charges against him, because the government didn't bring enough evidence to the table to convict him of the charges. Smith noted that not guilty does not mean innocent.

One juror, Wendy Vaughn, said, "At the very beginning of the trial, I admired both men. ... It was sad to see that, in the end, it [the success of Enron] was not accomplished in a respectful manner."

Juror Kathy Harrison said of Skilling: "He was a hands-on individual. It was hard to believe such a hands-on individual would not know what was going on in the company." She later added, "Mr. Lay did many great things, but all this is a tragedy. ... No American is above the law."

DOJ_NMG_0029909

Jurors said they didn't know why former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey didn't testify, and they wish he would have. Baggett said, "To me, he was a missing link." However, Smith said Causey's testimony wouldn't have changed the verdict.

Causey was a defendant in the case alongside Lay and Skilling, but he struck a plea deal with prosecutors in December 2005.

Lake presided over the 16-week jury trial, held in the Bob Casey U.S. Courthouse, located just a few blocks from the 50-story Enron Center skyscraper where Lay and Skilling once reigned as powerful executives.

In the jury trial, prosecutors alleged Lay and Skilling participated in a conspiracy to misrepresent the true financial condition of Enron.

The indictment in United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al. alleged Lay and Skilling "engaged in a wide-ranging scheme" to deceive investors, including Enron shareholders and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, about the true performance of Enron by manipulating public financial reports, making "false and misleading" public statements about the company's financial performance, and failing to disclose facts that would make those statements and representations fair and accurate.

Lay and Skilling had pleaded not guilty. They blamed Enron's problems on criminal acts by Fastow.

In 2004, Fastow pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud.

Also on Thursday, following a separate bench trial that began on May 18 and ended on Tuesday, Lake found Lay guilty of four bank fraud charges.

In 2005, Lay had asked for a separate trial from Skilling, but Lake only granted a separate trial on the bank fraud charges.

Lay was accused of violating a federal banking regulatory rule by using up to $75 million in loans from Bank of America, Chase Bank of Texas and Compass Bank, from 1999 to 2001, to buy stock.

According to the indictment, Lay signed loan forms known as Forms U-1, which would require him to state that he will not use loan proceeds to buy stock on margin. But the indictment in United States v. Jeffrey K. Skilling, et al. alleged he did so.

"WILLFUL BLINDNESS" INSTRUCTION

Joel Androphy, a partner in Berg & Androphy in Houston who has watched most of the trial, says he gives Skilling -- unlike Lay -- reasonable odds at a successful appeal.

Androphy says Lake's instructions to the jurors will help Skilling's appeal. Androphy believes the evidence was not sufficient against Skilling to justify the judge's instructions that the jurors should consider "willful blindness." The government had laid out a case against Lay that he specifically avoided learning details but not so against Skilling.

Androphy says two government witnesses were extremely important to the prosecutors' case: Ben Glisan, the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty in 2003 to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison term, and Mark Koenig, the former head of investor relations at Enron who has pleaded guilty to aiding securities fraud at Enron.

Androphy's assessment is the jurors put little stock in the defense's arguments that the government's witnesses were tainted by deals they cut with prosecutors to avoid jail time.

"Jurors are becoming immune to witnesses making government deals. That should send shock waves to criminal lawyers all over the country," Androphy says.

Dan Cogdell, of the Cogdell Law Firm in Houston, watched the trial with the perspective of a lawyer who won the only acquittal for a defendant in an Enron case. Cogdell won an acquittal in 2004 for Sheila Kahanek, a former Enron employee who was charged in United States v. Daniel Bayly, et al., the so-called Nigerian Barge trial. A federal court jury in Houston found Kahanek not guilty of charges of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and to falsify books and records.

About the Lay and Skilling verdicts, Cogdell says, "I am surprised that there were blanket convictions." For such a long case, he says, the jury deliberated for a very short period of time.

Like Androphy, Cogdell too believes that the judge's instructions to the jury to consider "willful blindness" hurt the defense significantly. He does not believe, however, in any likelihood for a successful appeal for Skilling or Lay. He notes that the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals does not often reverse Lake. Moreover, Cogdell says, during the time he spent at the trial, Lake appeared to be bending over backward to give a fair trial to the defendants.

Thomas Ajamie of Ajamie LLP in Houston also believes a successful appeal of the verdicts is unlikely for Lay or Skilling. "Sim Lake is a very careful, methodical judge. He knows this case is being watched very carefully," says Ajamie.

Ajamie does not believe that the medical issues that forced Lay's lead lawyer Michael Ramsey to leave the trial had a significant impact on the outcome. "Ramsey is a great lawyer. But I'm not sure that the Lord himself could have turned these facts around. A Mack truck coming at you at 100 miles an hour is a hard thing to stop."

Lay himself hurt his case, Ajamie says. "He was terrible witness. I came away thinking he is a bad person. He wasn't forthright. But he was clearly a man who was in control."

Philip Hilder, a Houston criminal defense attorney who represented former Enron executive and prosecution witness Sherron Watkins, says the verdict was a "stunning victory" for the Enron Task Force.

"Jurors rarely come back as quickly as this one did in such a complicated case," Hilder says. "The legacy of the Task Force will be defined by this."

But juror Vaughn, a business owner, told reporters that due to expected appeals by Lay and Skilling, "I don't think it's over."

She said, "Will justice really prevail? Will the almighty dollar prevail again? We'll see."

Justice Department, White House React To Verdict (HC)

By Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

In Washington, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called the verdict a triumph for the Justice Department, and the federal Enron task force that was created in late 2001.

"Lay, Skilling and their numerous coconspirators perpetrated an elaborate scheme to mislead analysts and investors about Enron's true financial picture. Their efforts to mislead the markets were protracted, deliberate and dishonest," McNulty said. "At a time when the company was foundering, these defendants perpetrated a lie that Enron was a robust and growing company in the strongest financial condition it had ever been in. And as they knew, the truth was something very different."

He added, "The message of today's verdict is simple: Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who had recused himself from the Enron investigation because of corporate donations he received as a Texas judge, did not comment.

But McNulty lauded the work of a task force he said, "worked thousands and thousands of hours. They've gone over millions of pages of documents. They have devoted years of their professional life, sacrificing time from families, all in the effort to try to hold individuals accountable for corruption."

McNulty left without responding to shouted reporter's questions.

White House spokesman Tony Snow made brief comments about Enron during a scheduled press briefing that coincided with the jury's verdict.

"My only comment is that the Justice Department -- you know, we congratulate the Justice Department on successfully concluding a highly complex set of legal proceedings that led to the convictions today in the Enron case," Snow said. "The administration's been pretty clear there's no tolerance for corporate corruption. And furthermore, the Justice Department has been going aggressively after those who are involved in corporate corruption."

Asked if President Bush favored a compensation program for Enron victims, Snow said, "I honestly don't know."

Bush did not directly respond to Enron, and there was no hint of the company's name in a glowing statement he issued early Wednesday afternoon on the state of the economy: "America's economy is on the fast track. Today's revised report by the Commerce Department indicates our economy grew at 5.3 percent for the first quarter of this year. That is the fastest growth in two-and-half years and another clear sign that our economy is powerful, productive, and prosperous," Bush said.

Guilty Verdict Will Embolden Prosecutors (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

The conviction of Ken Lay and Jeffrey Skilling is the successful culmination of a legal strategy Department of Justice prosecutors have been fine tuning since the day, in 2001, when Enron, one of America's most respected companies, collapsed under the weight of a massive fraud.

That strategy called on law enforcement officials to indict and seek the conviction of chief executives of companies on fraud charges – often involving complex accounting schemes – even if there was little or no solid evidence that the executives intended to commit a crime or even knew the fraud existed.

In the case of Enron, says Michael Missal, a former attorney at the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart, the verdict will further embolden prosecutors to "go after the people at the very top", holding them responsible for wrongdoing at the companies they ran.

"If you look at what they were charged on, Ken Lay's fingerprints weren't on it – except that he knew the company wasn't in good shape and he lied about it," says Mr Missal.

Dan Small, a litigation strategy expert at the law firm of Duane Morris, also believes the victory will rejuvenate the justice department at a time when, he says, the legal community has been wondering whether momentum of prosecuting corporate fraud has slowed down.

"There will be a sense among other executives that if Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling couldn't pull it off, who can?" he says.

But one former senior counsel at the justice department disagrees. Timothy Coleman, an attorney at Dewey Ballantine, says the guilty verdict represents the end of an era that began and ends with Enron and that the political forces that put aggressive prosecution of white collar crime at the top of law enforcement's agenda will now subside.

"The government will continue to bring high-profile corporate fraud cases, but we are now entering a period of retrenchment and re-examination," Mr Coleman says.

He believes that the fact that the government is increasingly coming under fire for its tactics, including on issues involving waiver of attorney-client privilege and corporate payment of executives' attorneys fees, is evidence that the pendulum is swinging away from aggressive enforcement "in the court of public opinion".

Whether prosecutors continue to pursue indictments against executives as aggressively as they have in the era of Enron or not, the jury's decision proves that the justice department was capable of securing a conviction on a case that was exceedingly complex.

Columbia University Law School's John Coffee, an expert in securities law, says the government succeeded because it learned to follow what he calls the "kiss" rule: Keep It Simple, Stupid.

"[The jury's decision] shows that you can convict in a complicated factual case that resembles a Russian novel," Mr Coffee says.

Stephen Cutler, the former head of enforcement at the SEC, says the decision to "streamline" the case also proved how far prosecutors had come since the early white collar crime trials, such as the first trial of Tyco's Dennis Kozlowski, which ended in a mistrial and was seen as having been presented to the jury in an overly complicated way by prosecutors.

"It is essential in these type of cases to boil it down to credibility. In this case, they boiled it down to: do you believe these men?" says Mr Small of Duane Morris.

He contends that the conviction was at least as much the result of defence errors as prosecution brilliance.

"The defence badly oversold the case: they went so far as to say there was no fraud against Enron; that's a bad mistake," he says. "They didn't have to do that."

It also proved that the "ostrich defence" of claiming ignorance – a strategy similarly used by WorldCom's former chief executive Bernie Ebbers – is one of which juries are sceptical.

"These are people who have spent their lives promoting themselves as masters of the universe, and suddenly to come into court and say they couldn't find the executive washroom without help – which was essentially the defence here – that's a very tough sell," says Mr Small.

Guilty Verdicts Provide 'Red Meat' To Prosecutors Chasing Companies (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The convictions of former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 culminate a crackdown on turn-of-the-century corporate malfeasance. They also will likely embolden the government to continue its campaign.

When it collapsed nearly five years ago, Enron became synonymous with executive wrongdoing. Since then, authorities have obtained convictions or guilty pleas on fraud and other charges against hundreds of corporate bigwigs, and lawmakers have imposed tough new regulations. While some business leaders brand these measures excessive, particularly the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, few oppose prosecution of corporate misdeeds.

Yesterday's convictions serve as a reminder that while the economic and stock-market booms of the 1990s were among the greatest in history, they were tainted by greed and fraud. "We all get distracted by the benefits that flow from these great market advances when it's climbing up," said Robert Morvillo, a veteran defense attorney. "The distraction seems to have to await a seriously jarring issue when somebody gets hurt. Enron is a prime example of when people got hurt."

Messrs. Lay and Skilling now join a list of once-high-flying executives brought low. Among them: Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas; Tyco International Ltd. Chief Executive Officer L. Dennis Kozlowski; and former WorldCom Inc. CEO Bernard Ebbers.

With the Enron verdicts, those favoring aggressive tactics to protect shareholders and others have reason to feel energized, their stance endorsed in a landmark trial by a jury of 12 citizens. "Our criminal laws will be enforced just as vigorously against corporate executives as they will street criminals," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said. "This verdict encourages us -- it encourages us to continue to combat corruption wherever we find it."

And George Stamboulidis, a former federal prosecutor, said: "I am confident that prosecutors have cases in the hopper ready to go." The Enron trial may provide a general template for future enforcement in complex accounting cases, though no two scandals are alike. In some previous trials involving complicated financial matters, prosecutors took a kitchen-sink approach, piling on arcane accounting evidence. Enron prosecutors took a simpler approach, reducing the risk that jurors would feel overwhelmed.

"Prosecutors have tasted the red meat," said Roman Darmer, another former federal prosecutor. "They have shown they know how to win these cases, and they now have more tools to work with."

A defeat for prosecutors would have provided fodder for the incipient pro-business backlash, which so far has had only limited success. "This may be the end of a case that came to symbolize the wave of corporate scandals, but by no means does this signal the end to investigators," said Arthur Jakoby, a defense attorney who used to work for the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Flood of Accusations

The bursting of the stock-market bubble in 2000 was followed by a surge of accusations that executives used accounting shenanigans to artificially improve results, otherwise defrauded shareholders or improperly enriched themselves. As companies collapsed, investors lost untold sums, and tens of thousands of employees lost jobs. Class-action securities lawyers won billions of dollars in settlements against the companies involved and their investment bankers and accountants.

Enron, a giant Houston-based energy-trading company, was among the biggest and the first to go under, filing for bankruptcy protection in late 2001.

In January 2002, the Justice Department launched a criminal probe that led to yesterday's convictions of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, the latter a big supporter of President Bush. That July, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which stiffened corporate-governance and accounting rules, and President Bush created the Corporate Fraud Task Force in the Justice Department. Since then, the Department says it has secured more than 1,000 convictions or guilty pleas of corporate fraud, including cases against more than 200 chief executives, company presidents and chief financial officers.

The sentences handed down have been of a length unheard of during the 1980s insider-trading and saving-and-loan scandals. Adelphia's Mr. Rigas was sentenced to 15 years in prison; Tyco's Mr. Kozlowski, convicted in state court, was sentenced to 8? to 25 years; and WorldCom's Mr. Ebbers to 25 years.

Wall Street got sucked into the scandals, too. In 2003, the New York attorney general's office and the SEC reached a $1.4 billion civil settlement with major Wall Street firms after discovering emails revealing that the firms had misled investors with overly rosy stock-research reports, and that they enriched favored customers in doling out hot initial public offerings of stock.

Not all prosecutions succeeded. Former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy was acquitted in Birmingham, Ala., last June on all 36 counts he faced, including an alleged Sarbanes-Oxley violation. That decision followed a nearly six-month trial, including 21 days of deliberation -- a lesson likely not lost on prosecutors in the Enron trial, which lasted less than three months. (Mr. Scrushy has been on trial since May 1 on unrelated charges that he bribed Alabama's governor for a spot on a regulatory panel.)

Much of the backlash against the government's crackdown focuses on concerns that Sarbanes-Oxley imposes costly requirements at the expense of innovative risk-taking. The law's most controversial provision requires a company's management to gauge whether internal controls aimed at preventing improper accounting are sufficient, and requires independent auditors to test those controls.

Relax and Unwind

Some are pressing the SEC and Congress to unwind aspects of Sarbanes-Oxley. Republican lawmakers have introduced bills to lessen its impact on small businesses, but they face an uphill fight. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has promised to try to make Sarbanes-Oxley less costly, but his changes are unlikely to satisfy the law's critics.

A free-market group filed a lawsuit against the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, saying its creation under the law violates the Constitution. The plaintiffs plan to use the suit to open up the whole law for review.

In some cases, the backlash has succeeded. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce sued the SEC over a rule requiring that 75% of a mutual fund's board, including its chairman, be independent -- a regulation prompted in part by revelations about funds allowing some clients to make trades that cheated other clients. An appeals court last month returned the rule to the SEC for further consideration. And a hedge-fund adviser has sued the SEC over a rule that requires such advisers to register with the agency; that case is pending.

The most significant setback for authorities was a 2005 Supreme Court decision overturning the criminal conviction of accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP, which had been accused of impeding the probe of Enron, a client. The conviction put Andersen out of business, costing thousands of employees their jobs, so its reversal opened the government to heavy criticism over the decision to prosecute.

Since then, the Bush administration has shied away from indicting corporations. Yet on May 18, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a law firm that made an industry of suing companies on behalf of wronged shareholders, was indicted along with two partners on charges of funneling kickbacks to plaintiffs in dozens of class-action cases.

Prosecutors continue to use the threat of indictment to force companies to cooperate with investigators and to accept so-called deferred prosecution agreements. These impose requirements aimed at keeping companies honest -- including that they hire independent monitors -- and leave them vulnerable to swift conviction if they falter. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Computer Associates International Inc. (now CA Inc.) and other companies have accepted such agreements.

That tactic is in line with recommendations laid out in a controversial 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. It said federal prosecutors should consider indicting corporations if their executives and directors don't swiftly and voluntarily cooperate.

Business groups and defense lawyers have become increasingly critical of the government's methods, which include pressuring companies to waive attorney-client privilege and to stop paying legal fees for employees under scrutiny. Congress has held hearings on the matter, and the American Bar Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and others have pushed the Justice Department to lighten up.

"The government should not be in the position of saying, 'If you don't do X, Y and Z, then we are going to nuke you out of business,' " said Marc Mukasey, a former federal prosecutor.

Enron Task Force Had Rocky Path To Big Victory (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

HOUSTON -- The Enron Task Force's uneven record looks sharply improved after it scored big wins in its defining case yesterday with the convictions of former Chief Executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2.

The high-profile convictions cap a series of cases that have, so far, produced a mixed record for the Task Force. While it has won some crucial court battles and pleas, one of its other high-profile cases, a conviction of accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP, was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court. (Messrs. Lay and Skilling will appeal their cases.)

The Task Force, created in the wake of Enron's Dec. 2001 collapse into bankruptcy, has brought criminal charges against 33 people and 16 of them have pleaded guilty to Enron-related crimes. With yesterday's verdicts, prosecutors have won convictions against seven individuals, while one person has been acquitted. A trial of several former executives of Enron's high-speed telecommunications unit ended with no convictions and acquittals on numerous counts. The Task Force is retrying the defendants on the remaining counts in three separate trials. A jury verdict in one of those trials, held recently in the courtroom next to the Skilling-Lay case, could come any day.

In bringing its battery of cases, the Task Force carried the governmental powers to issue subpoenas, fashion criminal charges, grant immunity and negotiate plea bargains. Despite those sweeping powers, the Enron Task Force suffered at times from communication problems, bureaucratic infighting and disagreements over tactics.

Communication issues became so bad that Task Force members had to rely on personal email accounts because the email system used by federal prosecutors doesn't fully mesh with the email system used by agents at the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Only around last summer, more than a year after Messrs. Lay and Skilling had been indicted, did investigators obtain the capacity to electronically search through the vast archives of Enron documents, say people familiar with the matter. These people blame the delays on a failure to marshal resources in a timely fashion. For instance, the Task Force went for long stretches with only one paralegal to help the attorneys.

"One of our greatest fears was, 'What else was out there?' " among the millions of Enron documents, said Sam Buell, a former Task Force member now teaching at the University of Texas law school. Another person close to the Task Force recalled one instance where prosecutors learned about potentially important documents in one of the Enron cases only when they were filed in court by defense attorneys.

Enron's failure sparked a media and political firestorm, partly because Mr. Lay had been a friend and major campaign supporter of President Bush. The formation of the Task Force enabled members to concentrate on one subject -- as opposed to the multiple cases that a typical prosecutor or FBI agent has to juggle.

The formation of the Task Force required unusually large amounts of travel time and time away from home. For instance, John Hueston3, one of the lead prosecutors on the Skilling-Lay case, has been living in Houston since late last year and has gotten home to Southern California for two days to see his family.

Partly as a result, the Task Force experienced lots of turnover. Of the attorneys currently on the Task Force, the longest serving is deputy director Kathryn Ruemmler, who joined the team in late 2003, about 18 months after the unit was founded. The Task Force is on its third director, Sean Berkowitz4. The first two, Leslie Caldwell and Andrew Weissmann, left for private practice.

Controversy surrounded the Task Force from its inception. Some wondered whether the Bush administration would vigorously pursue possible crimes involving a political supporter as big as Mr. Lay. Others wondered whether the Task Force would be too aggressive -- just to show that there wasn't any political favoritism. Following his July 2004 indictment, Mr. Lay argued that the charges against him looked "like part of a political campaign."

The Task Force drew heat for indicting Andersen for obstruction of justice in connection with destroying large amounts of Enron-related documents. Critics contended that the Task Force unfairly penalized thousands of innocent Andersen employees for the alleged crimes of a few. Andersen's conviction helped put the large accounting firm out of business.

Other, less-noticed strategy calls produced disputes within the Task Force. Several people familiar with the unit have questioned the decision to allow civil suits by Enron shareholders to go forward at the same time as the criminal probe. Criminal defense attorneys have used those civil proceedings to depose many prospective witnesses and get a window into potential testimony. The Task Force didn't move to stop the civil proceedings, a block that often happens in criminal probes, because prosecutors thought it would be unfair -- and politically untenable -- to slow efforts to recover money for Enron shareholders, say people familiar with the matter.

There was debate within the Task Force over whether to include Mr. Lay in the case against Mr. Skilling, which at the time included Enron's former chief accounting officer, Richard Causey5 (who reached a plea bargain with prosecutors). Although all three were part of the same alleged conspiracy, Mr. Lay's purported role was largely confined to a several-month period after Mr. Skilling quit Enron in August 2001. Some prosecutors worried that adding Mr. Lay to the case could distract or confuse jurors, says one person familiar with the matter.

Plus, it was widely believed that the case against Mr. Lay was a tougher one to prove than the one against Mr. Skilling.

Enron Convictions Solidifies Corporate America's Reform Movement (KRT)

By David Greising

Knight Ridder, May 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Enron. The very word encapsulates an era.

It conjures images of too-cozy board rooms, all-powerful CEOs, compliant accountants, greed-struck employees and, ultimately, out-of-luck investors.

And now, thanks to the convictions of former chief executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, Enron finally can stand for something else.

It stands for justice, thanks to the jury's unequivocal verdict.

The convictions also likely will embolden the sheriffs in town - federal prosecutors, the Securities and Exchange Commission, ambitious district attorneys and even a few private investors - to forge ahead in the challenging, ongoing effort to battle business corruption.

Some argue that a guilty verdict was not needed to exact justice. A flurry of post-Enron reforms, highlighted by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, had done that, they say.

"Even if there had been an acquittal, that would have been ok," said Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "The changes that this case has brought are a victory in their own right."

But Andrew Weissmann disagrees. Weissmann laid the investigative foundation for Thursday's verdict as head of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. Before he stepped down nearly a year ago, he sifted through the grubby entrails of the corrupt Enron enterprise.

Weissmann also led the prosecution of Arthur Andersen. And since the Supreme Court threw out the Andersen guilty verdict because of the judge's flawed jury instruction, he has seen how a final verdict can muddle the public's perceptions of right and wrong.

An acquittal would have changed the conversation. Inevitably, people would have focused us on the ways the prosecutors blew the trial, or that the government overreached, in much the same way that people now muse about Andersen's demise.

Apologists might even have emerged. Some might even have embraced the preposterous Skilling-Lay defense - that a cabal of journalists and short sellers doomed a complex but legitimate enterprise.

"A huge part of the justice system is holding people accountable," Weissmann said Thursday. "In terms of the larger picture - what Enron meant to corporate America - this is a real sea change, a paradigm shift in the way corporations view their obligations to the public."

To appreciate how far the verdict takes us, first consider how far we've already come.

In their hey days, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling straddled the world. Lay was George W. Bush's "Kenny Boy," a source of civic pride to Houston, an architect of Dick Cheney's energy policy and a leading voice in corporate America.

Skilling was slicked-back and whip-smart. He was the brain and the bustle behind Enron's transformation from a company that traded electricity to a new kind of corporate colossus that made billions trading just about anything.

Had Lay and Skilling been acquitted, they might have become objects of pity, or at least puzzlement. Convicted, they become object lessons instead.

Any executive, anywhere, who might want to cut a corner or break a law, must keep Lay and Skilling in mind. And government enforcement officials, everywhere, should take note, too, and vow not to let things get quite so Enron-bad before they step in. The conviction is a signal that there's still plenty of work to do.

For example: Hedge funds are powerful and mysterious, just as Ivan Boesky and Michael Milken were in their heyday. Prosecutions around the fringes of that industry are an encouraging sign that regulators are beginning to keep tabs on the derring-do of hedge funds, and are trying to sort out the legal from the illegal before a crisis occurs.

An acquittal for Lay and Skilling could have set vigilance back. It could have emboldened critics who say reforms such as Sarbanes-Oxley have gone too far. Acquittal might have encouraged the SEC, or the Justice Department, to ease up, to quit bringing criminal cases. If you can't convict on Enron, the argument might go, then you just can't convict.

So when the Enron jury spoke on Lay and Skilling, they did more than call the former Enron executives guilty. They gave voice to the notion that the reform movement in corporate America still has plenty of room to run.

Lay, Skilling Convicted In Enron Collapse (CHIT)

By Greg Burns

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

Embracing a prosecution that focused on simple lies instead of complex accounting, a federal jury Thursday convicted Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling of criminal charges stemming from their leading role in the Enron Corp. scandal.

The panel found Lay guilty of all six fraud and conspiracy counts against him, while Skilling was convicted of 19 counts, including one of insider trading, and acquitted on the remaining nine for lack of evidence.

The decisive conviction of Enron's top brass brings closure to one of the most devastating frauds in American business history, and it represents a major victory for the government crackdown on corporate crime.

"It's been a long, long time coming," said Chicagoan Sean Berkowitz, lead prosecutor of the government's Enron Task Force. "The system worked."

The collapse of Enron nearly five years ago wiped out 5,000 jobs and billions of dollars in wealth, shaking the public's confidence in financial markets and leading to the indictment and liquidation of Chicago's Andersen accounting firm. Enron's shocking demise also led directly to legislation that changed and strengthened the rules of accountability for senior executives.

After failing to win convictions in several other prominent white-collar cases, federal prosecutors sought to keep it simple in Houston. Rather than focus on the nuances of a highly complex corporation, at one time the nation's seventh largest, they emphasized how Lay and Skilling repeatedly deceived the public.

"They lied to their investors, they omitted critical facts, and at times they put their interests ahead of their shareholders," Berkowitz told jurors in his final argument last week. "They lied from the stand."

The key was presenting a "clear and focused" case, said Sheldon Zenner, a veteran trial attorney at Katten Muchin Rosenman in Chicago. "Jurors could understand without getting bogged down in the minutiae of the accounting."

The eight-woman, four-man jury deliberated for more than five days, embracing the testimony of a parade of former Enron executives who said Lay and Skilling condoned the use of accounting tricks to boost reported profits and hide debt.

The defendants' decision to take the stand didn't particularly help their case, said a juror interviewed after the verdicts were delivered.

"I wanted very, very badly to believe what they were saying," said business owner Wendy Vaughn. But "there were places in their testimony where I felt their character was questioned."

Lay's sale of $20 million of Enron stock in 2001, just months before the company collapsed, also weighed heavily with jurors. One expressed disgust at the transaction, which came as Lay publicly urged Enron employees to buy more of the plunging shares: It was "a disgrace," said electrical designer Doug Martin.

Lay also was convicted Thursday of bank fraud and making false statements in a separate non-jury trial.

The 64-year-old Lay and 52-year-old Skilling face steep penalties, potentially including life in prison. Sentencing is set for Sept. 11.

Lay's charges carry a maximum penalty of 45 years in prison for the corporate trial and 120 years in the personal banking trial, according to The Associated Press. Skilling's charges carry a maximum penalty of 185 years.

]Much discretion rests with U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, a no-nonsense jurist who has a history of imposing lengthy terms. The likely sentences easily could stretch for two decades, legal experts said.

As Lake read the verdicts from the bench, Lay tossed his head at hearing the first "guilty" on the conspiracy count. He clutched his wife's hand as he heard that word over and over again.

Lay sat with his wife, Linda; his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a member of his defense team; and Linda Lay's daughter, Robyn. As Lay clutched Linda Lay's hand, the three women leaned forward and began to sob quietly.

After Lake left the courtroom, Lay's family and some friends gathered around him as the ex-chairman, red-faced and fighting back tears, hugged them and thanked them for their support.

Skilling, sitting with his younger brother, Mark, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

"Obviously, I'm disappointed," Skilling told reporters outside the courthouse. "But that's the way the system works."

His chief defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, vowed to file a "full and vigorous" appeal.

"We're going to stand behind him," Petrocelli said. "As I told him, we've just begun to fight."

Skilling's other brother, Tom, chief meteorologist for the Chicago Tribune and WGN-TV, who attended portions of the trial in Houston, could not be reached for comment Thursday.

The verdicts were perhaps the government's most important victory in its high-profile war against corporate corruption.

"The jury has spoken, and they have sent an unmistakable message to boardrooms across the country: You can't lie to shareholders," Berkowitz said. "No matter how rich and powerful you are, you have to play by the rules."

Prosecutor John Hueston, who sparred with Lay on the stand, said the ex-chairman had missed "a golden opportunity" to save Enron.

"He made that choice to put his own interests ahead of that of the shareholders and investors," Hueston said. "And he did that by choosing not to tell the unvarnished truth, and he did it by choosing not to ask the hard questions."

Enron's implosion prompted a wave of outrage, leading to sweeping new regulations, including the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law aimed at curbing corporate wrongdoing and restoring confidence in financial statements.

Lay and Skilling, who have insisted they were made scapegoats for Enron's shocking 2001 collapse, became the headline targets of the crackdown on the boardroom that also resulted in charges against executives at WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and other giant companies.

Enron's auditors were among the first casualties, with Andersen going out of business mere months after its client's collapse.

Testimony at Andersen's criminal trial on an obstruction-of-justice charge showed that its employees shredded mounds of Enron-related documents after the federal investigation was launched. The U.S. Supreme Court in July overturned the company's 2002 conviction because of faulty jury instructions.

Lay and Skilling attempted to have their trial moved to a location less saturated by media coverage of Enron's crash, but there were few places in America where the news hadn't penetrated.

"Just the mention of the name Enron evokes images of duplicity and greed," Linda Chatman Thomsen, director of enforcement for the Securities and Exchange Commission, said at the time of Lay's July 2004 indictment.

An Oscar-nominated documentary film and a handful of mass-market books were spawned by the scandal. Enron whistle-blower Sherron Watkins, in addition to co-authoring a book and testifying against her former bosses, launched a lucrative second career lecturing on business ethics.

An investigation by the Enron Task Force, created by the Department of Justice shortly after the company's bankruptcy filing, has resulted in charges against more than 20 people. Enron's collapse took with it more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension assets and 5,600 jobs.

Reaction to the verdict among ex-Enron employees ranged from elation to indifference. Sherri Saunders, who lost her job and $1 million in retirement savings, said the verdict "gives me a little comfort."

She's hoping for stiff sentences because Lay and Skilling never took responsibility or showed remorse, she told The Associated Press. "If Ken Lay gets 20 years, he'll probably die in jail. So 20 years would be good."

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), co-author of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation, said, "Enron was the canary in the mineshaft, and subsequently a lot of other companies were found to have engaged in practices which abused the trust that had been placed in them."

DOJ_NMG_0029917

Added Michael Oxley (R-Ohio): "The verdicts help to close a notorious chapter in the history of America's publicly traded companies. Appeals aside, the end of the trial will mark the end of a dark era."

The Los Angeles Times, a Tribune newspaper, contributed to this report, as did Tribune news wires.

For Ex-Enron Employees, Verdict Is Personal (HC)

By Purva Patel

Houston Chronicle, May 26, 2006

For those with ties to Enron, the announcement of the verdict shortly after 11 a.m was something they felt personally. Sherron Watkins

Former Enron vice president Sherron Watkins, who warned Lay of accounting problems at the company was attending her daughter's first grade graduation when she heard the news.

"I think the jury has sent a message that they will hold leaders accountable for what takes place in their organization. I think CEOS need to be more than effectively public relations heads. They bear responsibility to know what's going on in their company and ensure the value system is firmly in place. Fred Philipson

Fred Philipson, who used to work in Enron's business development department before being laid off, said he was relieved when he heard the guilty verdicts. But he didn't always think Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling were guilty.

"I think I gave them the benefit of the doubt initially. That there is at least a possibility that they weren't guilty, but as the trial wore on and evidence was brought out, I did believe they were guilty."

Philipson, 43, now works for the Harris County Toll Authority, after being unemployed for a year after Enron filed for bankruptcy. Erica BessDuncan

Erica BessDuncan, 34, who did marketing and communications work for Enron, said she says she never doubted that Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling were guilty.

"I'm happy," she said. "A part of me feels bad for their families because obviously they're probably going to go away for a long time, but I'm relieved because I do believe Skilling and Lay are guilty. Ultimately Lay was responsible for what happened.His saying he didn't know what was going on and trusted what his underlings told him is not an excuse. The same goes for Skilling."

BessDuncan said she's glad she can put it behind her because she's worked hard moving on. Even though sentencing is months away, she says she's just happy it's over and isn't too worried about what punishment each will receive.

"I think obviously returning all their ill gotten money and putting it in the fund to be dispersed to former employees and shareholder is more appropriate than prison time given their age for both of them. But more than anything I think this is a moral victory. I don't really care what ultimately happens to them." John Olson

John Olson of Sanders Morris Harris Group, an outspoken analyst who was forced out of a previous firm after writing negative reports about Enron that prompted Ken Lay to pressure his employer, told CNBC immediately after the verdict was read, "These two gentlemen rode the edge quite a bit. I feel personally sorry for the families but these people, I think, were just operating in a different dimension than the rest of us."

While Olson said he knew Enron was manufacturing paper profits, because the company did not make proper disclosures to the SEC it was tough to find a smoking gun.

"I couldn't even get to that level really because you really would hear this from people — that it was built on a house of cards — but you couldn't go look at the 10Ks or 10Q s (SEC documents) and say this is wrong because it was cosmetically covered." Rod Jordan

The verdict will likely bring relief to many former employees, said Rod Jordan, co-founder of the Severed Enron Employee Coalition.

"I think it was the right verdict," Jordan said. "I always have been disappointed that men of that potential quality would step over the line. I think it's vindication as former employees that the top people were found guilty and had their day in court. They were picking at people in the middle and now they've reached the top. It's good that justice was served."

He added he hoped the guilty verdicts would help restore trust in the country's justice system.

He also thinks both Lay and Skilling should spend at least 12 years in jail, two more than Andy Fastow received in exchange for his plea deal.

From The Ex-Employees: Revenge, Shock, Sadness (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

"I am in such an excellent mood," former Enron Corp. employee Ken Horton gushed from Houston yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0029918

Friends started calling Horton about 10:30 a.m. central time after news broke that a verdict had been reached in the trial of former Enron executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Within a half-hour, the guilty verdicts began rolling in, the culmination of a 16-week trial, a four-year investigation and a nearly five-year saga for the 30,000 former employees of the energy company, many of whom lost jobs they loved and retirement savings they counted on.

Some, like Horton, were happy. Others were saddened.

Horton, who followed the trial closely, worked under Richard Buy, then Enron's chief risk officer. Enron's risk assessment division conducted sophisticated, minute-by-minute mathematical analyses that assessed the risk presented to the company by its various deals.

Horton joined Enron in 1998 and was one of the thousands of employees who boxed up their belongings and marched out of the gleaming Enron tower around the time the company declared bankruptcy in December 2001.

Like many employees, Horton felt betrayed by leaders of a company he loved.

"If I had to do it all over again, I would work at Enron again," he said. "I just would have invested a little differently."

Like many Enron employees, Horton also filled his retirement account with Enron stock. His loss "was in the six figures," he said. "It set my retirement back a few years."

Horton called working at Enron an "intense" experience.

"One of the really strong characteristics of the company was how much it was driven by deals," he said. "The people managing these deals had enormous bonuses riding on the deals and rode everybody hard."

Adam Plager's reaction to yesterday's verdicts was shock.

"I never thought" the jury would reach a guilty verdict, said the former Enron software engineer. "I thought it was too complicated of a case."

As the chief executive of his own small software company, which he founded shortly after exiting Enron in December 2001 ("or after it exited me," he said), Plager said he believes top executives should be held accountable for the failures of their companies. But he was afraid the guilty verdicts would take attention from others culpable for the company's downfall: Wall Street banks that loaned the company money while underwriting its deals and stock analysts who touted the Enron stock without asking the company tough questions about its financials.

Plager lost his 401(k) plan, which was filled with Enron stock, but had prudently diversified the rest of his portfolio based on Enron's spendthrift ways. Smart companies don't spend money "like water," he thought.

"I went to England once, flew first-class and stayed at a hotel across from Buckingham Palace for a project that never should have required me to be there," he said. "With a little more planning, I would not have had to be there."

Rod Jordan was a manager in the much-maligned Enron Energy Services business, which contracted with companies, such as J.C. Penney Co., to manage their energy needs. The division inflated its earnings by booking long-term anticipated profits on current earnings reports.

Jordan bought his first Enron stock in 1991 at $11 per share. He joined Enron in 1998 with a five-year plan to retire from the company with profits from his Enron stock, which soared as high as $90 per share in August 2000. Jordan projected that it would top out at $120 per share by 2003 and he'd be set. Instead, he found himself part of the exodus of Enron employees in December 2001.

The verdicts yesterday stung Jordan a little. He said justice had been done, but he admitted to have been pulling, at least early on, for a Lay acquittal.

"I wanted someone high up that I could still believe in," Jordan said. "That hope sort of faded away after the stuff started coming out" during the trial, he said.

After he lost his job, he started the Severed Enron Employees Coalition, a Web network that kept former employees in touch and served as a resource for those looking for jobs.

Jordan recently surveyed the 1,200-member coalition about life after Enron and got more than 200 responses, he said. About 60 percent of the respondents said they believed Lay was guilty, while all but two respondents felt that way about Skilling.

"There was a lot more animosity toward Skilling in the company," Jordan said.

Skilling, who joined Enron from McKinsey & Co. in 1990, led Enron's conversion from a pipeline company to the industry's leading energy trader. He was the company's chief executive from February 2001 to August 2001, when he abruptly resigned, citing personal reasons. Lay, who founded Enron and preceded Skilling as chief executive, took over after his resignation and helmed the company until its bankruptcy.

Tracy Randall is one of the former Enron employees saddened by the verdicts.

An IT staffer from 1997 to 2003, she followed the company into reorganization. She still harbors warm feelings for Lay.

DOJ_NMG_0029919

"I just can't believe they said he was guilty," she wrote via e-mail from Houston. "He might be accountable for some mistakes, but I don't think he should go to prison. He hired the best of the best to run things for him, and they failed him."

Many Who Lost Savings, Jobs Pleased (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Roy Rinard was up in the bucket of his service truck, working on a power line for Portland General Electric on Thursday morning when his wife, Vicki, called on his cellphone to say the verdicts were coming in half an hour.

The 57-year-old Rinard, who lost $470,000 in 401(k) savings when Enron collapsed, quickly finished his work, got down and flipped on the radio.

News that former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay were guilty on nearly all counts left him ecstatic, a feeling shared by others who lost jobs, retirement money or both in the collapse of what was once the nation's seventh-largest company.

"It restores our faith in the system," says Rinard, "that people don't get away scot-free just because they have money for good defense lawyers."

Since 1980, Rinard has worked in Oregon for the Portland electric company, which was purchased by Enron in 1997. Most of his retirement savings were in his company's 401(k) program at the time of the sale, when it converted to Enron stock.

After Enron went bankrupt in 2001, he and his wife, Vicki, had to sell their home and buy a much smaller one. Like many other former Enron employees, they gave up plans for travel, retirement and helping the grandkids.

The verdicts, he says, "brought a small sense of closure to a very difficult five years."

Enron's collapse resulted in the loss of $60 billion in market value on Wall Street, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs.

Tom Padgett, 63, was about to retire in 2001 when he was laid off from the Enron plant where he worked as a senior lab technician. He lost about $700,000 in retirement savings — and it took a year and a half for him to find another job.

He, too, was pleased with the verdicts. "They got exactly what they deserve," says Padgett.

Gary Kemper, 62, who worked for an Enron company for more than 29 years, says he lost $280,000 in his 401(k). A fitting punishment in Kemper's opinion would be to "put (Lay) on the streets of Houston without a penny in his pocket like he did with the Enron employees."

Many of the former employees are involved in shareholder lawsuits that seek some redress for their losses. But most don't expect to see much of their savings back.

"I feel good about the verdict, but my retirement is still gone," says Sherri Saunders, 58, who worked as an executive secretary for Enron for 24 years and lost about $1 million in retirement savings.

Saunders now has a new job she loves: head secretary to a top executive at Methodist Hospital in Houston: "We're rebuilding, slowly plodding along."

Schwarzenegger Strategists Gain Confidence (WSJ)

SCHWARZENEGGER STRATEGISTS gain confidence, but challenges remain.

Scrambling to avoid termination, California governor ditches conservative 2005 script and tacks toward center. In campaign, led by former Bush strategists, he criticizes unpopular president on climate change, Medicare and immigration. A new poll by Public Policy Institute of California pegs ex-movie star's approval at 36%, up from 32% six months ago.

Seven in 10 back his 10-year $222 billion infrastructure-spending plan. But Schwarzenegger only runs even against lesser-known Democratic challengers Steve Westly and Phil Angelides, who square off in June primary. Like Democratic Gov. Davis in 2002, he'll run "a strongly negative" campaign, predicts Berkeley analyst Bruce Cain.

"Arnold has improved his position tactically," cautions Democratic strategist Bill Carrick, but faces "hostile" electorate.

OUTLOOK REMAINS MURKY for next tax steps.

In bill extending expiring provisions, lawmakers from Louisiana and New York seek more tax breaks for disaster zones. Sen. Santorum of Pennsylvania pushes bill encouraging charitable donations, but Finance Chairman Grassley insists on crackdown on charitable abuses.

Grassley looks for compromise on estate tax, but some in both parties prefer pre-election stalemate. Majority Leader Frist plans base-pleasing June vote on full repeal but lacks strength to overcome filibuster. Kyl of Arizona hopes failure will jump-start talks on preserving "death tax" only for richest families.

WHITE HOUSE BACKS Bernanke as Fed faces heat.

Inflation-wary investors want more interest-rate boosts, while election-minded politicians complain. But "the Fed knows what's best," says Bush economic adviser Al Hubbard. Markets seek clues to Fed thinking in next week's release of May 10 policy-meeting summary.

After lackluster April job growth, forthcoming report on May employment becomes important signal. A strong number will please Bush but increase pressure on the Fed to tap monetary brakes.

Analyst Tom Gallagher calls Bernanke's apology for talking to CNBC's Bartiromo a mea culpa, "not a Maria culpa."

BOTH PARTIES DOUBT Enron verdicts will have large political impact. "The public verdict is already in on CEO greed at the expense of the company's own employees," says ex-Clinton strategist Stan Greenberg. Adds Republican pollster Neil Newhouse, "There could have been a public backlash had the verdicts not come in guilty."

TURNING TABLES: At House panel hearing on runaway executive compensation, Republicans highlight fees for plaintiffs lawyers, who are big Democratic donors. "Trial lawyers are the ones who are sopping up investors' wealth," argued Rep. McHenry, North Carolina Republican. Democrat Watt, also of North Carolina, called the argument "bizarre."

PELOSI'S DEMAND that embattled Louisiana Rep. Jefferson quit tax-writing committee angers Black Caucus, since he hasn't yet been charged in bribe probe. Matt Bennett of centrist Democratic group Third Way calls Pelosi "dead right" because "this is politics."

AMERICAN DIPLOMATS WORK toward proposal on restricting nuclear technologies to Iran and other countries. The proposal aims to assure those seeking nuclear power, but not weapons, that they can gain necessary feedstock under safeguards. Among potential beneficiaries: Indonesia and Ukraine.

'NET NEUTRALITY' backers gain -- for now.

House Judiciary Committee passes a bill, supported by the likes of Google, embracing government role in assuring that phone and cable companies don't play favorites. Bad news for Internet firms fearing discrimination: Only one-fourth of committee Republicans backed the bill.

Partisan split bodes well for phone and cable firms. House leaders normally bury legislation that most Republicans oppose. At hearing on separate Internet-gambling bill, Chairman Sensenbrenner asks members to say "woof" or "no" in support of amendment on horse and dog racing.

The amendment failed, but the bill passed, 25 woofs to 11.

Kenny Boy, Meet Brownie (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, May 26, 2006

May 25, 2006 - If you want a date to mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era in American life, you may as well make it this one: May 25, 2006. The Enron jury in Houston didn't just put the wood to Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. The jurors took a chainsaw to the moral claims of the Texas-based corporate culture that had helped fuel the rise to power of President George W. Bush.

First, caveats. There's no evidence that the president or anyone in his entourage knew about or benefited financially from the house of cards that Lay and Skilling built—and that a federal jury now has found to have been an edifice of fraud.

The Bush Crowd was old school in the energy bidness and viewed Lay & Co. as hustling parvenus who had no real interest in finding and pumping oil—what real men in Texas do.

Most of what Enron concocted was assembled in the go-go Clinton years. Bush's idea of an oilman was his old Bible-study buddy, the upright, clean-as-a-whistle Don Evans. As the Enron scam was falling apart, Lay frantically sought help from Evans—by then the Commerce secretary—among others (including Democrats such as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin). He got nowhere, and had the chutzpah to be bitter about it.

Ultimately, Bush's Justice Department pressed the case against Enron—and won.

Still, when the history books are written, the debit side of the Bush-era ledger will include a line labeled "Kenny Boy." That's the nickname Bush gave the guy he later claimed he barely knew.

As Texas governor from 1995 to 2000, Bush and consiglieri Karl Rove cultivated the Enronites for their vast connections and money; more than that, Bush linked arms with Lay in the belief that market forces alone should guide the production, distribution and use of energy. But the theory ran riot at Enron, giving license to corporate buccaneers who blithely screwed consumers, employees and shareholders alike. The old saying applies to Enron: you lie down with dogs, you get up with fleas.

Once A Friend And Ally, Now A Distant Memory (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

He started as "Kenny Boy." Then he was a "supporter," an acquaintance who had not talked to President Bush in "quite some time." Now he is a man convicted of conspiracy and fraud, and a symbol of corporate corruption.

This is former Enron chief Kenneth L. Lay's transformation in the words of President Bush and his spokesmen -- going from a personal and political ally to someone the White House sought to keep as distant as possible as his role in the multibillion-dollar collapse of the energy giant became clear.

In the 1980s, when Bush was working in the Texas oil industry, his firm invested in a drilling partnership with Lay's company, a predecessor to Enron. In 1992, Lay was co-chairman of the Republican National Convention in Houston that re-nominated President George H.W. Bush.

Later, Lay was a major fundraiser for George W. Bush's political career. He delivered more than $300,000 for his two gubernatorial campaigns, according to Texans for Public Justice. In 1997, Bush wrote to Lay: "Dear Ken, One of the sad things about old friends is that they seem to be getting older -- just like you! 55 years old. Wow. . . . Laura and I value our friendship with you. . . . Your younger friend, George W. Bush."

In the 2000 presidential race, Lay remained a steadfast ally. Lay was a Bush "Pioneer" who raised at least $100,000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Enron also made its jet available and contributed to inaugural festivities.

Lay later wrote to the new president and the first lady that he was "so proud of you and look forward to seeing both of you in the White House." But Lay also found influence in the administration.

Vice President Cheney invited Lay to take part in his secret energy task force meetings. Cheney also talked to the Indian government about a debt it owed Enron for the rebuilding of a power plant. Numerous administration officials held Enron stock. Lawrence B. Lindsey, Bush's chief economic adviser at the time, had sat on Enron's board, receiving $50,000.

These connections came to light as Enron collapsed under the weight of a broad accounting fraud. It was also revealed that Enron executives had sought the counsel of administration officials as bankruptcy loomed.

Responding to public outrage, the White House promoted corporate accountability and put space between itself and Enron. Bush said only that "Ken Lay is a supporter," and that he "first got to know Ken" in 1994 when "he was a supporter of Ann Richards," the Democratic governor Bush ousted. Dan Bartlett, the White House communications director, said the administration "is leading the investigation, not being resistant."

White House press secretary Tony Snow congratulated the Justice Department yesterday on winning the case, adding: "The administration's been pretty clear there's no tolerance for corporate corruption."

U.K. Banker Fighting Extradition Calls Enron Case `Terrifying' (BLOOM)

By Megan Murphy

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- A British banker fighting extradition to the U.S. on Enron Corp.-related charges said he was ``terrified'' by today's convictions of the company's former Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling and questioned why the men chose to fight the case.

``It was either an incredibly brave or foolhardy thing that they did, and I guess they're paying the consequences now,'' David Bermingham said in a telephone interview from his home outside London. ``They had both hands tied behind their back, and they were up against the 400-pound gorilla. The deck was completely stacked against them.''

Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew, all former employees of Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, are wanted in Texas for allegedly pocketing millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership.

They are among the 33 individuals, including Lay and Skilling, the U.S. government has prosecuted in connection with the energy trader's implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight.

A jury in a Houston federal court deliberated six days before convicting Skilling, 52, of 19 of the 28 charges against him and Lay, 64, of all six counts. Both men face at least 25 years in prison, while Skilling may receive additional jail time after being found guilty of using inside information to sell Enron stock.

`NatWest Three'

Bermingham said today that while he didn't have any opinion on whether Lay or Skilling were guilty of the fraud and conspiracy charges against them, the fact that both men may spend the rest of their lives in prison only reinforced the importance of the bankers' ongoing battle against extradition.

The ``NatWest Three," as Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew are known in Britain, were charged with seven counts of wire fraud in 2002 for allegedly skimming $7.3 million by duping their former employer over the value of an Enron partnership known as ``Swap Sub." The indictments were the first criminal fraud charges to emerge from the U.S. Justice Department's probe into the energy trader's collapse.

If they lose their fight against extradition, now on appeal to Britain's highest court, the men are likely to be forced into some sort of plea arrangement with U.S. prosecutors, Bermingham said.

``We can't defend ourselves in Houston," Bermingham said. ``Our government knows that, and the U.S. government knows that. If someone feels there is a case to answer, let us fight our case in London. At least then it will be a fair fight."

Human Rights

Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew say that as British citizens accused of defrauding a British bank, any charges brought against them should be brought in the U.K. They also claim that their extradition, which is being pursued under new ``fast-track" legislation designed to clamp down on terrorism and other cross- border crime, would violate their human rights.

The House of Lords, Britain's highest court, is expected to decide within the next few weeks whether to hear a series of legal challenges to Britain's new extradition arrangements with the U.S., including the NatWest Three case.

``I don't see today's verdict as having any direct bearing on our case, but I certainly feel sorry for them," Bermingham said. ``The government had effectively stopped them from bringing any real defense, by having so many cooperating witnesses on their side. In retrospect, you've got to wonder if they made the right decision."

Wives, Ex-wives Faced Trials Of Their Own (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell And Mindy Fetterman

USA Today, May 26, 2006

In courtroom wrangling over white-collar crimes, the way family support is perceived can be important. In the Enron trial, it was often about the wives.

Linda Lay, the former secretary turned second wife to Enron ex-chairman Ken Lay, stood by her man every day of the four-month trial that ended in her husband's conviction Thursday.

Usually, she sat in the first row of the spectator gallery, about 20 feet from her husband. But as the clock approached 11 a.m. in Houston Thursday, the hour of judgment for Ken Lay, she moved into the front part of the courtroom to be beside him.

Linda Lay maintained the same tight grasp on her husband's hand that she's had in all the trips to and from the courtroom.

That wasn't the case with Rebecca Carter, former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling's second wife and former corporate board secretary. She did not attend every day of the trial and was not in the courtroom when it was time for a verdict. Outside the courthouse, after being convicted on all counts, Skilling thanked his family, especially his three children, but didn't mention his wife.

Beth Bonora, a jury consultant in San Francisco, says it's important for those on trial to have family members in the courtroom to “convey that other people care about you and believe in you. … People are curious about relationships, the dynamics” of family members in the courtroom.

The Enron wives were under a lot of pressure, says Mike Paul, a New York public relations consultant who advises clients facing charges.

“You have these wives who themselves probably were lied to for many, many years and who probably knew things that they turned their heads away from, and they're trying to be loyal and be there for their husbands,” says Paul. “They're thinking: ‘I guess this is the kind of loyalty you're supposed to have.' ”

But it's hard to disguise strong emotions in a courtroom, he says. “It's about fear mixed with anger; all those hidden emotions are right on top,” he says. “I never tell clients to hold their wife's hand if they truly can't show empathy, because it will backfire.”

Skilling's wife and his ex-wife made his legal predicament darker with their own stock trades. Before they were married, Carter sold more than $1 million in Enron stock in October and November 2000. His ex-wife, Susan Skilling Lowe, exercised Enron options for $14 million that October, about the time Enron's desperate attempt to unload unprofitable international assets fell through. Skilling testified the sales were coincidental.

Linda Lay had a more public role as the scandal unfolded. On the Today Show in January 2002, she tearfully told of the family's financial plight and the stress of having her husband's life scrutinized. She opened a consignment shop which sold hers and others' goods because of what she called a “liquidity crisis.”

In the courtroom, Linda Lay favored brightly colored, yet conservative, pantsuits. Carter kept a low profile in court, often dressed in black.

The key to dressing, experts say, is to not look arrogant, overdressed, tacky or wealthy. "If they were my clients, I'd tell them that the perception is that you are these flashy, Texas, Southern women who had access to friendships with the president, the governor, with top celebrities," says Paul. "All of that is gone now."

As Skilling left the courthouse with his lawyer, the Lays joined hands again — this time with supporters inside the courthouse in a prayer circle.

Outside the courthouse, Lay, facing life in prison, described his life as "blessed." Among the reasons: "On my left is this beautiful woman who is my wife."

Books, Film, Memorabilia Not Drawing Attention (USAT)

By David Lieberman, Theresa Howard And Laura Petrecca

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW YORK — Enron's legacy includes several well-regarded books, an Oscar-nominated documentary, a mountain of memorabilia and — based on sales of those items — lots of yawns.

Publishers, who made the biggest bets on public interest in Enron, hope for a few more sales off the verdict, but don't expect much.

"There were a lot of (Enron) books and relatively few readers," says Michael Cader, editor of industry newsletter Publishers Lunch. "It was a complex case and the extent to which it meant anything to general readers was elusive."

For example, Kurt Eichenwald's Conspiracy of Fools: A True Story has sold 122,000 hardback and paperback copies since its release last year, says Nielsen BookScan (which does not include Wal-Mart).

"Kurt will be called upon to do a number of interviews about the verdict, and that helps drive sales," says Broadway Books spokesman David Drake. Eichenwald last week was on PBS' The Charlie Rose Show.

The Smartest Guys in the Room: The Amazing Rise and Scandalous Fall of Enron by Fortune magazine's Bethany McLean and Peter Elkind has sold 105,000 hardback and paperback copies since 2003, according to Nielsen BookScan.

They also are hitting the talk show circuit, but even with the case resolved, Will Weisser, associate publisher at Penguin's business imprint Portfolio, calls the prospect of an updated edition "a longer-term question."

Producers of the film based on the book, Enron: The Smartest Guys in the Room, a runner-up for this year's Best Documentary Oscar, don't plan a big push for the upcoming DVD. The film earned about $4.5 million in theaters worldwide since April 2005, according to BoxOfficeMojo.com.

"We'll try to get retailers to try to put it in main locations so visibility is high," says Eamonn Bowles, president of distributor Magnolia Pictures. He also might re-release the film in Houston.

Meanwhile, auctioneers don't expect a surge of Enron-mania for souvenirs. "Some of the wind is out of the sails because of the length of time of the trial," says Dennis Kruse, president of the National Auctioneers Association.

This week, 66 Enron items have sold on eBay, says eBay spokesman Dean Jutilla, while bidders snapped up 1,285 items tied to American Idol winner Taylor Hicks.

The Enron winning bids averaged $21. Coveted items included Enron cycling jerseys and stock certificates. Getting less interest: Enron's 64-page Code of Ethics.

Among big-ticket Enron items that have sold is the giant neon version of Enron's tilted "E" logo, which went for $44,000 at a company auction in 2002. Jimmy Luu, a Houston computer salesman who made the winning offer on behalf of his boss, says he thinks it would go for more now but is unlikely to be sold. "His main intention was to get that for his personal collection."

The Enron Verdicts . . . (WSJ)

If anyone still thinks corporate chieftains are above the law, yesterday's 29 guilty verdicts against former Enron CEOs Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay should put that myth to rest. The two former masters of the Houston universe will make long-shot appeals, but the odds are that both will spend much if not all of their remaining years in a federal prison.

Sentencing is scheduled for September 11, of all dates. Yet this is somehow fitting since Skilling initially tried to blame a suspicious attempt to dump his Enron stock on the climate of uncertainty following the 9/11 attacks. He was flatly contradicted by records showing he had actually tried to sell on September 6, 2001.

More broadly, Skilling and Lay may have lost their case from the start when they hung their defense on the dubious assertion that Enron was a fundamentally sound company tripped up only because speculators were abetted by critical articles on the front page of this newspaper. "This is not a case of hear no evil, see no evil. This is a case of there was no evil," said Skilling's lead attorney.

But that was after former CFO Andrew Fastow had already pleaded guilty and admitted to helping cook the company's books. Fastow and a string of former execs testified against the two CEOs. And in the end, jurors clearly understood that companies with real assets and sound balance sheets don't just go poof as the result of a little bad press. We appreciate the free advertising, but the Journal isn't that powerful.

Meanwhile, the damage done from this fraud was terrible: tens of billions of dollars in market value, $2.1 billion in pension obligations, and 5,600 jobs lost in the December 2001 collapse. With each of the guilty verdicts carrying potential penalties of at least five years, Skilling and Lay may well spend more time in prison than Fastow, the fraud mastermind.

By way of comparison, WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers is now facing 25 years, John and Timothy Rigas of Adelphia Cable 15 and 20 years respectively, and Tyco's two top former officials 25 years apiece. That's a pretty impressive cleanup job by the Justice Department and (in the Tyco case) Manhattan District Attorney. We think these convictions of individuals -- some 30 in the Enron case alone -- will do more to deter future corporate crime than anything in Sarbanes-Oxley. At the same time, the U.S. economy has snapped back nicely, meaning that assertions of widespread corporate fraud back in 2001 and 2002 were way overblown.

The Enron verdicts are proof, if more were needed, that lying to employees, shareholders and the public about corporate finances is a serious crime that will be punished.

And Justice For All (NYT)

Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, the former chief executives of Enron, had their day in court. Both had high-priced legal talent to defend them and the chance to take the stand and tell their side of the story to the jury. Yesterday, that jury found both of them guilty of criminal conduct for their part in the spectacular collapse of Enron, the first in a series of corporate scandals that shook the country's faith in its business leaders.

Mr. Lay was convicted on six counts of fraud and conspiracy and four counts of bank fraud. The jury, which acquitted Mr. Skilling on nine counts of insider trading, convicted him on 18 counts of fraud and conspiracy and one count of insider trading. These onetime corporate superstars could very well end up dying behind bars. The thought of aging men withering away in jail cells is a sad one, but no sadder in this case than in any other.

We as a society have a destructive tendency to think of crimes like holding up a convenience store or selling drugs as very serious and destructive to the social fabric, while looking more tolerantly at corporate malfeasance as simply businessmen being a little overzealous. Just because there isn't a gun doesn't mean there isn't a crime.

It is easy to see Enron as a symbol of an era of corporate lying, cheating and stealing. From the company's implausible rise to its cozy political connections to its crooked E logo, the energy giant and its cast of colorful characters always appeared to be the stuff of theater. But this was no morality play. This was about the real costs for normal people who suffered because of the machinations in the executive suites at Enron.

For one example, think of the employees at Portland General Electric, an Oregon utility company acquired by Enron four years before it went bankrupt. Many longstanding employees there lost huge chunks of their retirement funds and still face an uncertain old age. All because their business was snatched up by a company with a rotten core.

We hope the jury's verdict deters other corporate kingpins from breaking the rules. As Paul McNulty, deputy attorney general, put it in a news conference shortly after the verdict was announced, "No one, including the heads of Fortune 500 companies, is above the law." At the same time, white-collar criminal cases can be difficult, paper intensive and hard to explain to juries. We expect the verdict in the Enron case to encourage prosecutors to pursue them.

Not Just Bad Apples (WP)

WAY, WAY back, before dot-coms became dot-bombs, Kenneth L. Lay was part rock star, part high priest among rival energy executives. His company, Enron Corp., had seized opportunities created by deregulation and the Internet to transform the energy business, turning itself into America's seventh-biggest public company in the process. At an industry conference in 1999, Mr. Lay was asked how he could top the ninefold expansion of Enron's market capitalization over the previous decade. According to The Economist, Mr. Lay responded coolly: "We'll do it again this coming decade."

Not long after that forecast, Enron admitted that its profits for the years 1997 to 2000 had been overstated by $591 million. That confession began a downward spiral that ended in Enron's 2001 bankruptcy. But yesterday a Houston jury accepted the government's contention that Mr. Lay's bragging was deliberately dishonest rather than merely hollow. Along with Jeffrey K.

Skilling, his right-hand man at Enron and briefly his successor as chief executive, Mr. Lay was found guilty of misleading investors about the true state of his firm. The sentencing phase of the trial will begin in September. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling may spend the rest of their lives in prison.

These convictions follow those of bosses from other firms that imploded around the same time, such as Tyco International Ltd., WorldCom Inc. and Adelphia Communications Corp. But Enron was the first and most famous of the corporate failures, and the Lay and Skilling verdicts are the most symbolically significant. The government's prosecutors, who were up against a defense team that cost almost $70 million, deserve credit. The criminals' victims -- investors who lost savings, and workers who lost both their jobs and their savings because their retirement plans were invested in Enron stock -- may now feel some emotional redress. Meanwhile, many plan to sue for financial redress as well.

There is a danger in this verdict, however. In the wake of Enron's bankruptcy, some argued that the problems of corporate America were the work of a few bad apples. That argument lost, for the good reason that fully 250 U.S. public companies had to restate their accounts in 2002, up from 92 five years earlier. Corporate America's problems reflected lax oversight of auditors, conflicts of interest at audit companies, accounting rules with too many inviting loopholes and so on. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002 to fix these systemic weaknesses, now faces a backlash from firms that complain of stiff compliance costs. Although some tweaks in the way the law is implemented may be justified, the welcome Enron verdict should not color the regulatory question. This decade's business scandals were not just about bad apples, and putting those apples in jail is not going to change that.

Enron's End Game (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Since Enron collapsed in 2001, other major accounting fraud cases have come and gone. But Enron always remained the most celebrated case, the one that epitomized an era, the one that the federal prosecutors absolutely had to win.

Now that they did, with the guilty verdicts Thursday against former CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, public attention to issues of corporate fraud and governance might wane. That would be a shame because much more remains to be done before shareholders and employees can be confident that senior managers are acting in their company's best interest, not their own.

To be sure, the verdicts accomplish a number of important objectives. They send a clear message to executives that the most flagrant forms of fraud will not be tolerated. And they send a message to defense attorneys that American juries are not stupid. The Enron jurors did not buy the "ostrich defense" that Lay and Skilling had their heads in the sand and did not see the company's problems. Nor did they buy the absurd argument that Enron was in good shape until it was undermined by news reports and investors betting the stock price would drop.

But the verdicts do not compensate the company's 5,600 employees who lost their jobs, more than $2 billion in pensions and, in many cases, much of their savings. They don't compensate investors for their $60 billion in losses when the company collapsed. They don't change the culture on Wall Street, where analysts, accountants and attorneys remain under enormous pressure to speak well of the companies they examine.

And the verdicts do nothing to thwart the looting of public companies in the form of outrageous pay packages. Executive compensation has surged in recent years as managers have figured out they needn't break the law to enrich themselves. They need only a compliant board of directors.

In a way, the business world has learned little from Lay, the central figure in the Enron saga. Lay, 64, was once a pillar of Houston society, a friend of the first President Bush and a major contributor to the current President Bush, who called him "Kenny Boy." He suffered a colossal fall and now could be sent to prison for the rest of his life.

Other executives see Lay as an oddity, a bad apple in good batch. But it is not hard to see at least a little of Lay in some of them: the greed, the arrogance, the contempt for shareholders. It's all there, everything but the comeuppance.

The Enron verdicts are good news for investors. They show how the wheels of justice can move, albeit slowly. But they will have the most positive effect if they are seen as a beginning, not an end.

Convictions Drive Home The Point Again (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are right about one thing: The games they played at Enron were no different than the games being played at hundreds of other big public companies during the late 1990s. So in that respect, it is unfair that Lay and Skilling (and their partner in crime, Andy Fastow) have been singled out for criminal prosecution. Unfair -- and totally necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0029926

The point of criminal prosecution of corporate crime is not really retribution or restitution. Former Enron shareholders and employees are not better off because of yesterday's verdict. And to the degree that there is monetary compensation to be had, civil suits are sufficient for the task.

Rather, the point of these prosecutions -- like those of executives at WorldCom, Tyco and Adelphia -- is to burn into the consciousness of all those other masters of the corporate universe that they, too, could wind up in the federal pokey if they try to enrich themselves at the expense of shareholders, creditors and employees.

For all the nuance and sophistication of our legal system, the convictions of Lay, Skilling, Bernard Ebbers, Dennis Kozlowski, the Rigases and the Arthur Andersen accounting firm amount to nothing more than old-fashioned hangings in the public square. They are the way by which a capitalist society gets its most powerful economic actors to abide by the rules that make free markets work. They are less about justice than they are about sustaining a system that fundamentally rests on a foundation of trust. And as we've seen time and again -- during the junk-bond scandal, the savings and loan debacle, the Asian financial crisis and the bursting of the Internet bubble -- when that trust evaporates, entire businesses and markets can quickly collapse.

The defense of selective prosecution, like Churchill's famous defense of democracy, is that the alternatives are even worse.

Relying simply on civil prosecution -- the approach favored by much of the business community -- would provide only a modest deterrent. After all, the hundreds of millions of dollars in fines extracted from Fannie Mae or the old Computer Associates, for example, is merely money out of the pockets of the shareholders who were the biggest victims. And in those cases in which corporate executives are forced to disgorge all their ill-gotten gains, the unspoken message is that the worst that can happen if you get caught stealing cookies from the jar is that you only have to put back what took.

On the other hand, it's simply not possible to prosecute every company and every executive during those frothy periods when corporate misbehavior becomes commonplace. It took dozens of lawyers and FBI agents more than four years to investigate and prosecute the fraudsters at just one company, Enron. And there aren't enough jail cells in all of Christendom to hold all the corporate executives who engaged in "earnings management" during the late 1990s.

So, we are left with the imperfect justice of selective prosecution. That was certainly the case in the 1980s, when Michael Milken, Ivan Boesky, Dennis Levine and Drexel Burnham Lambert had to pay for the sins of legions of junk-bond traders and corporate raiders. That was followed by the S&L crisis, when Charles Keating took the criminal heat for countless executives and directors before his conviction was overturned on appeal.

And, by and large, it worked. After a rocky start, junk bonds are now a staple of corporate finance and a part of many diversified investment portfolios. And despite a prolonged period of loose money and surging real estate prices, there have been almost no failures of banks or thrifts. And even while debate continues on the wisdom and fairness of the criminal prosecution of Arthur Andersen, I think you'd have a hard time today finding a partner at one of the remaining big accounting firms who would risk turning a blind eye to a suspicious off-balance-sheet transaction.

There is, however, one set of professionals up to their knickers in corporate misdeeds who have not only escaped responsibility, but may have actually profited from the prosecution of others. I refer, of course, to the lawyers.

By hiding behind attorney-client privilege and insisting that they are subject only to discipline by captive and incompetent state regulators, few lawyers, if any, have been held to account for their prominent role in blessing and hiding corporate fraud. Four years ago, the American Bar Association asked that lawyers be allowed to police themselves. Now that self-regulation has failed so miserably, the lawyers who run the Securities and Exchange Commission need to set aside their professional loyalties and bar a few $750-an-hour attorneys from providing any more advice and services to publicly held companies.

Masters Of The Universe, Unite! (NYT)

By James P. Othmer

HOUSTON, we have a verdict. And, if you care about the very future of American business, we also have a bit of a problem.

Because this is about much more than the fate of Kenny Boy Lay and Jeff Skilling. This is about us. The Masters of the Universe. The all-knowing, type-A power mongers in crimson suspenders with bottomless expense accounts. This is about the fate of the prickly, unapologetic, rule-averse tough guys like you and me who run this country, not because we're particularly talented or charming, but because we have the gift of arrogance. And, until noon Eastern Standard Time yesterday, we were able to wield it like a sword, a pink slip or a box full of Internet stock options, circa 1997.

But now the arrogance card — our arrogance card — is being threatened by so-called rules and accountability and an eight-woman, four-man jury's interpretation of the truth. Some might say this is not a good day for those of us with the corporate jets, the wardrobe and decorating allowance, the "other" set of books. Some might say this is not a good day for creative accountants, for selling stock while telling your shareholders it's a bargain, and for everyone with the good old American audacity to ignore their lawyers' advice to take the Fifth.

Indeed, some might even say this is not a good day for those entertaining clients with the corporate card in the V.I.P. room, or for the strippers whose livelihoods depend on them.

But not me. No sir. Are we to give up the very arrogance that got us here just because a few insanely rich, pathologically correct men have fallen? Some might say our friends at Enron fell because they had it coming. But the truly arrogant, we know better. We say it would never happen to us, because we'd never have gotten caught. And if by some fluke we did, we would have handled it differently.

So, on this somewhat troubling day, I implore you, fellow universe shapers, do not squander your audacity, your pomposity, your God-given right to make bear-hug deals. I urge you to hold fast to your smug demeanor, your all-knowing smirk. Hold fast to your arrogance, or before you know it we'll be outsourcing that to Bangalore, too.

Shed no tears this morning for Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. Keep your chin up — way up — and as an affirmation of our way, do something to make the most out of our special gift. Rather than giving in and playing along with someone's idea of a code of ethics, may I suggest telling your secretary that you've got to go out for "a very important meeting" and getting an early start on this long weekend, on the company. Maybe go antiquing for "office furniture." Or charge a big old lunch with a fictional client. Or head over to the V.I.P. room of the nearest upscale gentleman's sports cabaret and run a tab on the corporate plastic. Do it for capitalism. Do it for America. Do it for Kenny Boy.

Editorial: Enron Fraud: Guilty As Charged (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, May 26, 2006

Guilty, guilty, guilty. Ken Lay, Jeffrey Skilling and the political-economic scam of deregulation all received proper verdicts Thursday.

The convictions of former Enron execs Lay and Skilling provide some justice for Washingtonians bilked by the Western energy crisis. Even within perhaps the worst-led Justice Department in U.S. history, enough capable, dedicated, honest prosecutors remain to win difficult convictions. Jurors saw through the defense's attempts at explanations, evasions and excuses.

A judge set a Sept. 11 sentencing date for Lay and Skilling. They deserve something on the order of the 25-year term awaiting former WorldCom head Bernard Ebbers for another financial fraud.

While their prison terms will be a measure of justice, the public will never receive anything close to adequate recompense for tens of billions lost in the energy crisis of 2000-01. Manipulation by energy trading companies, withholding of supplies by energy producers and California's failed deregulation plan all contributed heavily to the enormous run-up in prices. What was once explained as a "perfect storm" of events now looks more like a series of political sellouts, misjudgments and not-so-perfect crimes.

The Enron convictions should provide a lifetime worth of lessons for corporations, aspiring executives and business schools. Investors also ought to be more cautious about investing in clever trading schemes rather than services. Just don't count on it.

The 1990s' boom brought a renewal of a longstanding U.S. tendency for politicians to let down their guard about corporate influence. Some of the blame goes to Clinton Democrats who curried corporate favor by going along with right-wing dogma of deregulation.

But the larger and continuing scandal belongs to Republicans and the Bush administration, which still runs an Enron-approved energy program. President Bush took Lay's word on whom to appoint as his first head of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Vice President Dick Cheney has covered up the details of how he let Enron, oil companies and other big contributors design Bush's energy policy.

Since the energy crisis, U.S. Sen. Maria Cantwell, Rep. Jay Inslee and other leaders from this state have fought to restore fairness to utility regulation nationally. The verdicts in Texas show the rightness of their cause, even if a political victory for consumer justice remains unlikely with today's Congress and administration.

Fannie Mae Board Reverses; CEO Mudd Won't Head Probe (DOW)

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029928

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Reversing course Thursday, Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen B. Ashley said chief executive officer Daniel H. Mudd won't lead the company's investigation into who should be fired or punished because of the housing giant's $10.6 billion accounting scandal.

Instead, Ashley said that four independent board members who have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) in the last 18 months would spearhead the probe.

"The board and myself have developed our thinking further for how a review of the personnel mentioned in the OFHEO report would be handled," Ashley said in an interview.

Ashley said the board decided to change its plans on Wednesday, one day after he said on an analyst call that Mudd would lead the review.

He said the decision was "internal" and didn't come from pressure by regulators or lawmakers.

The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight and the Securities and Exchange Commission fined Fannie Mae (FNM) $400 million Tuesday for "deliberately and systematically" creating earnings "illusions" to hit targets from 1998 through 2004.

Reaching these targets triggered millions of dollars in bonuses for senior Fannie Mae (FNM) executives.

Mudd, who was chief operating officer at the time, received $14.5 million in bonuses and rewards tied to Fannie Mae's (FNM) ability to hit the earnings targets.

Ashley said the board's decision to retain Mudd does not exempt him from a review of the bonuses he earned and possible disgorgement.

"Yes, he'll be treated like everyone else," Ashley said.

Coinciding with the fine, the mortgage giant's board vowed to review all the current employees and directors mentioned in a 340-page report issued by OFHEO.

When Ashley originally said Mudd would lead the review, it sparked allegations that his oversight would be tainted because of his senior role when the reported accounting manipulation occurred.

"It's hard to imagine that someone who was working at a senior level - during the time that many of these unethical practices took place - can really lend an unbiased eye to the situation," Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., said in an interview Thursday.

Mudd's name appeared in the report nearly 90 times, more frequently than any other executive still with the company.

The board's probe will now be led by directors Dennis Beresford, former head of the Financial Accounting Standards Board, Greg C. Smith, vice chairman of Ford Motor Co., Bridget A. Macaskill, principal of BAM Consulting LLC, and John K. Wulff, chairman of Hercules Inc.

All have joined Fannie Mae (FNM) since December 2004.

Ashley would not comment on whether the report should lead to anyone being forced from the company.

"I'm not going to comment on that at all," he said. "That would front-run the work of the committee."

He said, though, that the board was not going to rethink its Tuesday decision to retain Mudd as chief executive officer. After Ashley offered his unwavering support for Mudd during the analyst call, Robert J. Lacoursiere, an equity research principal at Banc of America Securities, said it seemed premature.

"It has the appearance of a summary dismissal of OFHEO's concerns," he said in an interview. "We think this is more reminiscent of the old, kind of arrogant Fannie Mae (FNM), as opposed to the new, humbler Fannie Mae (FNM)."

Armando Falcon, the former director of OFHEO who started the Fannie Mae (FNM)investigation, agreed.

"The board's quick absolvement of Dan Mudd doesn't seem in the spirit of the agreement," he said.

Ashley conceded the process was expedited but said it was measured.

He said board members met Monday, one day before the report was released, and reviewed the findings, specifically focusing on Mudd's role during the accounting scandal. Each report had red stickers that marked the pages where Mudd's name was mentioned.

The report does not appear to implicate Mudd as being directly involved in the accounting manipulation, but it does fault several of the decisions he made as one of the company's top executives.

For example, the report said Mudd and another Fannie executive launched a " flawed investigation" into an employee's concerns about bad accounting.

In that case, the report said "Mr. Mudd did not comply with Fannie Mae's (FNM) Code of Business Conduct" in the way he handled the situation.

Referencing the anecdote at a press conference Tuesday, OFHEO acting director James B. Lockhart said this was something Fannie Mae's (FNM) board "has to look into."

The report also cited an e-mail from Mudd describing conversations he had with an unnamed Treasury Department official "what to do if OFHEO is not falling in line."

The board also conferred Monday with former Sen. Warren Rudman, who compared the OFHEO report with a lengthy report he released three months earlier.

Rudman, who worked with a team from Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, said there was very little new material in the OFHEO report regarding Mudd that had not already been brought to the board's attention.

He acknowledged, though, that his review did not include any analysis of Fannie Mae's (FNM) lobbying efforts and that his team did not know Mudd had contacted the Treasury Department official.

"That one issue was something I learned of for the first time reading the OFHEO report," Rudman said.

Ashley said the board had already conducted extensive reviews of Mudd - even searching his home computer - when they were considering whether to install him as chief executive officer last year.

"At the conclusion of the review, I was satisfied that I could give my full confidence in Dan's leadership, and that was the consensus of the board," Ashley said.

After discussing Dan's role in the report during an hour-long executive session later Monday, the board decided Mudd would stay, Ashley said.

"Given the importance of this company in the credit market, in the housing market, and with our shareholder community - and with the employees, the 5,000 plus employees of the company, it is in my mind...very important to bring closure to the Dan leadership question and do it quickly, but appropriately," he said.

He would not say if any board members questioned Mudd's leadership or asked for more time during the closed-door meeting.

"I'm not going to go into the discussion within the board room with you," he said.

Mudd, who serves on the board in addition to being CEO, was not allowed to attend the internal discussions when his future was debated.

An OFHEO spokeswoman would not comment for this story, but during a press conference Tuesday, Lockhart said Fannie Mae's (FNM) board would have to report the findings of its review back to the agency.

"The board of directors, as part of the agreement, will be looking at present management that is also mentioned in the report," he said. "As said, if the company doesn't do it, OFHEO will do it, and I'm sure the SEC will be working on other aspects of what this previous management did."

Lockhart said Mudd was "doing a good job of trying to turn around this operation," but would not comment on Mudd's role in the accounting scandal.

The SEC and Justice Department are both looking into the roles individuals played in the accounting scandal. Tuesday's agreement only settled allegations against the company.

Under the agreement, Fannie Mae's (FNM) board has 30 days to notify OFHEO which officials are under review and then another 120 days to conduct its review.

"Such report shall include plans to seek restitution, disgorgement or other remedies to recover funds" from individuals, said the agreement, which Mudd, Ashley and Lockhart signed.

. . . And The Beltway Version (WSJ)

Some are calling yesterday's Enron verdicts the end of the corporate scandal era, but there's at least one big case still pending: Fannie Mae.

The mortgage giant's regulator issued its long-awaited, 340-page report on the company's $10.8 billion accounting woes this week, and the news is that the internal rot is even worse than we ever imagined. This is the Beltway's Enron, yet the political class still hasn't fixed the core problem, which is Fannie's political protection.

For years, Fannie's backers sneered at critics -- including such worrywarts as Alan Greenspan -- by claiming the company was so good at what it did that there was no reason to fret about its accounting, much less any "systemic risk" to the larger financial system. However, the Ofheo (Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight) report makes clear that Fannie's core expertise was manipulating its earnings and rigging the politics. The management of credit risk that was supposed to be its stock-in-trade was way down the list.

This should worry us all, especially taxpayers who will be on the hook if Fannie or its sibling Freddie Mac get into trouble. For years Fannie boasted of steady profits and consistent growth. But the report makes clear that Fannie Mae's officers made those numbers up in order to pad their own compensation.

This is not merely an "accounting problem," as some of Fannie's friends would have it. The earnings manipulation became necessary because the underlying business was not making its targets. What's more, Fannie underinvested in the systems and technology that any company concerned about staying on top of the largest privately issued pool of debt in the country would want to have.

The company also tied the compensation of its internal auditors to the same earnings per share targets that determined executive bonuses -- which is the definition of a conflict of interest. And people like then-COO (and current CEO) Daniel Mudd failed to react to questions raised inside the company about its accounting practices. In one revealing internal memo after everything began to unravel, Mr. Mudd acknowledged that the "political reality was that we always won, we took no prisoners, and we faced little organized political opposition."

Fannie Mae also took steps to ensure that a nominally independent board of directors was nothing of the sort. Frederick Malek, a supposedly independent director between 2002 and 2004, was a business partner with then-CEO Franklin Raines. Kenneth Duberstein, White House chief of staff at the end of the Reagan administration, was both a board member and a paid lobbyist for the company.

Over the years covered by the report, Fannie's board and executive ranks featured some of the most prominent names in Democratic Party politics, as well as a few big-name Republicans. Jamie Gorelick, most recently of 9/11 Commission conflict-of-interest fame, was made Vice Chairman of the Board the same year she left the Clinton Justice Department. James Johnson, who was Fannie's CEO through much of the 1990s, had been a close adviser to former Vice President Walter Mondale and was also an adviser to Presidential candidate John Kerry in 2004. On the other side of the aisle, Board member Anne McLaughlin Korologos was a Reagan-era Labor Secretary.

What these men and women all have in common is that their main expertise wasn't financial but political. They had the experience and contacts to maintain the taxpayer subsidy and weak regulation that fueled Fannie's growth and made its executives super-rich.

Looking ahead, Ofheo calls on the board to claw back the tens of millions in bonuses that executives like Mr. Raines reaped through earnings management. But on the evidence of manipulation in the report, that will be the least of it. The Justice Department is continuing to investigate, and criminal charges shouldn't be ruled out.

Ofheo also called for all current employees named in the report to be investigated by the company. But Chairman of the Board Stephen Ashley quickly expressed his confidence in CEO Mudd, despite Mr. Mudd's repeated and unflattering appearances in the report. It's hard for us to see how Mr. Mudd can be a credible reformer. Ofheo has also done the right thing in demanding that Fannie freeze the growth of its portfolio of mortgage-backed securities, which have been the main source of both its growth and, we now know, its accounting woes (because it hedges the risks of those MBSs with derivatives it had no clue how to account for).

The larger story here is that Fannie Mae is less a corporate outrage than a political one. It is the tale of a company that has grown rich off an implicit taxpayer subsidy and then plowed those profits back into buying political protection in Congress and feckless regulation from the executive. Ofheo only rose to the occasion thanks to the prodding of a few souls in Congress and the press, and only after Freddie Mac's own accounting blew up. Even now, a bipartisan coalition in the House and Senate is protecting the companies from genuine supervision. That's the real scandal.

House Committee Holds Heated Session On Corporate Execs' Pay Packages (LAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, The Associated Press

AP, May 26, 2006

Lawmakers on Thursday addressed an issue that rankles company shareholders and the public -- executive pay packages and perks -- at a time when revelations of excess surface almost daily.

A senior Democrat, Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, wants Congress to give shareholders a greater say over executive compensation.

"There have clearly been abuses," Frank said at the start of a hearing by the House Financial Services Committee. The session became an impassioned debate between Democrats and Republicans over the morality of lavish compensation, an argument portrayed by panel members as a clash between faith in capitalism and advocacy of socialism.

Frank had earlier used a parliamentary rule to force the majority Republican leaders of the committee to convene the hearing.

The partisan rhetoric flew, as befits an election year. Countering Frank's legislative proposal, Republicans disclosed that they have a bill of their own in the works: one that would rein in trial lawyers, a group that is a perennial ally of Democrats and generous contributor to their campaigns.

Don't blame the corporate executives, said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. By targeting companies in lawsuits, "Trial lawyers are the ones who are sopping up investor wealth in this country."

Business interests reject Frank's proposal for shareholder input.

"If we adopted a system where small groups of activist shareholders used the process to politicize corporate decision-making, the consequences could very well be destabilizing" for companies, testified Thomas Lehner, director of public policy for the Business Roundtable, a group representing CEOs of major companies. "... We should not ruin our free-market system because of a few rogues. We strongly believe that the current system has worked well and should not be changed."

Lehner's view was echoed by several Republican members of the committee.

The subject clearly hits a nerve with Americans, who hear reports almost daily of excessive pay and perks for executives while their companies stumble, lay off employees or renege on billions of dollars in pension obligations for workers' retirement. The chasm between executives' salaries and the pay of rank-and-file employees continues to widen.

"Marie Antoinette would be embarrassed," Nell Minow, who heads the Corporate Library, a business governance group, told the hearing.

It was held the same day that a federal jury in Houston convicted former Enron Corp. chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling of conspiracy and securities fraud in one of the biggest business scandals in U.S. history, involving a company that became a notorious symbol of corporate greed.

Meanwhile, the number of public companies ensnared in a federal investigation into the timing of stock option grants to their executives continues to grow. More than a dozen companies -- from high-flying technology names to a pharmacy benefits manager -- have received inquiries from federal prosecutors in New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission seeking details on how they grant stock options.

The companies -- the biggest so far is UnitedHealth Group Inc. -- are being examined to determine whether they boosted executives' payoff from stock options by backdating the grants to coincide with a point where corresponding stock prices had dropped to lows.

But the lawmakers reserved their greatest scorn for Lee Raymond, the recently retired chairman of Exxon Mobil Corp., who received a package of nearly $400 million, including salary, bonus, stock options and a one-year $1 million consulting deal.

"We've got a problem here," said Rep. David Scott, D-Ga., noting that Raymond's compensation works out to more than $144,000 a day while angry consumers pay over $3 a gallon for gasoline and are outraged by his pay package.

"It is important for the sanctity of the markets" for companies to disclose executives' pay, Scott said.

The SEC proposed in January the biggest changes since 1992 in rules governing disclosure of executive compensation. The rule changes would require companies to disclose far more details about their executives' pay packages and perks.

"I have a feeling that when people are forced to undress in public, they'll pay more attention to their figures," SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said recently.

But Frank insists that the SEC plan doesn't go far enough. His proposed legislation would call for disclosure of more information on executive pay packages. It would also require shareholder approval of executive compensation plans.

The bill's legislative prospects, however, are in doubt because it has drawn most of its support from minority Democrats.

On Thursday, Home Depot Inc.'s chief executive, Bob Nardelli, did little to quell an uproar among some shareholders over his pay, stifling debate at the company's annual meeting as the board members who approved the compensation didn't show up to defend themselves. Nardelli has received $123.7 million in compensation, excluding stock option grants, since taking over as CEO in December 2000. The company's stock price has dropped 9 percent over that period on a split-adjusted basis.

Former Wal-Mart Exec Faces Fraud Sentence Aug. 11 (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcus Kabel, Ap Business Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

(AP) - SPRINGFIELD, Missouri-A federal judge has set a sentencing hearing Aug. 11 for Thomas Coughlin, the former No. 2 executive at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., who pleaded guilty in January to fraud and tax charges for stealing money, gift cards and merchandise from the world's largest retailer.

Coughlin, 57, faces a maximum of 28 years in prison after pleading guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of filing a false tax return. He also could be fined $1.35 million (â,¬1 million).

U.S. District Judge Robert Dawson, who accepted Coughlin's guilty plea in January, set the sentencing hearing for Aug. 11 in his courtroom in Fort Smith, Arkansas.

Prosecutors have recommended a sentence but Dawson sealed the plea agreement pending a presentencing report.

DOJ_NMG_0029932

Wal-Mart referred Coughlin to federal prosecutors after discovering Coughlin allegedly had embezzled money from the company and used expense vouchers to buy products as varied as snakeskin boots, hunting trips and Bloody Mary cocktail mix. Wal-Mart estimated losses at up to $500,000. (â,¬392,000).

Wal-Mart Chief Executive Lee Scott has called the ordeal "an embarrassment" for himself and for the company.

Coughlin was a protege of company founder Sam Walton. As vice chairman, he received a base salary of $1.03 million (â,¬807,500) in his final year with the company. He received more than $3 million (â,¬2.35 million) in bonuses and other income in the same period and held about $20 million (â,¬15.7 million) in Wal-Mart stock, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

In documents filed with the court, Coughlin specifically admitted defrauding the company to pay for the care of his hunting dogs, lease a private hunting area, upgrade his pickup truck, buy liquor and a cooler, and receive $3,100 (â,¬2,430) in cash.

Coughlin retired as Wal-Mart vice chairman last year and gave up his spot on the company board in March after Wal-Mart referred him to prosecutors. The matter was taken up by a grand jury in Fort Smith.

In November, former Coughlin subordinate Robert E. Hey Jr. agreed to plead guilty to wire fraud and testify for the government in return for parole instead of prison time.

Besides giving the case to federal prosecutors, Bentonville, Arkansas-based Wal-Mart filed suit last year to end Coughlin's multimillion-dollar retirement agreement and to recover money.

However, that lawsuit was dismissed by an Arkansas judge who said both sides had signed a pledge as part of Coughlin's retirement deal not to pursue any claims against each other for any reasons. Wal-Mart has appealed the dismissal of its lawsuit to the Arkansas Supreme Court.

No mention was made in Coughlin's public filings with the court of his earlier claim that he used money obtained from Wal-Mart to pay for anti-union activism. Wal-Mart has said there was no such project.

$363M Is Average Pay For Top Hedge Fund Managers (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW YORK — James Simons, a mathematician turned money manager who prefers hiring Ph.D.s over MBAs, inched out oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens Jr. as the world's best-paid hedge fund manager in 2005, collecting an estimated $1.5 billion, according to rankings released today by Institutional Investor's Alpha magazine.

In rising to the top of what amounts to a who's who list of the secretive hedge fund world, Simons, of Renaissance Technologies, unseated 2004's top earner and first-ever billion-dollar man, Edward Lampert of ESL Investments, who is best known for buying Kmart and masterminding the blockbuster deal to buy Sears. Lampert's earnings dipped to an estimated $425 million last year, down from $1.0 billion in 2004.

Pickens also topped $1 billion, earning an estimated $1.4 billion. The average pay of the 26 (there was a tie for 25th place) on the list was $363 million, up 45% from $251 million in 2004.

Other big-name managers with big-time reputations in the top 10 included: financier George Soros, who was named “the man who broke the Bank of England” in 1992 after a winning bet against the British pound netted him more than $1 billion; Steven Cohen of SAC Capital Advisors, whom BusinessWeek called “the most powerful trader on Wall Street you've never heard of” in a July 2003 cover story; and legendary trader Paul Tudor Jones II. “These top earners are the best of the best, the real superstars,” says Ryan Pearson, senior vice president at hedge fund consultancy Greenwich-Van Advisors.

The surge in pay comes amid an explosive growth in the industry, which now has roughly 8,000 funds and $1.2 trillion in assets. A lucrative business model for hedge fund managers, which, on average, entitles them to 2% of assets under management and 20% of the profit, makes these large paydays possible, Peltz says. A $10 billion fund would earn $200 million from the 2% management fee alone. Super-successful managers charge even more. Simons, the No. 1 earner last year, charges a 5% management fee and 44% of profits, Alpha's Peltz says.

Simons, whose firm, Peltz quips, has enough “rocket scientists to run their own space program,” makes its money trading “often and frequently” with the help of computers, trying to capture small price movements. Pickens profited from the boom in energy prices.

The managers didn't just line their own pockets. “I suspect they have made more money for their clients than themselves,” says Charles Davidson, hedge fund director at Standard & Poor's.

Charity Invites Donors To 'Kick The Tires' And Squeeze The Cash Register (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — As slides with bullet points and pie charts flashed behind his head, Thomas Tighe meticulously laid out the financial affairs of the charity he runs, Direct Relief International.

"We are a public corporation," Mr. Tighe told the audience of more than 200 donors. "No one has a stronger interest in our doing good than you, because you've invested in it."

For the last four years, Direct Relief, which provides donated medicine and medical supplies to communities around the world, has held a "shareholders' meeting" for contributors to demonstrate its accountability and to burnish its relationship with its donors.

One donor, Jude Blau, says he likes the meeting because it is informative and different from the typical interaction he and his wife, Mary Jane, have with other charities.

"The trouble is that a lot of them are locked into these very expensive fund-raisers and benefits and so forth," Mr. Blau said. "Direct Relief does something different, and I think organizations that do well and have innovative thinking like this are great. It's better than sending out address labels."

H. Art Taylor, president and chief executive of BBB Wise Giving Alliance, a watchdog group, said if more charities adopted this approach, "there would be a lot less questions about what nonprofits are doing with their resources and a lot less skepticism about the sector in general."

Last year, Direct Relief received $15.7 million in cash, stock and investment income and $121.5 million in donated supplies. "For every $1 we spent," Mr. Tighe said, "$25.50 in aid went out the door."

The charity began holding the shareholders' meetings to expand its appeal to donors locally and beyond. They were the brainchild of Barry Kravitz, a money manager who was then on the board.

"I told them it was really important for people to be able to come here and kick the tires," Mr. Kravitz said. "What you're doing as contributors, you really are investing in this company, and so you're interested in what your investment is doing."

Direct Relief invites representatives of the organizations it has supported to attend the meetings and explain how the charity has assisted them, as well as to offer primers on the challenges they face in providing health services in impoverished and conflict-ravaged countries.

Dr. Jerome Sulubani, a pediatrician at the Mansa General Hospital in Zambia, told donors how a premature baby who weighed roughly one pound at birth had survived as a result of an incubator donated by Direct Relief, the first his hospital had. "Today, that girl is in primary school," Dr. Sulubani said.

Direct Relief works with pharmaceutical companies and medical equipment manufacturers to get products needed by medical professionals like Dr. Sulubani who lack the basic tools to do their jobs.

"We're kind of a Costco for poor countries' health services," said Mr. Tighe (pronounced TYG, as in tiger).

The money it receives, from $3 million to $4.5 million in an average year, is used for overhead costs and to transport supplies. Donors like the idea that their money helps more than $100 million of donated goods get to needy people. "It's a huge selling point, that the money is so well used," said Kate Firestone, a donor and board member.

Ms. Firestone was among the board members who elected to cover many of the costs Direct Relief incurred in responding to the tsunami that struck the Indian Ocean rim at the end of 2004.

Donors provided $14 million for the tsunami victims — roughly three times what the charity raises in a normal year. The board decided that every penny should go into the relief effort, in part because that was what donors expected and in part to build long-lasting relationships.

The board covered the costs of bank charges, credit card fees, processing receipts for donors, additional accounting and other expenses related to managing the tsunami-related gifts. Direct Relief did not pay any part of its staff salaries from them.

"This was cash in excess of what we traditionally get, so we had to think through what we should morally, ethically and responsibly do with it," Mr. Tighe said. "As one board member said at the time, 'This is not our money.' "

At the shareholders' meeting, Mr. Tighe reported that about 9 percent of the donors who gave to Direct Relief for the first time after the tsunami later gave it money or in-kind donations for its routine operations.

"For probably most of our history, we were primarily supported by people living in Santa Barbara," said Mr. Tighe, who joined Direct Relief in 2000 from the Peace Corps, where he was chief of staff and chief operating officer. "We had never had an ability to get in touch with folks outside our very local area."

That all changed before the tsunami, when Google gave the charity one of its coveted Google Grants, essentially free advertising on the search engine's Web site. Mr. Tighe said the organization's national reach, while still small, has increased ever since.

It received $4.73 million designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, even though it is mainly known as an international relief organization, and it used the money to get medicine and medical supplies to doctors on the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The tsunami and Hurricane Katrina put the charity in the business of providing grants to local organizations. In Sri Lanka, such money bought five ambulances for a local charity and trained 16 emergency medical technicians and 20 first aid responders to operate them.

In Mississippi, it bought coats.

"I knew Direct Relief dealt with medicines and physicians, but I called Chris anyway," recalled Rhonda McNair, executive director of the Reuben T. Morris Wellness Foundation, referring to Chris Brady, Direct Relief's vice president for programs. Direct Relief gave the Wellness Foundation $82,061, about $500 of which was used to buy coats.

"Today is when we get the connection between our money and what happens to it," said Nancy Walker-Koppelman, a donor. "I had no idea that we gave money to buy coats."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Orders FBI-Congress Documents Sealed (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

President Bush stepped into a confrontation between the Justice Department and Congress on Thursday, ordering that documents seized in an FBI raid on a lawmaker's office be sealed for 45 days.

His spokesman also labeled as "false, false, false" charges that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' department had tried to intimidate Republican House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

In an effort to defuse an intensifying, election-year dispute between the Republican-led Congress and his administration, Bush, facing growing complaints from lawmakers in both parties that he has abused presidential powers, called for a cooling-off period.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," he said in a statement. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

Republican officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said Vice President Dick Cheney had become involved as the administration worked to ease the anger of the speaker, who has enormous control over the president's legislative agenda.

Bush granted one of Hastert's demands, directing the FBI to surrender documents and computerized records taken last weekend from the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La. He ordered Solicitor General Paul Clement, who has a separate office in the Justice Department, to take custody of them.

The president said no one is above the law and that he continued to support the investigation of Jefferson. The eight-term congressman is accused of accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars to facilitate a telephone investment deal in Africa.

"Those who violate the law — including a member of Congress — should and will be held to account," the president said. "This investigation will go forward and justice will be served."

Within minutes, the heads of the battling institutions stood down and began talking about solutions.

Hastert said the order would "give us some time to step back and try to negotiate with the Department of Justice."

Gonzales said the move provides "time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

The FBI said it would comply with Bush's order.

Jefferson called the order "a good first step but ultimately, the answer would be to return the documents."

The time-out came five days after the FBI, acting on a search warrant signed a week ago by a federal judge, raided Jefferson's office as part of the bribery investigation.

In an affidavit supporting the search warrant, the FBI said it had videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in bribe money and that agents had found $90,000 of that cash stuffed in a freezer in his home.

Two people have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote the high-tech business venture in Africa. One of them, Brett Pfeffer, a former aide to the congressman, was scheduled to be sentenced Friday in Alexandria, Va. Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

Historians said the raid was the first such search of a House or Senate member's office since the first Congress convened 219 years ago.

Its unprecedented nature and the lack of notice given Hastert set off loud complaints from both Republicans and Democrats that the administration was overstepping its authority.

More than a dozen agents who convened on Jefferson's office Saturday night conducted a search that stretched into Sunday morning. They took two boxes of paper records and made a copy of everything on Jefferson's personal computer, Robert Trout, Jefferson's lawyer, said in his legal filing Wednesday demanding the return of the materials.

The only items specifically identified by Trout as having been taken by the FBI are letters requesting donations to the legal defense fund Jefferson created to defray his legal bills.

The FBI and prosecutors refused to allow lawyers for Jefferson or the House of Representatives to be present for the search, Trout and House officials said.

Administration officials have said the White House did not know in advance of the raid. That suggested the ultimate authority for the event rested with Gonzales.

The dispute escalated all week. Hastert complained personally to Bush at least twice. He was joined Wednesday in rare agreement by his Democratic counterpart, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record) of California, in a statement demanding the FBI give back the material it seized.

On Thursday, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him after ABC News quoted unnamed top law enforcement officials as saying Wednesday the speaker was being investigated in a broad influence-peddling probe centered on convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Justice Department issued two denials of the report. Hastert demanded a retraction from the network, which refused. Hastert's lawyers threatened Thursday to sue the network. ABC again stood by its story.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Hastert said on Chicago's WGN radio.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the accusation "false, false, false."

"They're not leaking information to try to undermine the House speaker," Snow said. "I got pretty categorical denials."

Bush Puts Jefferson Documents On Ice Amid Heated Debate (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush intervened Thursday to defuse a dispute between congressional leaders and the Justice Department, ordering that documents seized in an unprecedented raid on a congressman's office be sealed for 45 days.

Congressional leaders, displaying rare bipartisan unity, accused the Justice Department of overstepping its authority and demanded the return of the material confiscated in a weekend search of the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who is under investigation for bribery.

"This period will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government," Bush said in a statement. "The Justice Department and the House of Representatives should continue their discussions and resolve this matter as quickly as possible."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., accepted the olive branch from the White House but said he stood by his position that the search warrant served on Jefferson was a violation of the "separation of powers" between Congress and the executive branch.

"This gives everybody a chance to step back," Hastert said after meeting with fellow Republicans, whose cheers at the announcement were audible outside their meeting room in the basement of the Capitol.

Hastert insisted he was defending the Constitution. "I taught it for 16 years," Hastert said. "We need to protect our Constitution. It's important that the people's records are protected."

The dispute began Saturday, when FBI agents served a search warrant on Jefferson's office and barred congressional officers -- including the House sergeant of arms and the Capitol Police -- from the site.

It is believed to be the only time in U.S. history that the executive branch has served a search warrant on a congressional office.

The Justice Department said the move was necessary after Jefferson had resisted a subpoena. Investigators already searched his home, where they retrieved $90,000 in marked bills wrapped in foil in his freezer. Earlier, he was videotaped accepting money from a Virginia businesswoman.

Congressional leaders argue that the Constitution protects lawmakers from such searches. They have offered to develop procedures for making available materials connected to a criminal investigation.

"Members were relieved to see the White House response," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo. "They believe it gives us a chance to find the proper way to view this material."

DOJ_NMG_0029936

Earlier in the day Thursday, Hastert used a radio interview to accuse officials in the Justice Department of seeking to intimidate him by leaking a false story to ABC News. The network reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating Hastert in connection with the influence-peddling investigation surrounding fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiring to bribe members of Congress and steal millions from American Indian tribes he represented. Abramoff is cooperating with federal investigators.

After the ABC News report, the Justice Department twice denied Hastert was under investigation. Hastert said the report was false, and his lawyers have demanded a retraction and threatened legal action.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to ... intimidate people, and we're just not going to be intimidated," Hastert told Chicago radio station WGN.

ABC News reported that investigators were examining a letter Hastert and others wrote in 2003 to the secretary of the Interior to block a casino on an Indian reservation that would have competed with tribes then represented by Abramoff. The letter was written shortly after a fundraiser for Hastert at a Washington restaurant Abramoff owned at the time.

An ABC News executive said the report was careful to avoid saying Hastert was a "target" or "subject" of the investigation. "We said he was 'in the mix' and that Abramoff had said things to federal investigators which have led them to look at a number of congressmen, including the speaker," said Jeffrey Schneider, an ABC News spokesman.

The Justice Department did not comment on Hastert's claim that the leak was an act of retribution.

White House officials would not say whether Bush had spoken personally to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Jefferson raid, but they said there had been "ongoing discussions" since the raid with officials from Justice and the House.

Bush ordered that the Office of the Solicitor General be responsible for ensuring that the documents remain under seal for 45 days. That office is an arm of the Justice Department that represents the government before the Supreme Court.

Gonzales, who approved the search of Jefferson's office, issued a statement saying he was satisfied with the president's decision.

"Throughout this discussion period with the Congress over the court-authorized search of Congressman Jefferson's office, the Justice Department has sought to protect the integrity of this important ongoing public corruption investigation," Gonzales said. "The president's order does that and provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

A government official, who requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Justice Department negotiators were adamant that the department not relinquish the seized materials, because it could compromise the investigation. The official said some senior department officials had been prepared to submit their resignations if Bush had ordered them returned.

Press Secretary Tony Snow has said the White House did not know about the search in advance. Thursday, he said the White House counsel's office first learned of the raid from an e-mail sent while agents were in Jefferson's office, stating simply that a search warrant was being executed.

Snow said Bush had decided to order the 45-day seal so the House and the Justice Department could "shift the focus from who gets the records right now to the more constructive task of working together to resolve the constitutional concerns of both sides."

"It became pretty obvious that this was a very complex issue, and it was necessary to give cooler heads time to prevail on it," Snow said. "We're getting into uncharted constitutional waters, and I think both sides want to reserve the integrity of their institutions."

Harvard Law Professor Charles Fried, solicitor general under the Reagan administration, said that he considered the House's legal arguments shaky -- but that Bush's actions were reasonable.

"It is something new, but in principle it strikes me as probably OK," Fried said. "No evidence is lost. (Jefferson) has no chance to flush any papers down the toilet. So it's all on ice, and people can figure it out."

Jefferson is accused of accepting cash in return for helping a Virginia businesswoman obtain contracts to provide mobile-phone and Internet services in the African countries of Ghana and Nigeria. Two Jefferson associates are cooperating with investigators, as is the businesswoman.

Members of Congress and their staff have expressed concern privately that the Justice Department was less interested in prosecuting Jefferson than in establishing a legal precedent that could be used in other investigations -- specifically the widening ethics investigation around lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Justice Department officials will not know until at least August about their legal rights to investigate lawmakers' offices.

Bush Seals Files Seized In FBI Probe Of Jefferson (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Jim Vandehei

DOJ_NMG_0029937

President Bush ordered the Justice Department yesterday to seal records seized from the Capitol Hill office of a Democratic congressman, representing a remarkable intervention by the nation's chief executive into an ongoing criminal probe of alleged corruption.

The order was aimed at quelling an escalating constitutional confrontation between the Justice Department and the House, where Republican and Democratic leaders have demanded that the FBI return documents and copies of computer files seized from the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

In a six-paragraph statement, Bush cast the dispute in historic terms and said he issued the order to give Justice Department officials and lawmakers more time to negotiate a compromise. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," Bush said. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The order capped five days of tumultuous negotiations involving the White House, the Justice Department and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who denounced the Saturday-night raid as an infringement on the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches and had joined Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in demanding that the seized documents be returned.

Bush hoped to mollify Hastert, one of his most reliable legislative allies, at a time of increasingly sour relations with the GOP-controlled Congress, according to White House sources. Tempers rose so high this week that some House Republicans threatened to seek the resignation of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, although GOP leaders said the idea was not seriously considered.

The agreement also marked a setback for the FBI and Justice Department, which had refused demands to return the materials -- and had resisted pressure from the White House to cordon them off, according to several officials familiar with the debate.

Bush signaled in his statement, however, that he expected the documents to eventually be made available to prosecutors. "Those who violate the law -- including a Member of Congress -- should and will be held to account," Bush said. "This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

The materials will be held by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who is not involved in the Jefferson probe, Bush's statement said.

Emerging from a House Republican meeting about the raid yesterday afternoon, Hastert said he welcomed Bush's 45-day hiatus as a cooling-off period that "gives everybody a chance to step back. I appreciate that."

In effect, Bush's order serves to grant a portion of a legal motion filed on Thursday by Jefferson, which asked that the materials seized by the FBI be locked in a secure place "to allow for full briefing and careful consideration by the court of the serious Constitutional issues and the unprecedented circumstances that give rise to this motion."

Robert P. Trout, Jefferson's attorney, called Bush's decision "a good start."

"It's not every day a lawyer has his motion granted by the president of the United States," Trout said. "We're obviously pleased with this decision."

Another potential entanglement with the FBI arose yesterday when the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported that federal agents are seeking to interview top House members from both parties as part of an investigation into leaks about the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program to the New York Times.

Jamal D. Ware, spokesman for the chairman of the House intelligence committee, Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), said the effort at the moment is to determine ground rules for the interviews, "to ensure that all constitutional issues are worked out beforehand so a thorough inquiry can move forward."

In the Jefferson case, the FBI has been investigating allegations that the New Orleans Democrat took hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in exchange for using his congressional influence to promote business ventures in Africa. Two people -- Brett Pfeffer and Vernon L. Jackson -- have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote iGate Inc., a Louisville-based company that was marketing Internet and cable television technology in Nigeria, Ghana and Cameroon.

Pfeffer, a former Jefferson legislative aide, is scheduled to be sentenced today in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing. But an 83-page affidavit used to raid his office Saturday said agents videotaped Jefferson last summer taking $100,000 in $100 denominations in bribe money. A few days later, agents found $90,000 of the money stuffed inside a freezer in his D.C. apartment.

Bush has been under heavy pressure from Hastert since Monday, when the president and the speaker appeared together at a Chicago speech, according to accounts from senior White House officials, who requested anonymity. On the ride home aboard Air Force One, Hastert was adamant that the Justice Department had violated the Constitution, and he implored the president to intervene, the sources said.

The next day, the two spoke by phone and Hastert told Bush that he and other leaders would only intensify their campaign to stop Justice from sifting through the materials seized in the weekend search, according to the accounts.

White House officials worked late into the night Wednesday and Thursday, trying to find a middle ground. One person said efforts to get the department to strike a compromise failed.

"Obviously, emotions were running high," the official said. "There was a sense of urgency."

Bush had Vice President Cheney call Hastert to inform him of his decision. The president sees the 45-day period as sufficient to resolve the constitutional questions without disrupting the Jefferson case, according to sources.

There have also been discussions between the White House and Hastert's office about possible legislation to set parameters on handling the unique situation of prosecutors seeking congressional materials, according to administration sources.

The negotiations angered many federal prosecutors and FBI agents, who believed that the search warrant for Jefferson's office, which was signed by Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, was lawful and necessary because of Jefferson's refusal to comply with a subpoena issued in August.

"Some people are definitely unhappy" with Bush's order, one law enforcement official said. "But if we can bring down the rhetoric and cool off, it may be better for everyone in the end."

Gonzales said in a statement that Bush's order will "protect the integrity" of the investigation, while providing "additional time to reach a permanent solution."

Legal experts said that Bush clearly has the legal authority to direct his Justice Department to do anything lawful with regard to an ongoing investigation.

To Ease Standoff, Bush Seals Seized Files (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And David Johnston

WASHINGTON, May 25 — President Bush intervened directly Thursday in an increasingly tense constitutional fight between Congress and the Justice Department by ordering that records seized from a Congressional office over the weekend be sealed for 45 days.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," Mr. Bush said in his first statement on the swirl of events surrounding the Federal Bureau of Investigation's search of the office of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, who has been accused of accepting bribes. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The president said that the material in question would be turned over for 45 days to the solicitor general, the Justice Department official who represents the government before the Supreme Court. That step would allow the Justice Department to say that it had not given up material regarded by prosecutors as lawfully obtained evidence needed for a criminal case.

The presidential intervention came as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, normally the administration's champion on Capitol Hill, suggested that the Justice Department had tried to intimidate him through a news leak because of his challenge of the agency's authority to conduct the search.

In one interview, the normally reticent speaker, an Illinois Republican, portrayed a report broadcast by ABC News on Wednesday evening as calculated retaliation and said that he had demanded a retraction. The Justice Department issued firm denials of the ABC report, which was attributed to anonymous federal sources and said Mr. Hastert was part of the inquiry into the activities of the convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In a morning interview with a radio station in his home state, WGN in Chicago, Mr. Hastert said, "This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people."

He stopped short of that charge when pressed later by reporters on the West Front steps of the Capitol. But he and his allies were clearly furious. "I don't know if this leak out of the Justice Department or wherever it came was a coincidence or not," Mr. Hastert said. "But I will let anybody else try to connect the dots."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said senior officials at the Justice Department had assured the White House there had been no effort to embarrass Mr. Hastert. "Just false, false, false," Mr. Snow said.

ABC News, meanwhile, continued to defend its report. "We stand by the story," said Jeffrey W. Schneider, vice president of ABC News. "We went back to our sources twice after our first report. They affirmed what we reported and what they had told us."

Before Mr. Bush's decision to step in, what law enforcement officials described as a tense drama had played out as Justice Department officials, backed by career prosecutors, refused to give up the material seized in the search of Mr. Jefferson's office. At one point, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general who was once chief counsel to the House majority leader, told Scott Palmer, chief of staff to Mr. Hastert, that he would quit rather than give up the materials to Mr. Jefferson.

By Wednesday evening, Justice Department lawyers and lawyers for the House had staked out nonnegotiable positions, with House lawyers demanding return of the Jefferson documents.

Justice lawyers, backed by the F.B.I., would not agree to hand over any of the material, which included a copy of the hard drive of Mr. Jefferson's office computer, along with calendars and date books.

Throughout Wednesday, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who had signed off on the search warrant of Mr. Jefferson's office, sought unsuccessfully to speak with Mr. Hastert. At the same time, Mr. McNulty, who has long-term Republican ties to Capitol Hill, sought to placate infuriated lawmakers.

The stalemate was broken Thursday morning, when White House aides suggested an intermediate step of turning the material over to the solicitor general. Sealing it for 45 days allows the House and the Justice Department to continue to discuss a more permanent resolution, which could be important in several other pending criminal inquiries that have focused on sitting House members of both parties.

Those include the influence-buying inquiry involving Mr. Abramoff, the convicted lobbyist, and the broadening investigation that grew out of the inquiry into the activities of Representative Randy Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who was a member of the House Appropriations Committee. Mr. Cunningham resigned his House seat last fall when he pleaded guilty to accepting more than $2 million in cash and gifts in return for steering contracts to political supporters.

At the F.B.I., officials said they would comply with the deal but complained privately that it would bar them from examining the materials discovered in the search for more than a month. Senior F.B.I. officials were not consulted in negotiations and regarded any effort to keep them from evidence as an unfair intrusion that could compromise their investigation.

The confrontation over the independence of the legislative branch from the executive branch, coming as Congress was busy trying to complete a full plate of legislation heading into a Memorial Day recess, was taking unusual twists.

Republicans were leading a challenge to the administration stemming from the criminal inquiry into a Democrat; Democrats were wrestling with how to separate themselves from Mr. Jefferson. And some were hinting that Republicans were more concerned with protecting themselves from future searches than with protecting the institution.

Mr. Bush took no sides in the fight but said the cooling-off period would "provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government." He also pledged that "this investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

In a statement, Mr. Gonzales said the search had been approved by a federal judge. But he said Mr. Bush's action "provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

Justice Department officials said the search of Mr. Jefferson's office was lawfully carried out on the basis of a warrant signed by Judge T. S. Ellis of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va. They said the search was intended to retrieve specific documents and e-mail messages that prosecutors hoped to find. Without identifying the documents, the officials said investigators had found what they were looking for.

Mr. Hastert and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, issued a joint statement, saying they had directed the House counsel to open negotiations with the Justice Department on "protocols and procedures to be followed in connection with evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members."

Mr. Bush sought to defuse the controversy as tempers were rising among House Republicans, both over the government search and what rank-and-file Republicans saw as poisonous treatment of Mr. Hastert, which could be a major problem for the administration as it tries to move legislation ahead. House Republicans met privately for more than an hour Thursday afternoon to explore the situation and hear the leadership's rationale for its strong opposition to the search.

Bush Seals Documents In Bribery Probe (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Seeking to quell a rebellion in Congress, President Bush took the extraordinary step Thursday of sealing for 45 days all the documents the FBI seized from Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office as part of a bribery investigation against the New Orleans Democrat.

Bush acted after an ugly confrontation developed between the administration and House leaders, including Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), over the constitutionality of the FBI's Saturday night raid in the House's Rayburn Office Building.

In a statement, the president said the 45-day period "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a co-equal branch of government."

In a letter to the administration on Wednesday, Hastert and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) charged that the Justice Department, in conducting the raid, had violated the doctrine of separation of powers between Congress and the executive branch and the debate and speech clause in the Constitution. They said the documents should be returned, even if the government is conducting a criminal investigation.

An obviously angry Hastert went one step further, saying in a radio interview with WGN in Chicago that it appeared administration officials had leaked a false story to ABC News on Wednesday suggesting he was under investigation in a congressional lobbying scandal in an apparent effort to intimidate him.

When asked later if the leak was retaliatory, Hastert said, "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect the dots any way they want to. I thought it was an interesting sequence of events." White House spokesman Tony Snow said the government did not leak information to undermine Hastert. "I got pretty categorical denials," Snow said.

In response to the ABC report, the Justice Department denied the speaker was under investigation.

Hastert had even sought a private audience with the president to complain about the FBI raid. Not all members of Congress agreed with the speaker, however, and several said in statements that they saw nothing wrong with a raid seeking to uncover criminality.

Still, the raid was widely criticized on Capitol Hill by both Democrats and Republicans. It was the first time in the 219 years of the House that the executive branch raided the office of a member of Congress. The department said it acted to obtain a search warrant after Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, refused to comply with a subpoena for various documents.

Abner Mika, White House counsel under President Bill Clinton and a former House member, praised the president's action. "I think it is a reasonable, temporary solution to the problem," he said. Mikva, who also was a federal judge, raised doubts about whether the constitutional provisions cited by Hastert and Pelosi cover illegal activity by a House member.

Charles Tiefer, a professor of government and law at the University of Baltimore and a former lawyer in the House counsel's office, said, "It's historic, striking, extraordinary and represents a classic effort by the chief executive to balance several of his responsibilities—on the one hand, to respect a coordinate branch of government, and at the same time to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Tiefer, scheduled to testify at a House Judiciary Committee hearing next week on the FBI raid, said he could not recall a president intervening by sealing seized papers.

"The overtones of a police raid like that directly on the Capitol grounds for the first time in history—especially with FBI agents slamming the door on the lawyer for the House, when she just wanted to watch what they were doing—bring to mind some of the aspects of living in a police state," Tiefer said.

Bush said the documents would remain in the custody of Solicitor General Paul Clement, who heads a separate office in the Justice Department and is not involved in the corruption probe involving Jefferson.

Bush did not cite a precedent for his action, but the president clearly was in a box, seeking to defend his own government's action even as numerous Republicans on Capitol Hill were riled over the raid.

"Let me be clear," Bush said. "Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously. Those who violate the law—including a member of Congress—should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward and justice will be served."

According to FBI statements filed in court, Jefferson, the first black congressman to be elected from Louisiana since Reconstruction, accepted $100,000 in bribes, and $90,000 in cash had been found in his freezer at his Washington apartment.

Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson to promote a business venture, but the congressman has denied allegations of wrongdoing.

Pelosi, who has alleged that the Republican majority is guilty of a "culture of corruption" as the result of lobbying scandals, pushed Jefferson on Wednesday to resign his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee. But the congressman refused to do so, saying he needed to represent his city as it tries to rebuild after Hurricane Katrina.

The Jefferson scandal, however, has given Republicans a way to counter Democratic charges about a culture of corruption under GOP control of Congress. That scandal involved influence-peddling by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the resignation of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

The speaker and Pelosi said House counsel Geraldine Gennet would meet with the Justice Department to resolve what to do with the papers seized in the raid on Jefferson's office.

A Justice Department official familiar with the negotiations with Congress said House leaders put the agency in an untenable position by demanding return of the Jefferson documents.

"Do you think there's any way the Justice Department would give incriminating documents back to an entity that the target is connected to? No way," said the source, who requested anonymity because of the delicacy of discussions between the House and the executive branch.

Bush Seeks To Defuse Conflict With House Over Seized Documents (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Trying to avert a showdown with the House of Representatives over the Constitution's powers, President Bush on Thursday ordered the FBI to stop examining files seized from a congressman's office last weekend while the House and the Justice Department negotiate a way out of their confrontation.

In a highly unusual intervention, the president ordered that files taken by the FBI from the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., be sealed for 45 days and held in the custody of the solicitor general.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., displayed rare bipartisan outrage this week over the FBI raid of Jefferson's office. They argued that it violated a fundamental principle of the U.S. Constitution - the independence of the three co-equal branches of government, legislative, executive and judicial. Never before has an executive police agency raided a congressional office.

"I recognize these are deeply held views," Bush said. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries."

In a joint statement following the president's announcement, Hastert and Pelosi said they had directed House lawyers to negotiate with the Justice Department to establish procedures for obtaining "evidence of criminal conduct that might exist in the offices of members."

Legal experts say the Justice Department could seek the appointment of a special master to examine the seized documents and determine which ones are relevant to the investigation.

According to lawmakers who were briefed by the Justice Department, the agents carted away one box of records from Jefferson's office.

The FBI-House confrontation has roiled Washington politics.

In a radio interview Thursday that his office distributed to reporters, Hastert suggested that a report by ABC News Wednesday evening linking him to a federal influence-peddling investigation was an attempt by Justice to bully him for his opposition to the FBI's raid on Jefferson's office.

The Justice Department denied that Hastert is under investigation shortly after the ABC News report.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people, and we're just not going to be intimidated by it," Hastert said on WGN radio in Chicago. "This is about trying to kind of smoke-screen some of the separation of power stuff that we're doing."

Some lawmakers have complained that the objections from Hastert and Pelosi appear self-serving and could prove to be politically embarrassing.

"They're saying a congressman's office is a safe haven ... sort of like an embassy, where traditionally you stash incriminating evidence," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La. "The position they seem to be taking is indefensible."

Because Jefferson is a Democrat, Hastert has some political cover. But the Justice Department is also investigating Republicans as an outgrowth of guilty pleas by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and some of his associates on charges that they illegally tried to influence legislative action.

Pelosi, meanwhile, has irritated some members of the Congressional Black Caucus, of which Jefferson is a member, for asking Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, which writes tax law. Several members of the caucus have complained that Jefferson hasn't been charged with a crime and that the accusations against him have nothing to do with his work on the committee.

An affidavit filed in court to obtain last weekend's search warrant accuses Jefferson of taking a $100,000 bribe. It says $90,000 in cash was discovered hidden in his home freezer.

Bush Seals FBI-seized Files In Bribery Probe (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday sealed the files the FBI seized from a Louisiana congressman's Capitol office as part of a bribery probe, saying the Justice Department and Congress should take 45 days to resolve the constitutional issues involved.

The White House has been stung by criticism from top Republicans that last week's nighttime raid of the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat, violated the separation of powers between the branches of government. Mr. Bush's action yesterday was both an acknowledgment that the move was unprecedented, and a plea for time for the parties to cool off.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries. Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out," Mr. Bush said yesterday afternoon.

He also said if the Justice Department and Congress can't resolve it, they should take it to court.

Under Mr. Bush's orders, the seized papers will be turned over to the Solicitor General's Office and no one will be allowed access to the files other than to preserve them.

"It's a big step in the right direction to try to diffuse the crisis that we have," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said of the 45-day freeze.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat -- the two lead critics of the raid, who earlier this week demanded the documents be returned -- said the House counsel will start negotiating with the Justice Department to reach a resolution.

Mr. Jefferson is the subject of an ongoing federal investigation.

House Republican leaders called their members to a meeting yesterday afternoon to discuss the situation. Afterward, Mr. Hastert said the 45-day freeze is "an agreement we can live with" and predicted a resolution is possible.

"I think there's a great appreciation of the 45 days and there's a great appreciation for the speaker's leadership on this," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said Mr. Bush's move "provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

Not all lawmakers, however, are opposed to the FBI's actions. Republican Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, was briefed yesterday by high-level Justice Department officials and said, "I feel more strongly than ever that that search was legal and constitutional."

He said that if lawmakers continue to complain, the American people will think Congress is trying to protect its own.

Some House Republicans also said it's politically bad for Republicans to be feuding. "I don't think we should be fighting with the FBI going into an election," said Rep. Joe Pitts, Pennsylvania Republican.

Meanwhile, Mr. Hastert yesterday accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because of his vocal outrage over the FBI search.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated," he told Chicago radio station WGN yesterday morning. Later, he said, "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to."

Mr. Hastert was referring to an ABC News story Wednesday that referred to an unnamed law-enforcement source as saying the Illinois Republican is part of the Justice Department's investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Soon after the story broke, the Justice Department issued a statement saying Mr. Hastert is not being investigated.

Mr. Hastert demanded a retraction of the story, which ABC stood behind. The speaker's lawyers yesterday threatened to sue ABC on libel and defamation charges.

Bush Intervenes In Constitutional Battle Over Congress Raid (AFP-Y2)

By Laurent Lozano

AFP, May 25, 2006

President George W. Bush stepped into a growing constitutional battle between the US Congress and criminal investigators over an unprecedented raid on a lawmaker's office.

Acknowledging that the problem was a first in US political history, Bush ordered the Justice Department to seal for 45 days documents and computer discs seized in the raid on the Congress office of a House of Representatives member.

Republican and Democratic leaders have said the raid represented unconstitutional interference by the executive branch into legislative activities and demanded that the Federal Bureau of Investigation return the material.

The operation late Saturday at the office of Representative William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), a Democrat from Louisiana suspected of corruption, was the first of its kind on the Congress building in the 219 year history of the US legislature, according to political experts.

"Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," said Bush, who still insisted that the investigation against Jefferson must go ahead.

"Today I am directing the Department of Justice to seal all the materials recovered from Congressman Jefferson's office for the next 45 days and not to allow access to anyone involved in the investigation," Bush said in a statement.

The materials are to be held by the solicitor general, who is not involved in the investigation.

Jefferson is accused of taking bribes for business deals in West Africa. In a search of his home last year, authorities found 90,000 dollars stuffed in his freezer, according to court documents released this week.

DOJ_NMG_0029943

Republican House speaker Dennis Hastert and Democratic House leader Nancy Pelosi said in a joint statement Wednesday that the raid was "unconstitutional" and demanded the return of the seized material.

But they also said Jefferson, who has denied any wrongdoing, must cooperate with investigators.

"What we want to do is not protect people that broke the law, what we need to protect is the division of powers in the constitution of the United States, and that's one of the things I talked to the president about," Hastert told reporters Thursday.

Bush said there were "deeply held views" in Congress on the raid.

The 45 days "will provide both parties more time to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a coequal branch of government," he said.

But the president also warned that Jefferson could not escape the investigation into his activities.

"Let me be clear," he said. "Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously. Those who violate the law -- including a member of Congress -- should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

Bitterness over the raid has gone so deep that Hastert has alleged that a report by a US television network that he was under investigation for corruption was a deliberate leak caused by his protest.

ABC News reported Wednesday that Hastert was involved in an investigation into Congress corruption involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has close links to the Republican Party.

Hastert has demanded ABC retract the report and said the Justice Department was behind the report. "This is one of the leaks that came out to intimidate people," he told a Chicago radio station.

The Justice Department took the unusual step of issuing two statements denying that Hastert was under investigation. It normally refuses to confirm or deny news reports about investigations.

Bush Orders House Documents Sealed (MRKTWTCH)

Move aims to defuse confrontation with House

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- President Bush on Thursday ordered the Justice Department to seal documents it seized from a Democratic congressman's office for 45 days, in an effort to defuse a constitutional confrontation with House leaders.

The move came after House Speaker Dennis Hastert accused Justice Department officials of trying to intimidate him by leaking a false report to ABC News that the chamber's top Republican was under investigation as part of a corruption probe.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to intimidate people. And we're just not going to be intimidated on it," Hastert, R-Ill., told Chicago's WGN radio Thursday morning. The Justice Department has denied officially that Hastert is under investigation.

Hastert, the House's top Republican, has demanded a retraction, while ABC has stood behind the story.

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Hastert have demanded that the Justice Department return documents seized from the congressional offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. They contend that the execution of a search warrant over the weekend breached the Constitution's separation of powers doctrine.

Bush ordered a cooling-off period. "Our government has not faced such a dilemma in more than two centuries," he said in a statement. "Yet after days of discussions, it is clear these differences will require more time to be worked out."

The president ordered that the FBI to turn over the seized materials to the Solicitor General, who would place them under seal.

ABC News, citing unidentified law-enforcement sources, reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating a letter Hastert wrote three years ago to then-Interior Secretary Gale Norton to block an Indian casino -- which would have competed with casinos operated by tribes represented by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and is cooperating with an ongoing investigation.

Denial, denial

The Justice Department twice issued denials of the story, saying that Hastert wasn't the subject of an investigation. Such denials are rare; the agency usually refuses to confirm or deny the existence of a probe.

ABC News late Wednesday posted an update on its Web site, saying that despite the department's statement, federal law-enforcement sources said the network had accurately reported that Hastert was "in the mix" of the FBI probe of congressional corruption.

That prompted a second statement from Justice Wednesday night. "With regards to reports suggesting that the speaker of the House is under investigation or 'in the mix,' as stated by ABC News, I reconfirm, as stated by the department earlier this evening, that these reports are untrue," said Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

ABC News stood behind its story.

"We've gone back to our multiple sources on two occasions since we did the report, and they assured us that what they reported reflected what they knew," ABC News spokesman Jeffrey Schneider told the Associated Press.

Schneider suggested there may be a semantic difference between saying someone is formally under investigation and whether his name came up as part of a wider probe, according to the wire report.

Hastert and Pelosi issued a joint statement on Wednesday calling on the Justice Department to "immediately return the papers it unconstitutionally seized" from Jefferson's office.

"Once that is done, Congressman Jefferson can and should fully cooperate with the Justice Department's efforts, consistent with his constitutional rights," the legislators said. William L. Watts is a reporter for MarketWatch.

Bush Orders Evidence Seized From Congressional Office Sealed (BLOOM)

By Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush ordered the Justice Department to put under seal evidence seized during a weekend raid on the congressional office of a lawmaker under investigation in a bribery case.

Bush took the step today after leaders of both parties complained that the Federal Bureau of Investigation overstepped the constitutional separation of powers by searching the government office of a member of Congress.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a Republican, and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday issued a rare joint statement demanding the Justice Department return all documents taken from Representative William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office.

``I am directing the Department of Justice to seal all materials recovered from Congressman Jefferson's office for the next 45 days and not to allow access to anyone involved in the investigation," Bush said in a statement.

The material will be put in the custody of the U.S. Solicitor General's office.

Hastert has expressed frustration that the White House didn't consult him before the FBI searched Jefferson's offices on May 20. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, was videotaped accepting a leather briefcase containing $100,000 in cash from a government witness, according to an FBI affidavit filed in connection with the search warrant. He has denied wrongdoing and hasn't been charged with a crime.

Hastert discussed his constitutional concerns directly with Bush this week, said Ron Bonjean, the congressman's spokesman.

``Investigating and prosecuting crime is a crucial executive responsibility that I take seriously," Bush's statement said. ``Those who violate the law, including members of Congress, should and will be held to account. This investigation will go forward, and justice will be served."

Sealing the evidence will give both sides time to ``resolve the issues" involved in the raid, Bush said.

Lawmaker Raid May Come Back To Bite Bush (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The recent FBI raid of a congressman's office is fueling a power struggle between Congress and the administration that could hobble President Bush in his efforts to move his legislative agenda.

In hopes of easing tensions, President Bush yesterday ordered frozen all documents taken by federal agents during Saturday's search of the office of Louisiana Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is being investigated for taking bribes. The documents will now be sealed for 45 days, which the president hopes will provide a cooling off period.

The president had good reasons to act. The fracas turned into a near-open revolt yesterday among House Republicans -- normally the White House's staunchest backers -- who were infuriated by a news report that Speaker Dennis Hastert himself was a subject of the federal corruption probe.

Even though the Justice Department denied the report, Mr. Hastert, in a Chicago radio interview yesterday, accused Justice of leaking the report to try to silence his criticism of the Jefferson raid. "This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Mr. Hastert said. "We're just not going to be intimidated on it."

The new tensions with Capitol Hill could have a real impact on the White House. Mr. Hastert, a burly former wrestling coach, has been one of the White House's best friends on Capitol Hill. As the Senate has been willing to challenge the White House, Mr. Hastert delivered a succession of legislative victories over the years to President Bush even when it meant bending the will of his own moderate or conservative wings.

For much of Mr. Bush's term, the president's aides and policies haven't been subject to the level of congressional oversight that critics have demanded. Now, more administration officials could find themselves being hauled before skeptical -- if not hostile -- oversight committees, such as the hearings scheduled by the House Judiciary Committee next week to review the Jefferson office raid. In press releases, Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wyo.) has dubbed the hearings: "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

The battle could also embolden the Senate to pass a tougher version of legislation limiting the administration's ability to conduct domestic spying programs with the hope that the House would back them, rather than Mr. Bush, as it has in the past. And there could be more fights over spending bills, even as the spat could scuttle any hope of passing a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, which the White House views as a key prong of its election strategy.

"The House is now faced with a reality of power," says former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a possible candidate for president in 2008 now working at the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank. "Either they do things that involve appropriations or oversight that are real, or they earn the contempt with which they are being treated."

The ABC News Hastert report came the same day Mr. Hastert had joined with House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi in claiming the Jefferson raid violated the constitution because it represented an infringement by the executive branch into the realm of the legislative branch.

"Obviously they don't like to be challenged and they were by the most powerful people on the Hill," Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.) said in an interview. "I think Justice pointed the gun at the wrong person this time."

Frustration between the House and the Justice Department stems in part from the probe of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff in January pleaded guilty to trying to bribe members of Congress, and has been cooperating with federal investigators. Much of the evidence that has emerged suggests Mr. Abramoff curried favor with lawmakers by shoving cash from his clients into their campaign accounts, providing flashy accommodations for fund-raisers, such as his own downtown restaurant or skyboxes for football or basketball games, and paying for expensive trips abroad.

For many lawmakers, the investigation seems to be moving from the most egregious practices of a few members to criminalizing some basic fund-raising and lobbying techniques. "There is widespread belief on the Hill that the Justice Department is out of control with this idea that campaign contributions equals bribery," noted one Republican close to the caucus.

Thus far, government attorneys haven't made such a claim in a case against a lawmaker. But several have been forced to publicly explain how campaign donations didn't affect their official acts and to turn over documents to the FBI to prove it.

FBI agents are also seeking to interview House and Senate members to see if they leaked information to the New York Times last year disclosing the administration's controversial program allowing some eavesdropping on domestic telephone calls. Justice officials have hinted that criminal charges could be lodged in that investigation.

"For an administration that needs allies in order to come back," the Justice Department's actions are "dumbfounding," says David Gergen, a veteran of Republican and Democratic administrations.

Mr. Bush has, in some ways, aggravated congressional Republicans since the beginning of his presidency, when he sought strict loyalty from legislative partisans, arguing that his success and theirs were inseparable. Now, many fear that they -- and not Mr. Bush -- will pay an electoral price for backing what is now an unpopular war in Iraq, and the president's plunging approval ratings.

Yesterday afternoon, House Republicans gathered in a windowless basement room for a private meeting aimed at sorting through the roller coaster of the past few days. They left the meeting carrying talking points from Republican leaders: "No one is above the law," the paper said. "Just as no branch of government is above the Constitution."

Hastert Slammed For Raid Reaction (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Conservatives yesterday expressed confusion and outrage over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's defense of a Democratic congressman whose Capitol Hill office was raided last weekend by the FBI.

"Only thing I can figure is that Denny got up one morning and said, 'Our approval with the public is at 27 percent -- how can I drive that down further?' " said former Rep. Bob Barr, Georgia Republican.

House Republicans, meanwhile, refused to criticize their leader, who joined Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi in accusing the Justice Department of violating "protocols and procedures" because of the FBI's Saturday night seizure of records from the offices Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat.

Radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday told his millions of listeners that the Hastert-Pelosi alliance shows the GOP has become "politically tone-deaf," while a Louisiana senator was the only elected Republican in Washington to criticize the defense of congressional privilege by Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"For congressional leaders to react by trying to ban or limit searches of congressional offices will only destroy what little faith and confidence in the institution is left," said Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican. "Make no mistake, the American people will come to one conclusion, that congressional leaders are trying to protect their own from valid investigation."

Veteran conservative activist Richard Viguerie said Mr. Hastert "is clueless -- he just doesn't get it, doesn't understand he has to make changes, the same in the Senate."

Mr. Viguerie predicted that "this whole thing is going to come down on" Republicans, who are expecting a powerful Democratic challenge this November to their 12-year control of the House, in a campaign where scandal and corruption have already become a key issue.

Several polls in recent weeks have indicated that Americans consider the GOP more prone to corruption than Democrats. Earlier this month for example, a CBS/New York Times survey reported that 40 percent of those polled said "Republicans in Congress are more financially corrupt," compared to 15 percent who said Democrats are more corrupt and 30 percent who said both parties are equally corrupt.

The political impact of the Jefferson case -- the New Orleans congressman who prosecutors say hid $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer -- drew Mr. Limbaugh's attention.

"Here you have the Democrats attempting ... to craft as a campaign theme the Republican 'culture of corruption,' and lo and behold, delivered to the Republicans on a silver platter is Congressman William Jefferson," the nation's No. 1 talk-radio host said yesterday. "So you would think that the Republican leadership would understand there's an opportunity here."

Court documents describing the Rayburn House Office Building search revealed new details of federal prosecutors' corruption charges against Mr. Jefferson, part of a continuing investigation that has already produced two convictions, including a former Jefferson aide.

Mr. Hastert and Mrs. Pelosi yesterday said the Justice Department's search of Mr. Jefferson's office was a violation of the separation of powers guaranteed under Article I of the Constitution, which says members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. Barr, a former federal prosecutor -- and a leader in the 1998 impeachment of President Clinton -- scoffed at the Hastert-Pelosi statement.

"There is no constitutional right to secret evidence of criminal activity, just because it happens to occupy space on Capitol Hill," said Mr. Barr. "I think the FBI is perfectly within its rights to exercise a judicially approved search warrant."

One top Republican in Washington yesterday said privately that the problem was that nobody in the Bush administration had bothered to tip off Mr. Hastert or House Majority Leader John A. Boehner before the FBI staged its search of Mr. Jefferson's offices. Capitol Hill insiders said complaints by some House Republicans were aired in a tense two-hour closed-door leadership meeting yesterday.

While the House GOP publicly closed ranks behind Mr. Hastert, Mr. Viguerie yesterday said the leader's stance was arrogant.

"What Hastert and Pelosi are doing in hammering the FBI is saying, 'We play by different rules from ordinary people. We protect each other, Republicans and Democrats, in Congress,' " said Mr. Viguerie. "Congress makes sure its members have no serious competition, and the public understands and resents that."

Mr. Barr said the House leadership's stand was motivated in part by resentment of the Bush White House.

"I suppose on a very general level Congress has for some reason awakened from its constitutional sleepwalk and seized on this as way to assert it relevance and power," Mr. Barr said. "The Congress has allowed itself to be slapped around by the Bush administration and appears to be unconcerned about eroding the base of its authority."

Analysis: Congress-FBI Flap May Irk Voters (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, May 25, 2006

The constitutional clash over the FBI raid of a lawmaker's office in a corruption probe has triggered an exceptional display of congressional bipartisan unity. But there are pitfalls for both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0029947

Additional prosecutions loom in the investigation surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and calling more attention to corruption — and congressional privilege — could further drive down election-year approval ratings for all of Congress. These numbers already languish below those of President Bush.

"I don't think it's wise politically for Congress to stand too tall on this issue," said Paul C. Light, professor of public service at New York University.

While the Constitution does extend certain protections to lawmakers against being intimidated or controlled by the executive branch, "I don't think the American public would warm easily to the notion that Congress can't be investigated because the Constitution says otherwise," he said.

Bush sought to defuse the battle between the Justice Department and Congress on Thursday, ordering documents seized by the FBI — which congressional leaders want returned — to be sealed for a 45-day cooling-off period.

Even if the debate may not be stirring ordinary Americans, it's become a huge deal in turf-sensitive Washington.

The weekend raid on the legislative offices of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La., was said to be the first such physical encroachment by the executive branch on Congress in the nation's history.

Yet for ruling-party Republicans, the more attention they give the issue, the more likely voters will be reminded of GOP figures under prosecution as well.

This includes charges against former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — as well as the bribery investigation that already has sent former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to prison.

Furthermore, the flap comes at a time when the Bush administration faces criticism for pushing the envelope of its executive powers in warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency and in other surveillance and detention programs.

For Democrats, the more they blast FBI tactics against one of their own, the harder it will be to make their "culture of corruption" label stick against Republicans. And the more they may reinforce public perceptions that corruption in Washington is bipartisan.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was among the few leaders counseling restraint, saying, "I'm not going to beat up on the FBI." But Reid's House counterpart — Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. — joined House Speaker Dennis Hastert in a blistering joint condemnation of the FBI's tactics that demanded return of the seized documents.

The FBI called its behavior proper and necessary, noting the bureau had obtained a warrant and that Jefferson had ignored a subpoena for the information issued last August. The FBI is investigating allegations that the eight-term House member, who represents New Orleans, took hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for promoting business ventures in Africa.

Congressional leaders accused the FBI of overstepping the bounds of what's permissible under the Constitution's separation-of-powers provisions. In particular, they asserted the FBI violated the "speech and debate" protections in Article 1, Section 6.

That section states that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The prohibition against searching congressional offices is not spelled out. It's more a matter of tradition, many legal analysts argue.

"You can't hide bribery behind the `speech and debate clause,'" said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor who is director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

"I find it kind of ironic that the one time they're getting exercised about the possible abuse of executive power is when the executive branch is looking into congressional corruption," Sloan said.

But Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute who specializes in Congress, said the dispute is "a big deal. This has never happened before and there's a reason this has never happened before. This is a pretty direct violation of the `speech and debate' clause. If I were the speaker, I would really be upset."

Hastert was.

He escalated matters Thursday by accusing the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him, hinting it was linked to an ABC news report that alleged he was under investigation for dealings with Abramoff. Hastert also threatened to sue the network. The Justice Department denied Hastert was a target of its investigation.

Fallout From Jefferson Case May Hurt His Party (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, May 26, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — International bribery schemes hatched in fancy hotels outside the nation's capital. Wads of cash in foil-wrapped bundles in a congressman's freezer. A Saturday night raid by federal agents on Capitol Hill.

At the center of Washington's latest alleged political scandal: Mild-mannered, Harvard-educated U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, Louisiana's only black congressman and a fixture in New Orleans politics since the 1970s. The eight-term House member is suspected of taking money to help a Kentucky technology company called iGate Inc. win lucrative contracts in Africa.

Jefferson, 59, has not been charged and he denies the allegations, which have shocked residents in the Katrina-ravaged neighborhoods he represents.

"I believe he is innocent, whatever the accusations are," says Pearl Thomas, Jefferson's 73-year-old neighbor.

Others, such as Cheron Brylski, a political consultant who once backed Jefferson's opponent in a congressional race, say they have always wondered about him.

"We called him 'Dollar Bill.' … There is this awful perception of him as someone out for personal gain, and that has haunted him almost from day one," Brylski said. She later befriended Jefferson, however, and ran two of his campaigns. "The Bill Jefferson I know, there are two sides. I would consider him one of the few Democrats who literally believes in the Democratic Party platform."

Louisiana has always borne a reputation for corrupt politicians. Jefferson's alleged misdoings may cause more than just red faces, however. Louisiana is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina, and billions in federal dollars await congressional approval.

"Since the storm has hit, we've basically been without representation in that district," says Russell Henderson, a lobbyist and a teacher at Dillard University in New Orleans. "The congressman has been unable to provide us with any kind of leadership. Everything he would say or do is distracted by his problems with the feds."

A host of Louisiana politicians — former governor Edwin Edwards, most famously — have been caught in local kickback schemes. This case alleges overseas deals and bribery of foreign officials, however. Not only could it be bad for Louisiana, but also for Democrats nationally, who are trying to win mid-term elections by painting Republicans as corrupt. This week, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi asked Jefferson to give up his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He refused.

The case against Jefferson was revealed in an affidavit filed Saturday to obtain a search warrant for the congressman's office. Jefferson called the raid, possibly the first on a congressman's office in history, "outrageous." Leaders of both political parties denounced the raid as a violation of the constitutional separation of powers. In response, President Bush Thursday ordered the materials to be sealed for 45 days.

The details from the affidavit, though, are out there, and they sound as if they were ripped from a crime novel:

The FBI described secretly recorded conversations and meetings between Jefferson and an investor in iGate Inc.'s Africa project. The investor, whose name is blacked out in the public version of the affidavit, approached the FBI in 2004 to allege that Jefferson had demanded "consulting fees" in exchange for his help with a deal to provide wireless services to West African nations.

Last July, the witness met with Jefferson at the Ritz-Carlton in Arlington, Va. They walked outside to the witness's car, where Jefferson retrieved a leather briefcase filled with $100,000 in marked bills, money the congressman said he would use to coax African officials into the deal.

Four days later, the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in New Orleans and Washington. The affidavit says they found $90,000 of the cash in his Washington freezer, wrapped in foil and nestled in plastic food containers.

The court document says agents videotaped Jefferson as he struck deals on slips of paper passed back and forth at the hotel, with Jefferson speaking of money being funneled to a bank account in his children's names. FBI tapes recorded Jefferson using colorful language during the secret meetings, describing himself as a man "in the shadows, behind the curtain," the affidavit said. When he demanded more money by writing down a percentage and passing it across a table, he laughed and said, "All these damn notes we're writing to each other as if we're talking, as if the FBI is watching," according to the affidavit.

Jefferson now says, "There are two sides to this story."

Two of Jefferson's associates have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with the FBI. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate Inc., said he paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to Jefferson and his family members in exchange for help securing contracts.

In Jefferson's Louisiana district, the potentially damning evidence against an ambitious and accomplished man is disheartening, even to those who aren't surprised.

Jefferson was born in 1947 in the north Louisiana town of Lake Providence, known as one of America's poorest. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he founded what is now the largest majority-black law firm in the South. He was a well-respected, three-term state senator before being elected to Congress in 1990. Three of his five daughters graduated from Harvard College and Law School; one is a state representative.

"His legacy has been tremendous," says Trevor Bryan, who was his law partner from 1976 to 1990. "He knocked down a lot of doors (for blacks) in the Deep South."

With one week to go before hurricane season begins, and Congress poised to vote on billions in hurricane relief, another political scandal has bubbled up. The uncle of former mayor Marc Morial pleaded guilty Wednesday to stealing from the Regional Transit Authority, which he managed. An ongoing federal corruption probe of Morial's friends and associates could implicate others.

"We're staggering as a city, and all this is another blow," Henderson says.

There's A Right Way (USAT)

By Rep. Dennis Hastert

USA Today, May 26, 2006

If the information we have read about the behavior of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., seems as obvious to a jury as it does to me, he deserves to be vigorously prosecuted. I do not want to do anything that will interfere with that prosecution.

The issue that has concerned me, as Speaker, since Saturday night is not if the FBI should be able to search a member of Congress' office, but rather how to do it within the boundaries of the Constitution.

On Thursday, President Bush recognized that serious constitutional issues needed to be resolved. He wisely directed the Department of Justice to send the documents (taken from Jefferson's office last weekend) to the Solicitor General's office for safekeeping for 45 days. This was a meaningful step. The president also encouraged the Justice Department to meet with us.

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and I directed the lawyers for the House to develop reasonable protocols and procedures that will make it possible for the FBI to go into congressional offices to constitutionally-execute a search warrant.

In more than 219 years, the Justice Department has never found it necessary to use a search warrant to obtain documents from a congressional office. These issues have always been resolved without the necessity of a search warrant, and prosecutions have gone forward.

Justice Department officials now insist that this specific case required them, for the first time, to conduct a search. I regret that when they reached this conclusion, they did not work with us to figure out a way to do it consistently with the Constitution. But that is behind us now. I am confident that in the next 45 days, the lawyers will figure out how to do it right.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., is speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Cash-in-Freezer Probe A Hot Topic In New Orleans (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

Friends and foes of Rep. William J. Jefferson, who is accused in bribery case, voice a range of opinions from denial to distrust.

NEW ORLEANS — Rep William J. Jefferson has long provided one of Louisiana's favorite success stories: the sometime-sharecropper's son who rose from rural roots to attend Harvard Law School, become a Democratic Party power player and reach the halls of Congress.

So when the FBI revealed that it had videotape of Jefferson accepting $100,000 in cash that the bureau said was intended to bribe a Nigerian official — and that $90,000 of it had been found in the freezer of Jefferson's home — constituents of Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District reacted with shock, disappointment and a touch of amusement hardened by experience.

Friends say the allegations against Jefferson, who represents New Orleans, are simply out of character. Foes say they never trusted him. Now that the city's mayoral elections are over and incumbent C. Ray Nagin is in office for four more years, Jefferson's travails are the buzz around many quarters of this city.

"It's really the new talk after the elections," said Mike Miller, 26, as he walked his English bulldog, Buddha, one recent afternoon not far from Jefferson's house on Marengo Street in a ritzy section of the city's Uptown neighborhood. "We've got our mayor, and now we've got this big one with Bill."

"When they found the money in the freezer, man … " said Ricky Bragg between bites of spaghetti Bolognese at Fat Harry's bar in Uptown. "I was kind of shocked. I just never thought he would get caught up — allegedly — in that type of situation."

Jefferson, an eight-term congressman and a senior member of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, and its subcommittee on trade, has not been charged with any crime. And he has denied any wrongdoing in a case that alleges he offered to bribe a Nigerian official and accepted kickbacks to help a U.S. telecommunications company land deals there and in Ghana.

But the general sentiments among friends and supporters have been disbelief and denial.

"No one expected him to be involved in a scandal of this proportion," said John Maginnis, a political analyst and independent journalist who publishes the Louisiana Political Fax Weekly.

The 59-year-old Jefferson, a tall, lean man — low-key, soft-spoken and a dapper dresser — has had a primarily scandal-free career.

Analysts believe his rise from privation to power has helped defuse the outrage that might have ignited if he were someone else.

Raised in rural northeastern Louisiana to parents who didn't graduate from high school, Jefferson still managed to excel. The crowning moment of his career came in 1991, when he became the first African American elected to Congress from Louisiana since Reconstruction. Along the way, Jefferson raised five daughters — three of them also Harvard Law School graduates, one of whom is a Louisiana state representative.

"I think people don't want to believe that he's gone wrong," said Wayne Parent, a political analyst at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. "Until now, he never really caused a lot of controversy, and that's why reaction has been as slow as it has been. I don't think people in Louisiana want to hear this."

As a child, Jefferson attended the East Carroll Training School for the Colored. He went on to Southern University A&M College — considered a flagship of Louisiana's African American university system, which includes Dillard and Xavier in New Orleans — and then to Harvard Law, before earning a master of laws in taxation from Georgetown in 1996.

"He had tremendous confidence in his ability to do well," said New Orleans attorney Trevor Bryan, a longtime friend and former law firm partner of Jefferson, who in the 1970s founded Jefferson, Bryan and Gray (now Bryan and Jupiter), which became the largest predominantly African American firm in the South. "He did good in his courses. He was always hardworking, almost a workaholic."

Though a competent legal practitioner, politics was always Jefferson's passion, friends said.

"He's a smart guy, a guy who started with the idea of trying to get blacks involved in politics," said New Orleans attorney Walter Wilkerson, who ran Jefferson's campaign for the state Senate. "He was committed to improving conditions for blacks. The results have been mixed … but before this incident, he was roundly applauded."

"What is surprising is that he's been devoted to political life and not to financial success," Bryan said. "He had a lot of opportunity at various stages to make a lot of money. He gave up a good salary to go to Congress. His major goal was public service."

But critics say the alleged evidence — the videotape and the money supposedly found in Jefferson's freezer — is too damning to be ignored.

"We think the behavior is not fitting for a member of Congress, and that it's time for him to step down," said David Donnelly, national campaigns director for the Public Campaign Action Fund, a Washington-based nonprofit, nonpartisan watchdog organization. The group has launched a petition calling for Jefferson's resignation.

In an editorial Thursday, the Times-Picayune called on Jefferson to immediately announce that he would not run for reelection. "The congressman is entitled to the presumption of innocence and to his day in court. He is not entitled to inflict more pain upon an already traumatized district," the newspaper said.

A composed and stoic Jefferson has continued to insist that he is still effective, and his director of communications, Melanie Roussell, said he was continuing his job, business as usual.

Since Katrina, Jefferson has introduced legislation that would allow eligible homeowners to temporarily defer mortgage payments; secured disaster recovery grants for local universities; co-sponsored a bill designed to rebuild the healthcare infrastructure in hurricane-damaged areas; and co-authored legislation that provides major tax incentives to business development in the Gulf Coast region.

In the Uptown neighborhood, where Jefferson has a house on a street defined by stately wooden frame homes with white-painted pillars, neighbors said the congressman and his family were usually visible and accessible.

"He seemed to be a decent guy," said Uptown resident John Ritchie, who said he had met Jefferson on many occasions and voted for him.

"I personally liked the man. After Katrina, we need him in the House Ways and Means Committee. It's a blow, not just for the city but the whole state. We need more positive things down here right now to get on our feet."

Ritchie said he was willing to "wait and see" what comes out of the investigation because "there are two sides to every story…. Everybody deserves a fair shot."

"I always voted for him because I liked the way he voted in Congress," said Michelle Breaux, another neighborhood resident. "But it's very disgusting what he's been doing. I've met his daughters. They're intelligent, well-educated. They can look after themselves. They don't need Daddy's help."

The FBI affidavit said Jefferson channeled the bribery money into a company owned by his wife and daughters.

Jefferson has denied the charge, but some neighbors said they were not surprised by the alleged indiscretions. Many recounted news reports that Jefferson had diverted National Guard troops from their duties at the height of the rescue efforts after Hurricane Katrina to take him to his house to retrieve some belongings. Jefferson has said the troops insisted on accompanying him because of alleged sniper fire in the area.

"I just never really trusted him," said Joe Kopfler, 59, as he sat on a step in front of his home, around the block from Jefferson's. "He always seemed like his morality wouldn't be of a high standard."

Other residents dismissed the scandal as another corrupt Louisiana politician. In the last decade, Louisiana has seen an attorney general, a congressman, a state Senate president, a federal judge and numerous local officials convicted of corruption. Investigators are currently looking at the administration of former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial; and Jefferson's brother-in-law, Judge Alan Green, is serving time for mail fraud.

"It's kind of so common around here … money changing hands in brown paper bags," said doctoral student Vico Marziale, 29, as he nursed a beer at Fat Harry's. "We suspect all the politicians around here. It's become a joke. You know, like … 'We've got another one.' "

G-Men Vs. Members Of The House (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

IT IS OUTRAGEOUS ENOUGH that both the speaker and the minority leader have complained about a lawful FBI search of the offices of a fellow House member. It's even more outrageous that the president is now trying to placate them by announcing that records seized in the search will be off-limits to investigators for 45 days.

A Kentucky businessman has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to the family of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) in exchange for his assistance with business ventures in Nigeria. Jefferson denies any wrongdoing. On Saturday night, FBI agents, armed with a warrant, searched Jefferson's offices in the Rayburn House Office Building.

The search provoked a display of righteous indignation from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who accused the Justice Department of the constitutional equivalent of desecrating a church. Joined by Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the speaker invoked the doctrine of separation of powers and demanded that the records be returned. This is the sort of bipartisanship the country can do without.

Like Willie Sutton, who said he robbed banks because that's where the money was, the FBI searched Jefferson's offices because that's where he kept his records. This wasn't a case of jackbooted thugs from the executive branch rifling willy-nilly through congressional files in search of embarrassing information. Unlike Sutton, the agents who searched Jefferson's office were acting lawfully and within the requirements of the 4th Amendment.

The speaker and minority leader make the argument that the search ran afoul of the Constitution's "speech and debate" clause, which says in part that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same." Nothing in this language creates a legal force field around Capitol Hill that federal agents with a lawful warrant may not penetrate.

That makes President Bush's actions on Thursday even more indefensible than Hastert's and Pelosi's. Bush said his order would allow time "to resolve the issues in a way that ensures that materials relevant to the ongoing criminal investigation are made available to prosecutors in a manner that respects the interests of a co-equal branch of government."

Although the president is the head of the executive branch, he shouldn't second-guess the conduct of a criminal investigation because of meritless complaints from Capitol Hill. The sooner this "seal" is broken, the better.

One Man's Constitutional Crisis ... (NYT)

Republicans and Democrats in the House of Representatives have achieved an almost unprecedented level of bipartisanship in denouncing the F.B.I.'s search of a congressman's office. They talk angrily about the separation of powers and the implications of having an executive branch agency make a foray into a lawmaker's official space. Our first question is where all these concerned constitutionalists have been for the last five years.

Time and time again, Congress has played dead when the executive branch refused to provide it with information, answer questions or follow laws that the legislative branch has passed. Currently, the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has not been the worst offender, is tinkering dangerously with the laws covering domestic wiretapping by the National Security Agency. It could end up endorsing a program that the White House won't even fully describe to a vast majority of lawmakers.

Compared with the enormous issues at hand, the matter of Representative William Jefferson is small potatoes. The F.B.I. says that it videotaped the congressman accepting $100,000 to grease the way for some business deals in Africa, and that agents found most of the money in his freezer. The Justice Department obtained a warrant, entered Mr. Jefferson's office and removed files that it says are related to that investigation.

Mr. Jefferson says there are two sides to every story, although he has not yet offered his. That does not make him guilty — indeed, he is yet to be charged. The House leaders demanded that the seized documents be returned, and the White House ordered them sealed for 45 days to buy time.

The F.B.I. is going to have to show some very good reasons for having precipitated this showdown. Federal investigators have managed to prosecute many other officials for corruption over the last 200-odd years without ever barging into Congressional offices in the process. The danger of abuse with this kind of activity is enormous, especially with a president and an attorney general whose grasp for power seems to have no limits. They cannot be trusted to keep legitimate police activity from turning into political persecution. Just yesterday, administration officials were talking about having the F.B.I. interrogate lawmakers in an attempt to find the sources of the Times article disclosing Mr. Bush's domestic spying operation. That would certainly represent a major breach of the separation of powers principle.

The constitutional claims made by the Congressional leadership on the Jefferson case seem overblown. House and Senate members are protected from arrest while going about their official business to shield them from intimidation and meddling by the executive branch in the affairs of state, not to deter law enforcement officials from doing their lawful duty to investigate possible felonies.

But members of Congress who have been politically comatose or complicit as the Bush administration built itself an imperial presidency, immune from the historical powers of the legislative branch, are up in arms. The House Judiciary Committee, which has been in the forefront of the long-running cave-in, has scheduled a hearing that the chairman has titled "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

It seems like a phony approach to a real problem.

Lawmakers, Quiet On Your Rights, Roar About Theirs (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Now we know what it takes to make Congress mad enough to stand up for constitutional rights.

When the government snoops on your phone calls and records without warrants, lawmakers barely kick up a fuss. But when the target is a fellow congressman — one under investigation for taking a bribe, no less — they're ready to rumble.

Witness the bipartisan frenzy set off after the FBI searched the Capitol Hill offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., on Saturday. The FBI had a court order. According to an FBI affidavit, he was videotaped taking $100,000 in cash from an investor working undercover for the FBI. Agents found $90,000 of it stuffed in his freezer at home, the affidavit said.

Never mind all that. Leaders of the House of Representatives are appalled. They say the search violated the Constitution's separation of powers, "designed to protect the Congress and the American people from abuse of power."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who rarely agree on anything, demanded that the Justice Department return the "unconstitutionally seized" documents. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the episode raised "profoundly disturbing" questions. He set a hearing for Tuesday to ask: "Did the Saturday night raid of Congress trample the Constitution?"

If only those leaders were as profoundly disturbed about executive branch incursions on the rights of average citizens. You certainly have to wonder where they've been for the past several years while the Bush administration ran roughshod over the legislative branch and launched anti-terror programs of questionable legality.

Last December, The New York Times revealed that the National Security Agency (NSA) was wiretapping international phone calls without court warrants. Hastert didn't make a peep. Pelosi and other Democrats loudly protested, but nothing came of it. As it turns out, Pelosi was part of a tiny leadership group that had been briefed on the program since October 2001.

The scenario repeated itself this month when USA TODAY revealed that the NSA has collected millions of phone records.

So now the leadership swings into action because the FBI searched a Capitol Hill office for evidence of criminal activity?

This is not to belittle the separation of powers doctrine. It's meant to prevent a president from using investigations and unwarranted searches to intimidate lawmakers in their official duties. The Justice Department might have minimized the outcry by managing the search with more deference to congressional sensitivities. But there's no evidence that the Jefferson raid was an abuse of power.

A more appropriate response from congressional leaders would have been remorse over their failure to do anything meaningful to make members act ethically. Hastert, for instance, replaced a House ethics committee chairman last year after he attempted to enforce some rules. Congressional offices, obviously, should not be sanctuaries for crime, but the outcry from Capitol Hill brought quick action. On Thursday, President Bush ordered the documents seized in Jefferson's office to be "sealed" from the investigators' view for 45 days, while the Justice Department and Congress settle their differences.

What a pity that Congress' leaders haven't used their clout to protect the public's rights as eagerly as they defend their own.

Editorial: Raid Reverberations / Distrust Shadows FBI In Visit To Congress (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, May 26, 2006

The unprecedented Federal Bureau of Investigation raid Saturday night and Sunday on the congressional office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, has prompted outrage on both the Republican and Democratic sides of the aisle in Congress.

The issue is complicated. On the one hand, sending the FBI in to search the office of a member of Congress is an example of the jackbooted approach of the administration of President Bush to the legislative branch of what is supposed to be constitutionally based, three-branch American government. The raid was consistent with the administration policy of surveillance by the National Security Agency of Americans' phone calls and e-mails: disregard of the legal requirement to obtain an order from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court before instituting bugging, and failure to keep the Congress informed on the subject.

By no stretch of the imagination could the FBI raid on Mr. Jefferson's office be considered to be a national security matter either.

On the other hand, it is hard to be sympathetic to Mr. Jefferson. There is an argument that the case against him, the $90,000 in cold cash found stashed in his freezer at home, led naturally to a presumption on the part of the FBI that a stop of an icy love train in the congressman's office might provide further relevant evidence. Or, suppose that a murder had occurred in a congressional office. Could anyone argue that police should not be admitted there to gather evidence?

But both the Republicans, in the form of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and the Democrats in the form of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have hit the roof. Their argument is based soundly on the Constitution, the concept that Congress cannot play its appropriate role in American government if representatives of the executive branch can go unbidden into their offices to search and scoop up documents and computer-stored information at will.

A more skeptical approach to the issue would attribute members' indignation at the search of Mr. Jefferson's office to concern at what would be found if their own offices were searched.

Overall, we see the Sunday raid as the wrong thing for the FBI or any other body of the federal government to do. At the very least, representatives of the legislative branch of government should have been present for the search, to assure that the FBI limited itself to collecting evidence of crime. Given the Bush administration's general approach to the rule of law, embodied in various pronouncements of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, there is otherwise no guarantee of respect of separation of powers, the critical line between executive and legislative that is essential to our form of government that was crossed so sharply Saturday night and Sunday in the Rayburn House Office Building.

FBI Raid Galvanizes Congress On Rights (SCRIPPS)

By An Editorial / By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, May 26, 2006

From the standpoint of public sympathy, the House couldn't have chosen a worse time to stand on constitutional principle. The voters surely do not share the House members' outrage at a weekend FBI raid of a congressional office in connection with a spreading influence-peddling investigation that has tarred the whole institution.

Indeed, after ABC reported that GOP House Speaker Dennis Hastert might get caught up in that probe, Hastert accused the Justice Department of trying to intimidate him because he so vehemently objected to the raid. This was fine irony coming from a legislator who couldn't do enough to broaden the department's powers through the Patriot Act and its renewal.

What happened was that the FBI, armed with a warrant signed by the chief judge of the U.S. district court, searched the offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., and hauled away two cartons of documents and copies of hard drives. Jefferson is hardly a sympathetic figure on whom to make a constitutional case. The FBI already has videotape of him allegedly accepting a $100,000 bribes and agents confiscated $90,000 in cold cash hidden in the freezer of his Washington apartment.

Hastert and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, a pairing many though impossible, denounced the executive branch's action as a violation of separation of powers, the speech and debate clause of the Constitution, and "the practice of the last 219 years." And they demanded the immediate return of Jefferson's documents. Moreover, the Republican-run body that was markedly incurious about the Bush administration's stewardship of the laws is now planning hearings under the overwrought title, "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

It says something about the state of relations between the administration and Congress that the Justice Department and White House seemed stunned by the strenuous reaction. After all, they had trampled over Congress' prerogatives before with no discernible reaction.

The two leaders are on shaky constitutional ground, legal scholars say. The Constitution makes an exception to lawmakers' legal immunity for felonies and nothing in that document says Capitol Hill should be a sanctuary for committing them. However, historians could find no precedent for a warrant and search of a congressional office.

Still, there is a serious issue of government to be addressed. The potential for Soviet-style intimidation is clear. Members of Congress must be confident that they are free from politically motivated reprisals from the executive branch and, at the same time, the Justice Department must be free to conduct legitimate investigations into unlawful conduct.

The raid did have one beneficial effect. The House is finally paying attention to due process and civil liberties.

Texarkana (TX) Gazette, May 26, 2006

Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert has chosen to weigh in on the side of embattled U.S. Rep. William Jefferson.

The Louisiana Democrat's office was raided Saturday by FBI agents, who seized documents and other items looking for evidence implicating Jefferson in a bribery scandal.

Jefferson maintains his innocence in the investigation and vows to fight on.

Now Hastert, as well as other lawmakers, want the FBI to return the seized material and Hastert even says the FBI agents who conducted the raid should be barred from further participation in the probe.

The reason? They claim a lawmaker's office is protected by the Constitution under the separation of powers and the the raid was an illegal action by the Executive branch—the Justice Department under the attorney general—against the Legislative Branch.

It was the first time a House member's office was raided in our nation's history. Officials in the Justice Department said the raid on Jefferson's office was necessary after he refused to comply with a subpoena for documents last summer. Jefferson disclosed receiving the subpoena to the House on Sept. 15, 2005.

Basically, the august members of Congress figure they are entitled to the equivalent of diplomatic immunity while on Capitol Hill.

This imperial attitude has no real foundation. Lawmakers may be used to deferential treatment and exceptional courtesy—and even expect law enforcement to look the other way from time to time—but they are not above the law and their offices are not akin to church sanctuary.

In fact, their offices are not even theirs. They belong to the people of the United States, many of whom are getting fed up with the pervasive attitude of near-royal entitlement among Washington insiders.

This was not political intimidation, which is what the Constitution was guarding against with the separation of powers, but a valid criminal investigation.

Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously.

Hastert has complained to the president, and the White House says it is taking the Legislative Branch's complaints most seriously.

But the dispute between these two branches of government will almost certainly be decided down the road by the third, the Judicial Branch and the Supreme Court.

Hastert Lashes Out At Justice Dept. (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert accused the Justice Department Thursday of trying to intimidate him in retaliation for criticizing the FBI's weekend raid on a congressman's office, escalating a searing battle between the executive and legislative branches of government.

"This is one of the leaks that come out to try to, you know, intimidate people," Hastert said on WGN radio Thursday morning. "We're just not going to be intimidated on it."

Asked later Thursday whether he thought he Justice Department retaliated against him with the leak, Hastert replied: "All I'm saying is, here are the dots. People can connect any dots they want to."

"I thought it was an interesting sequence of events," he added.

The Illinois Republican, in his interview with the Chicago radio station, was responding to an ABC News report that quoted an unnamed law enforcement source as saying that he was "in the mix" of the Justice Department's investigation into influence peddling by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"We are not going to dignify or speculate about the motives of anonymous sources providing inaccurate information," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Within minutes of that report late Wednesday, the department issued the first of two denials that it was investigating Hastert. The speaker demanded a retraction from ABC News, which stood by its story. Hastert on Thursday threatened to sue the network and reporters and executives for libel and defamation.

"We will take any and all actions necessary to rectify the harm ABC has caused and to hold those at ABC responsible for their conduct," wrote Hastert's counsels, J. Randolph Evans and Stefan C. Passantino. The letter was addressed to network President David Westin and reporter Brian Ross.

"Our response to the letter is our reporting on the story," said ABC News Vice President Jeffrey Schneider.

Correspondent Brian Ross stood by his report, saying he has checked with his sources who say the story accurately represents the facts "as they know them."

"There's enough there for them (the FBI) to take a look at the speaker" and other members of Congress, Ross said in an interview.

Hastert aimed his broadsides at the Justice Department amid a swirl of recriminations on Capitol Hill, including warnings by some lawmakers of a voter backlash against members of Congress "trying to protect their own."

Hastert's aides, at the same time, were in talks with the White House about the possible transfer of material seized by the FBI during its weekend raid of the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), perhaps to the House ethics committee, according to several Republican officials.

A federal law enforcement official said no computers were taken during the search. Instead, "mirror images" were made of the contents of some computers in Jefferson's office, the official said on condition of anonymity because the items taken during the search remain under court seal

The goals of any transfer, they said, would be to deny the documents both to prosecutors and to Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat ensnared in a bribery investigation, until the legal issues surrounding the weekend search of his office are resolved. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the confidential nature of the discussions.

Historians said it was the first such search of a congressman's quarters in the more than two centuries since the first Congress convened.

The White House continued to try to keep its distance publicly, saying it acknowledged "the constitutional concerns" expressed.

The House Judiciary Committee chairman, GOP Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, announced a hearing next week, "Reckless Justice: Did the Saturday Night Raid of Congress Trample the Constitution?"

The Associated Press reported last November that Hastert for two years did not disclose his use of Abramoff's restaurant for a fundraiser just two weeks before he asked the Interior Department in a letter to reject a Louisiana Indian tribe's application for a casino license.

At the time, Abramoff was representing another tribe that opposed the casino. Hastert, who collected a total of $100,000 from Abramoff's and his tribal clients, blamed a paperwork oversight, filed the required disclosure and paid for the use of the restaurant.

Hastert, Justice Dept. Dispute Inquiry Story (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

ABC News says federal investigators have put House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "in the mix" of their corruption probe centering on convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty says the ABC report involving Hastert -- even the "in the mix" language -- is "untrue."

And Hastert, calling the story "absolutely" wrong, is demanding a retraction.

Who's right?

It is highly unusual for the Justice Department to confirm or deny that someone is under investigation. Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that federal guidelines allow such statements in cases receiving "substantial publicity" and that the decision was based on the guidelines "combined with the inaccuracy of the information."

On "World News Tonight" Wednesday, Brian Ross, ABC's chief investigative correspondent, said the bribery probe "now includes" Hastert but cautioned that the investigation is "clearly at the very beginning. The allegations could well prove unfounded." George Stephanopoulos, the network's chief Washington correspondent, called the implications "potentially seismic."

Ross said in an interview: "I think our story is accurate. We've gone back to our sources, and they believe what we reported was accurate as they knew it. There seems to be some disconnect between what the congressman thinks, what the Justice Department thinks and what the FBI thinks. . . . There may be a semantics issue here as to what constitutes being under investigation."

Reporters for NBC, CBS, CNN, Fox News and other news organizations checked out ABC's report but were waved off by law enforcement officials. "Within 15 minutes, we had three or four basic denials saying in effect this was a complete overreach, and we chose not to run it," said John Reiss, executive producer of "NBC Nightly News."

The dispute with ABC comes as the news business has been beset by declining public confidence, several high-profile media mistakes and leak investigations by the Bush administration aimed at pressuring journalists into revealing confidential sources. Ross recently reported -- again based on unidentified sources -- that federal leak investigators are tracking his calls and those of other journalists.

Hastert told Chicago radio station WGN yesterday that the information was leaked to "intimidate" him after his criticism of an FBI raid on the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) as a violation of the separation-of-powers doctrine.

In asking for a retraction, two Hastert attorneys told ABC News President David Westin in a letter that for the network to repeat the "false" statement on its Web site after the Justice Department's denial "constitutes libel and defamation" and reflects a "malicious intent" to damage Hastert's reputation.

As was reported last year, Hastert was among four House Republican leaders who signed a 2003 letter to then-Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton in an effort to block an Indian casino opposed by tribes represented by Abramoff. Shortly before the letter was sent, Abramoff hosted a fundraiser for Hastert's political action committee. In January, the speaker said he would give to charity the donations, estimated at $69,000, that he received from Abramoff and Abramoff's clients.

Several dozen members of Congress -- some at the urging of Abramoff's team of lobbyists -- wrote letters asking Norton not to allow tribes to establish casinos on off-reservation sites. Legal experts have said that campaign contributions alone, even if closely timed to a lawmaker's action, are not likely to become a focus for investigators in the Abramoff case.

Ross said yesterday the Hastert inquiry he described "could wash out and be nothing." Asked if the alleged inquiry should have been the top story on "World News Tonight," Ross said: "Questions are being raised about the speaker of the House -- that's worthy of a lead story."

Novak Told Rove He Wouldn't Identify Him, Person Familiar Says (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Syndicated columnist Robert Novak assured presidential adviser Karl Rove that he wouldn't identify him to prosecutors investigating the disclosure of a CIA agent's name, a person familiar with the matter said.

Rove told a grand jury that Novak called him shortly after the Central Intelligence Agency asked the Justice Department to investigate who leaked the name of operative Valerie Plame to Novak and other reporters, the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said. Novak revealed Plame's name in a July 14, 2003, column, citing unnamed administration officials.

The National Journal, which reported earlier today on the Sept. 29, 2003, conversation between Rove and Novak, said Justice Department prosecutors were concerned that Rove and Novak may have been working on a cover story to protect Rove. The report, citing people familiar with the grand jury testimony of both men, said then-Attorney General John Ashcroft was briefed on the matter.

Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, said the White House deputy chief of staff didn't conspire to hide information.

``Karl has never urged anyone to testify falsely or withhold information from the grand jury, and no one has ever suggested to him that they would, or that they intended to," Luskin said in a telephone interview. ``The special counsel has never suggested there is any evidence to support such an allegation."

Calls to Ashcroft and James Hamilton, Novak's attorney, weren't immediately returned. Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the special counsel, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald, said he wouldn't comment.

Prosecutor

Fitzgerald took over the investigation in December 2003 to learn whether anyone in President George W. Bush's administration violated a 1982 law designed to protect the identity of covert agents. Plame's name was disclosed after her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the war in Iraq and questioned whether the administration twisted intelligence to justify the invasion.

While no one has been charged with purposely unmasking a covert agent, I. Lewis Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, was indicted last October on perjury and obstruction of justice charges for allegedly lying about his conversations with reporters about Plame.

Rove has testified five times before federal grand juries hearing evidence in the case, and persons close to the investigation have said that Fitzgerald is still considering whether to indict Rove on a perjury charge for initially failing to disclose a conversation he had about Plame with Time Magazine reporter Matt Cooper.

The person familiar with Rove's grand jury testimony said Rove told the panel that during his phone call with Novak, Novak told him that he wouldn't hurt Rove before the grand jury. Rove also told the panel that Novak assured him that he would never reveal an unnamed source, the person familiar with Rove's testimony said.

Fitzgerald has said in court filings that evidence in the Libby case suggests ``a plan to discredit, punish or seek revenge against Mr. Wilson."

City Hall Hiring Testimony: Interviews Were Shams (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

Applicants for city jobs waited by the hundreds in a South Side auditorium for meaningless interviews that had no bearing on who ultimately was hired, a former Streets and Sanitation Department official testified Thursday.

Jack Drumgould, the department's personnel director from 1998 to 2004, told jurors that Mayor Richard Daley's office dictated who would be hired for 95 percent of blue-collar, union jobs in Streets and Sanitation.

Testifying under a grant of immunity in the City Hall corruption trial, Drumgould said he took orders from defendants Robert Sorich and Timothy McCarthy in a secret effort to circumvent a federal court order prohibiting political-based hiring for such jobs.

Sorich and McCarthy were top aides in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, where prosecutors charge they rigged the city's personnel process to select favored applicants, including many pro-Daley political workers. Former Streets and Sanitation officials John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery also are on trial for allegedly participating in the scheme.

Prosecutors hope Drumgould's testimony backs up the argument they made in opening statements—that job applicants who lacked clout were victims of the alleged hiring fraud.

Drumgould testified Thursday that Sorich or McCarthy would provide him with lists of job winners before interviews were ever held.

Nevertheless, eligible applicants for positions such as truck drivers and laborers were summoned to the former Board of Education building at 1819 W. Pershing Rd., he said.

When the city was hiring truck drivers in 2004, more than 400 people applied for about 50 openings. The starting wage was $25.90 an hour.

Drumgould described a process that served as a facade for a merit hiring system.

The applicants filled out forms, then waited to undergo two brief interviews, he said. Interviewers were provided a set of questions that related to applicants' experience as truck drivers and history of traffic accidents.

"Did you believe it was important to get answers to these kinds of questions?" Assistant U.S. Atty. Julie Ruder asked.

"No, it would not be relevant to who was selected," Drumgould responded.

Drumgould said Slattery assisted him in falsifying ratings forms for applicants months after the interviews took place. The forms were fixed to ensure that the people endorsed by Sorich or McCarthy received the highest scores, Drumgould testified.

He said Sullivan selected interviewers and once had a friend hired as the $50,000-a-year director of a garbage cart program.

Drumgould also implicated other former city employees in the alleged scheme. He testified that he took the names of preselected job winners to department supervisors such as Steven Bylina, who was a deputy commissioner of the city's Bureau of Forestry.

Bylina, general superintendent of the Cook County Forest Preserve District, is not charged in the alleged scheme. Through a spokesman, he declined to comment Thursday.

Sullivan's lawyer, Cynthia Giacchetti, challenged Drumgould's credibility on cross-examination.

She suggested that Drumgould had agreed to cooperate with authorities to spare himself from indictment and retain his $6,000-a-month pension. Giacchetti asked whether Drumgould was telling the truth.

"You haven't done that in your testimony—have you sir?" Giacchetti said.

"Yes, I have," said Drumgould, arms crossed tightly.

DOJ_NMG_0029958

Drumgould earlier testified that a tree trimmer was promoted in 2001 over applicants with more experience. Drumgould said then-Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez, a Hispanic Democratic Organization leader, had mentioned to him that the tree trimmer was an organization member.

Drumgould said the fix was in again when Sorich allegedly told him to guarantee the promotion of Jack Bataoel from truck driver foreman to general foreman in 2001. Although another foreman had greater seniority than Bataoel, Drumgould said, he, Slattery and another Streets and Sanitation official conducted sham interviews and filled out ratings forms to make sure that Bataoel was ranked highest.

But Giacchetti said on cross-examination that Bataoel had 2½ years of experience as an acting general foreman before being promoted to that job.

Bataoel was a precinct captain for 25 years in Ald. Richard Mell's 33rd Ward Democratic Organization. Mell declined to comment Thursday.

Bataoel, who has retired from the city, told the Tribune last year that he was "more than qualified" for his promotion.

Daley Could Be Called To Testify (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir And Natasha Korecki, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, May 26, 2006

Mayor Daley could be called as a witness in the ongoing trial of four former city employees accused of routinely ordering the hiring or promotion of people based on politics, a lawyer for one of the defendants indicated Wednesday

The attorney for Robert Sorich opened the door to that possibility during a sidebar in the federal court trial, a transcript released late Wednesday revealed.

As the Chicago Sun-Times reported May 8, Daley has given a sworn statement saying he didn't know about rigged hiring schemes going on in his administration.

"One of my assumptions is the mayor's testimony that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on. He's already testified under oath to that," Sorich defense lawyer Tom Durkin told U.S. District Judge David Coar on Wednesday in a private discussion. "It's my representation that the mayor's testified to that, and I'll give you the transcript."

When Coar asked whether the mayor would come in and testify, Durkin left the door open.

"I can't represent that he's going to come in because I don't know whether he is or he isn't," Durkin replied.

The hiring scandal has ensnared four people, including Sorich, who worked in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. The trial just entered its second week.

Daley has refused to give more details on that earlier interview and has withheld public comment on the Sorich trial. At the time of the interview, however, FBI Special Agent in Charge Robert Grant told the Sun-Times that Daley was asked why "certain areas of the government appeared to be rewarded with jobs," and, "How much involvement did he have to those activities that happened so close to his office?"

Also Wednesday, testimony tied one of Daley's top political advisers, Jeremiah Joyce, and the man likely to be the next Cook County sheriff, Thomas Dart, in to the alleged City Hall hiring scheme.

'You didn't even apply'

On the witness stand Wednesday was Luke Somerville, a city worker from Joyce's political base in the 19th Ward who admitted getting promotions at his city job after doing political volunteer work.

Somerville said that after working in the 1995 mayoral election for Daley, he asked for promotions or shift changes for himself, his brother and a friend. He gave the request to the man he worked for during the election, Kevin Joyce, the son of Jeremiah Joyce and now a state representative.

Kevin Joyce told Somerville that Joyce "had to give the list to his father to see if they'd be approved." Soon after, Somerville learned he would be getting the promotion.

The only problem was that when he checked the city list of people to be interviewed, he wasn't on it. He was told he needed to send in an application. A city personnel director told him, "You didn't even apply for a job you were supposed to get," Somerville recalled on the stand.

Somerville said he eventually got the job, and his two other requests were filled, too. On Wednesday, Jeremiah Joyce in an interview blasted Somerville as a liar.

On the witness stand, Somerville explained how he turned to his childhood friend, Thomas Dart, to help him get another city job promotion. Dart is the chief of staff for Cook County Sheriff Michael Sheahan and the Democratic nominee to replace Sheahan, who is retiring. Dart eventually told Somerville to call Sorich directly because Dart was tired of making the calls himself, Somerville testified.

House Panel Backs Internet Gambling Limits (AP)

By Erica Werner, The Associated Press

AP, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — A House panel approved legislation Thursday to crack down on the $12 billion Internet gambling industry by applying federal prohibitions to games like online poker, blackjack and roulette.

The bill by Rep. Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., would update the 1961 Federal Wire Wager Act to apply to online gambling. It also would outlaw electronic transmission of funds to pay for gambling bets and give law enforcement agencies authority to block such money transfers.

Internet gambling already is mostly illegal in the United States, and most of as many as 2,300 gambling sites in existence are overseas.

The bill approved by the Judiciary Committee would "prevent offshore fly-by-night gambling businesses from violating the laws of all states," Goodlatte said.

"This legislation is badly needed," he said, adding spending on the sites has skyrocketed.

But half of the $12 billion spent on online gambling is thought to come from U.S. bettors and some companies in this country want to get in on the action. The American Gaming Association, the industry's largest lobby, has opposed online gambling in the past but last month backed a study of the feasibility of legalizing it.

Nevada's House members introduced a bill this week calling for such a study.

A previous attempt by Goodlatte to get his anti-online gambling bill through Congress failed after aggressive opposition by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Goodlatte alluded to that during heated debate in the Judiciary Committee on Thursday.

"This was the poison pill that was supported by Jack Abramoff five years ago — don't support it today," he shouted as Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., sought to attach an amendment related to horse racing.

Wexler didn't comment on the Abramoff reference and his amendment failed.

"Unfortunately the gentleman just mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia had some involvement in this issue before," remarked Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah. Abramoff is now under indictment. Abramoff has pleaded guilty in a Justice Department corruption probe.

Goodlatte's bill passed 25-11.

House Committee Approves Limits On Online Gambling (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- The House Judiciary Committee approved legislation to toughen U.S. laws against Internet gambling, clearing the way for consideration by the full House of Representatives.

The committee voted 25-11 to approve the Internet Gambling Prohibition Act sponsored by Representative Bob Goodlatte, a Virginia Republican, and prepared to support a second measure, the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, sponsored by Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican.

``I oppose gambling because I think it causes many, many problems in our society," Goodlatte said at today's committee meeting.

The Bush administration Justice Department supports the proposed legislation. Online gambling's legal status in the U.S. is unclear. The Justice Department interprets a 1961 law against using telephone lines to place interstate bets as banning online gambling. Goodlatte said his bill would make that explicit.

Gambling on the Internet is a $12 billion-a-year business that is growing rapidly offshore. Internet-based casinos such as PartyGaming Plc and 888 Holdings Plc, operating in locations such as Gibraltar and Antigua, rake in billions from U.S. gamblers.

Shares of Internet gambling companies declined in London trading after the U.S. vote. 888 Holdings Plc, the world's biggest Web casino operator, fell 5 pence to 193.5 pence. Sportingbet Plc, the online bookmaker that owns Paradise Poker, slipped 16.25 pence to 367.5 pence.

Shutting Down Sites

The Goodlatte measure would force U.S. financial institutions to cooperate with federal law enforcement authorities in shutting down illegal gambling sites based outside the U.S. The measure exempts horse racing, fantasy-sports betting and state lotteries in the U.S.

By carving out an exception for horse racing, the bill hurts dog racing and jalai, Representative Robert Wexler, a Florida Democrat, said. The Judiciary Committee, controlled by Republicans, rejected proposed amendments calling for specific state regulation and for adopting criminal penalties for bettors of fines and up to two years in prison.

Leach's measure would make it unlawful for credit-card companies to collect payments for transactions with online-gaming sites.

The anti-gambling legislation is likely to pass the full House where some Republican lawmakers are uneasy about the damage done by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption charges. Abramoff helped block similar legislation in the past.

``We are anxious to have the opportunity to expunge that smear," Goodlatte said.

Senate Battle

The House legislation may face an uphill battle in the Senate. Some states, including Nevada, are seeking to legalize, regulate and tax online gambling, the fastest-growing segment of the industry.

Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has proposed a measure seeking to block financial transactions, said he wants to press for approval. ``I am going to wait and see how the House deals with it," Kyl said yesterday.

Frank Fahrenkopf, president of the American Gaming Association, said through a spokeswoman that his group, the Washington lobbying arm for Las Vegas-based casinos, is ``neutral" on the Goodlatte and Leach measures.

The association is asking Congress to fund a federal commission that would study whether online gambling can be regulated and taxed in the U.S. That may eventually let major casino operators such as MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc. enter the online business.

Legalized gambling has grown dramatically in the U.S. over the past two decades. In 2005, commercial and Indian tribe casinos and horse-betting operations took in more than $52 billion in gross revenue nationwide, according to a Pew Research Center study citing industry estimates. Lotteries in 41 states sold $52 billion in tickets.

Elfvin Removed From Case Of Longtime Friend (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, May 26, 2006

Appeals court found problems with how judge handled Lewiston attorney's sentence

When U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin sentenced a suspended Lewiston attorney in a criminal tax case last year, the judge called the man a longtime friend and added, "It hurts me as much as it does you, Tim."

The words spoken by the judge in his courtroom last August have caused an appeals court to remove him from the case of Timothy J. Toohey.

Toohey, 59, pleaded guilty in February 2003 to underreporting his income by $1 million. Elfvin already has sentenced him three times - twice to probation, and then to 15 months in prison.

But every time, the Second Circuit Appeals Court found legal problems with Elfvin's handling of the case and ordered a resentencing.

Now, the appeals court has removed Elfvin from the case altogether, saying he should have recused himself because of his friendship with Toohey.

"As is obvious, it's quite a mess," Elfvin, 88, said in an interview with The Buffalo News on Wednesday. "It's probably a good idea to have another judge handle it."

A panel of appeals judges said remarks made by Elfvin in court last August revealed that his friendship with Toohey had caused him to be lenient on two previous occasions.

"Those first two sentences really go back to a lot of the relationship that you and I had when I was practicing law," Elfvin told Toohey, according to court records. "You were a great friend, a good guy. . . . I really bent over backwards on your behalf in that regard. That explains those two sentences."

After saying those words last August, Elfvin sentenced Toohey to 15 months in prison. Toohey's attorneys then appealed that sentencing, and Toohey has been out of prison while the appeal is pending.

The Toohey case has not yet been reassigned. The chief federal judge of Western New York, Richard J. Arcara, is expected to determine who will handle the case.

This incident is the latest in a series of difficulties for Elfvin. The judge's supporters call him smart, independent and hard-working. Critics say he is prone to terrible lapses in judgment.

"I still enjoy [the job] and feel I can do it," Elfvin told The News. "Absolutely. Absolutely."

Controversy has surrounded the case of Toohey - who has long been active in Niagara County politics - for more than three years. The U.S. Justice Department protested after Elfvin sentenced Toohey to probation in May 2003 and again in July 2004. Prosecutors said probation was insufficient punishment for a $1 million tax crime. They said Elfvin failed to explain his legal reasons behind the sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0029961

Advisory federal sentencing guidelines called for a prison term of 15 to 21 months for Toohey. According to prosecutors, Toohey's crime cost the government about $410,000 in tax collections.

The prosecutor in the case, William J. Gillmeister, has complained in the past that Toohey had received "unfair special treatment" from Elfvin. But this week, Gillmeister and U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn declined to comment on Elfvin's removal.

"The Second Circuit's ruling speaks for itself," Flynn said. "We're going to continue with this case in the courts and are not going to say anything beyond that."

One of the oldest judges ever to serve in Western New York, Elfvin is a senior, or semi-retired judge. If he chose to retire, he could collect his $165,200 salary as a pension, without doing any work.

Instead, he chooses to work nearly full-time, assisting Arcara and others with a large caseload.

The judge has continued working despite ailments and injuries, among them a spinal problem and two falls, including one last week that gave him a black eye and injured his ribs.

"I like to work. I guess I've always been that way," Elfvin said last year, as he celebrated his 30th anniversary on the federal bench. "It makes me feel good that I'm helping out with the workload."

But Elfvin also has a history of incidents that caused him some embarrassment.

In 1992, he reached an out-of-court settlement on a lawsuit filed by his former court stenographer, who accused him of tearing her blouse during a barroom argument. That year, he also received some unwanted national publicity when he took off on a Barbados vacation while his jury was deliberating on a huge case involving the Attica prison revolt.

More recently, he has been criticized several times by the U.S. Justice Department for ignoring the sentencing guidelines, which used to be mandatory but now are advisory. Many local lawyers agreed with Elfvin's stance on that issue.

One of those guidelines controversies involved Toohey. After a lengthy criminal investigation by the Internal Revenue Service, Toohey pleaded guilty in 2003 to a felony of making a false statement on an income tax return. Several prominent government officials wrote letters to Elfvin, asking for leniency for Toohey.

On Wednesday, Elfvin described Toohey as "a friend only in the practice of law." He said his remarks about his friendship with Toohey and the sympathy he feels toward Toohey were words he "only threw in as a side comment."

Toohey could not be reached to comment.

His attorney, Margaret A. Murphy, said this week that she is thankful that a new judge will be taking "a fresh look" at the case. But she insisted that Elfvin never showed favoritism toward Toohey in past rulings.

"I personally have never seen John Elfvin show favoritism, ever. He's the most independent judge on the federal bench," she y said.

Awaiting High Court Review Of Lethal Injection, Circuits Are Divided (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, May 26, 2006

A frustrated five-judge minority on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decried the "dysfunctional patchwork of stays and executions" in capital cases since January, when the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to explore a procedural attack on lethal injection.

Some 38 states use lethal injection out of the 39 that permit capital punishment. In all, courts around the country have granted nine stays of execution, but 15 condemned inmates have been executed during the same period that the lethal injection issue has been pending.

"In some instances stays are granted, while others they are not, and the defendants are executed with no principled distinction to justify such a result," wrote Judge Boyce Martin Jr. last week. He dissented after the full 6th Circuit refused, by a 7-5 vote, to reconsider the request to stay the Tennessee execution of Sedley Alley in Alley v. Little, No. 06-6550.

Alley faced execution on May 17 for the 1985 rape and murder of a 19-year-old Marine corporal, Suzanne M. Collins, at Millington Naval Air Station near Memphis. Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen last week granted a 15-day stay of execution. Alley's case is the second to challenge the Tennessee chemical protocol used in executions. The other, Abdur'Rahman v. Bredesen, No. 05-1036, was set for the high court's conference meeting one day after Alley's scheduled execution. Rahman's case raises a frontal attack on lethal injection.

Critics claim that the chemicals used in lethal injections do not properly anesthetize the subject, and thus cause unnecessary suffering before death.

AN UNNERVING SITUATION

DOJ_NMG_0029962

The situation around the country is unnerving for defense lawyers where stays may be handed out in one circuit but denied in the circuit next door.

"The problem is we have no guidance from the court on how to defend our clients," said Kelley Henry, one of Alley's lawyers. "It is very discouraging when your client's life is on the line."

She said that the stay request is no different from ones granted in Missouri, North Carolina, Maryland and other states where the execution method is under attack.

The 6th circuit refused to issue a stay to Alley even though he raised the same issue in the same procedural posture as a high court case likely to be decided in less than a month, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794. The question in Hill is not a direct challenge to lethal injection but a procedural one.

The case asks whether inmates may invoke a federal civil rights law, 42 U.S.C. 1983, to challenge the state's method of lethal injection. Without access to the civil rights claim, the court would have no jurisdiction to review the issue as a successive habeas appeal under a 1996 law in which Congress limited successive appeals.

Whether or not the high court decides a civil rights action is a proper vehicle for challenging lethal injection, it would not change Alley's situation, according to Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs, writing for the 6th Circuit majority. The Supreme Court has the authority to issue a nationwide stay of executions but it has not, Boggs pointed out.

The high court's consideration of a procedural matter such as Hill's "can not freeze in place all actions in the lower federal courts under existing law."

Even the Supreme Court has declined to issue stays in several cases raising nearly identical claims, he said.

"Given the Supreme Court's own pattern of conduct ... we cannot conclude that the Supreme Court has established any new precedent that would favor a stay of Alley's execution pending the outcome in Hill," he wrote.

The Hill case is the latest in a rising number of appeals over lethal injection from around the country.

On May 15, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals stayed an execution within hours of the deadline in a case that, like the others, raised lethal-injection challenges, but eight other condemned have been executed in the state this year, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington.

"I think the Supreme Court is going to have to take up the whole question of lethal injection eventually," he said.

In California, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel set hearings for September to review that state's lethal-injection practices in the case of Michael Morales. New Jersey and Ohio courts have halted executions while lethal-injection procedures are reviewed. Delaware stayed an execution May 9 based on a challenge to state execution procedure. And a federal court in Missouri stayed an execution to allow a lethal-injection challenge more time.

"The death penalty is basically grinding to a halt, but that means in the meantime some people are executed and some are not," said Dieter.

Judge Criticizes Government's New Indictment In Gotti Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 26, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-The third racketeering trial of John "Junior" Gotti was postponed Thursday by a federal judge who suggested the government was trying to sneak references to murders into a rewritten indictment.

The judge said it seemed the government was trying to reword the indictment until it could find a combination that would result in a conviction.

Two cases against Gotti in the last year ended with hung juries after defense attorneys argued that the mob scion had quit the crime mob life in 1999.

"I'm really troubled," U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said of the new Gotti indictment, which includes an allegation that Gotti promoted people within the Gambino crime family if they committed murders.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou said there was no specific new evidence he could immediately point to that would support the murder references in Gotti's racketeering indictment.

Scheindlin reset opening statements in the next trial by seven weeks, from July 5 to Aug. 28, so lawyers would have enough time to argue the issues.

Gotti lawyer Charles Carnesi said he would challenge the inclusion of language about murders, allegations that the judge had ordered removed before the first trial against Gotti.

"I think it's ridiculous that the government should be able to circumvent your rulings by rewriting the indictment," Carnesi said.

The judge agreed to a point, saying "it certainly reveals the problem with allowing a third trial."

DOJ_NMG_0029963

The government also has alleged in a revised indictment brought this week that Gotti continued racketeering activities through this month by laundering money earned by the Gambino crime families with businesses he had created. They also alleged he tampered with a witness in another trial.

Carnesi said he would challenge the new allegations as well.

Gotti pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999 and he has maintained that he left the mob life and never returned.

The government continues to allege that Gotti ordered two attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa in 1992 after the Guardian Angels founder criticized Gotti's father on his radio show. John Gotti died in prison in 2002, a decade after he was convicted of racketeering and sentenced to life in prison.

The government alleges that Gotti ordered a baseball bat beating of Sliwa and a kidnapping several weeks later that ended with Sliwa being shot three times before he dived out of a moving taxi. Sliwa recovered from the attack to resume his on-air Gotti criticisms. Gotti has denied ordering the attacks on Sliwa.

Sliwa, wearing his signature Guardian Angels outfit, watched Thursday as a spectator while Gotti entered a plea of not guilty to the rewritten indictment.

If convicted, Gotti faces 30 years in prison.

Prosecutors Fire Back At Wecht's Defense (PTR)

By David Conti, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, May 26, 2006

Federal prosecutors responded Thursday to allegations made by former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht's defense team that the district attorney and an FBI agent built a case against the renowned forensic pathologist based on politics and lies.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings asked U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab to dismiss Wecht's request to have evidence tossed out, calling the defense team's previous court filings a "journey down a road to a tangle of conspiracy theories."

"Defendant's motion to suppress, though 'full of sound and fury' ... lacks substance, and should be denied without further hearing," Stallings wrote.

Wecht's attorneys asked for 10 days to respond to Stallings' filing.

In their motion filed last month, defense attorneys Mark Rush and Jerry McDevitt accused District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr. of using his office for personal gain -- the same allegations Wecht faces -- by funneling county money to his former law firm.

Wecht, 75, of Squirrel Hill, was indicted in January on 84 counts of using his public office to benefit his private forensic consulting business.

Stallings wrote that Zappala's hiring of his former law firm as a solicitor to his office while accepting buyout payments from his sale of his portion of the firm does not appear to be illegal. Even if Zappala had crossed ethical lines, Stallings argued the issue was not relevant to the charges against Wecht.

Rush and McDevitt claim Zappala pushed federal prosecutors to investigate Wecht during a political struggle between the two powerful Democrats.

Zappala has declined to comment on his arrangement with the law firm of Brucker Schneider and Porter and would not speak yesterday about the new filing.

Also irrelevant to the charges against Wecht, Stallings wrote, are allegations that FBI Special Agent Brad Orsini -- one of the lead investigators in the case -- has a bad reputation and once asked a witness to lie.

According to a ruling by Schwab last month, prosecutors have two reports outlining Orsini's history of departmental reprimands. Wecht's attorneys argue search warrants filed by Orsini were based on a "fanciful yarn."

Stallings responded that the evidence turned up in searches of the former coroner's office and Wecht's private offices supported the charges against Wecht. Among the items the FBI found in its searches were e-mails proving that Wecht had county employees spending time working on his personal business, federal authorities allege.

Workers Begin Digging Under Barn At Hoffa Search Site (SDUT/AP)

By Tom Krisher, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, May 26, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. – After tearing apart a barn, FBI agents began digging up the ground where it stood Thursday, taking photos and video and sifting through dirt by hand as they searched for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a suburban Detroit farm.

After a backhoe dug a hole at the site, FBI agents and crime-scene investigators jumped in to take pictures and comb through the soil. At one point, two dogs were sent into the hole. But after seven hours of digging, FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said nothing significant was found.

"Much ado about nothing," Clenney said. She said the search was expected to continue through the Memorial Day holiday weekend.

The 100-by-30-foot barn was torn down Wednesday as the FBI scoured Hidden Dreams Farm, which once was owned by a Hoffa associate and is located not far from where the former Teamsters chief vanished in 1975. Before the dig began Thursday, authorities removed a layer of concrete and asphalt that had been the floor of three rooms inside the building.

The search of the Milford Township farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit, began May 17. Officials have said the search would last a couple of weeks and involve cadaver dogs, demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

Bill Koresky, whose company was hired by the FBI to knock down the barn and dig beneath it, said the digging was stopped when a university professor who is leading the work noticed a change in the color of the dirt and a piece of what looked like rotted wood.

"You'll see the color will be different, I don't care if it's 70 or 80 years" since the land was disturbed, said Koresky, the co-owner of Able Demolition of Sterling Heights who ran one of the excavation machines at the site on Wednesday and Thursday.

Cadaver dogs were sent into the hole but turned up nothing significant, Clenney said.

Koresky said that before stopping for the day, crews had dug a 50- by 40-foot hole that was 3 1/2- to 4-feet deep. A trained eye, he said, can tell whether the dirt has been disturbed by digging to that depth.

Donald Shouse of nearby Highland Township, who has done business on the horse farm for three decades, said demolished barn had been built sometime in the 1970s and was the oldest barn on the site.

No trace of Hoffa has ever been found, and no one has ever been charged in his disappearance.

A government investigator said last week that Donovan Wells, who lived on the land at the time, gave the FBI the tip that sparked the intense effort to solve the legendary mystery. The investigator is familiar with the current dig and spoke on condition of anonymity because some of his information came from records that have been ordered sealed by a federal judge.

Hoffa last was seen on a night he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, both now dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories – that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown to the fish in a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

More Than $1 Million In Cash Found At Miami-Dade Homes Linked To MIA Heist (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, May 26, 2006

FBI agents have dug up $1.1 million in vacuum-packed cash stashed at two southwest Miami-Dade houses, recovering some of the loot stolen in a Goodfellas-style heist at Miami International Airport.

Agents unearthed $300,000 of the sealed cash under brick pavers at the home of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who were indicted along with two others in last fall's $7.4 million warehouse ripoff at MIA.

They also found an additional $800,000 at the residence of another person who has not been charged in the federal case.

"We're still searching for the rest of the money and for other suspects," FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday.

The FBI found the stolen cash in mid-May. Earlier this year, agents had recovered $80,000 from the attic of the Monzons and $85,000 from another robbery defendant, Onelio Diaz. He was a security guard with Brinks security system, the company hired to transport the cash from the MIA warehouse to the Federal Reserve Bank in the Doral area.

In addition, Jeffrey Boatwright was indicted in the alleged robbery caper.

Separately, three other suspects were charged with kidnapping Boatwright: Michael Sanfiel, Guillermo Del-Regato and Manuel A. Palacio. The three kidnapped Boatwright and demanded a $500,000 payment from his robbery cohorts for his release, according to an indictment.

Sanfiel and Del-Regato have pleaded guilty and are cooperating with prosecutors, court records show.

The initial $7.4 million in stolen cash was a fraction of the $80 million that had arrived at MIA in November on a Lufthansa Airlines flight from Frankfurt, Germany. The cash, packed neatly in 42 bags that each weighed 38 pounds, was awaiting Customs' clearance at a warehouse before it was to be delivered to the Federal Reserve Bank.

The robbery mirrors one of the most infamous heists in U.S. history: the Dec. 11, 1978, robbery of $5.85 million from the Lufthansa Airlines cargo terminal at John F. Kennedy International Airport.

That robbery was the plot for the 1990 movie Goodfellas.

FBI Finds $1 Million From Airport Heist Buried At Miami-Dade House (FLSUNSEN)

By Akilah Johnson, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, May 26, 2006

FBI officials said Thursday they unearthed more than $1 million in buried loot taken during a November heist at Miami International Airport, a caper that easily could have been lifted from the pages of a Hollywood screenplay.

Masked men with guns busted into an airport warehouse and ripped off part of an $80 million cash shipment headed to the Federal Reserve Bank in Miami. The thieves divvied up the cash and dodged authorities for months. Then someone gave them up, but not before one of the thieves was kidnapped for ransom.

Now, fast forward to May 13.

Agents dug up $300,000 stashed in vacuum-sealed bags and buried below brick pavers outside the south Miami-Dade County house of Karls and Cinnamon Monzon, who had been indicted along with two others for the Nov. 6 heist.

Another $800,000 was found beneath the living room floor of a second south Miami-Dade home that belongs to someone who has not been charged in the case, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said Thursday.

A total of $1.26 million has been recovered so far, but it is only a small chunk of the $7.4 million taken from the cash shipment that arrived at the airport on board Lufthansa Airlines Flight 462 from Frankfurt, Germany.

"We're still looking," Orihuela said. "We're going to follow all the logical leads we can until we find it all."

The first bit of stolen money was recovered after local and federal authorities arrested the Monzons on Feb. 17.

Investigators found $80,000 hidden in the couple's attic. The same night, authorities arrested Onelio Diaz, a former Brinks Security guard who was carrying $5,000 and had $80,000 separated into three bundles in his car.

In March, a Miami grand jury indicted Karls Monzon, Diaz and Jeffrey Boatwright for allegedly planning and committing the robbery. Cinnamon Monzon was indicted on a charge of being an accessory because she knew her husband participated, authorities said.

Boatwright was kidnapped by three men, who threatened to kill him unless his robbery cohorts paid $500,000, officials said. On Feb. 18, agents found him bound and beaten in the bed of a pickup truck. Michael Sanfiel, Manuel Palacio, and Guillermo Del-Regato were indicted on charges of conspiracy to take a hostage.

Muhammad's Lack Of Legal Knowledge Shows (BSUN)

By Julie Scharper

The Baltimore Sun, May 26, 2006

ROCKVILLE -- John Allen Muhammad, who aggressively hammered his former accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo with questions and shouted at prosecutors yesterday, appeared deflated today, as three witnesses whom he had called added little or nothing to his defense.

Muhammad, who is representing himself, meekly ceded to most of the prosecution's objections that his questions were leading, inappropriate or irrelevant.

The state rested its case against Muhammad, 45, yesterday after unveiling an enormous amount of evidence over three weeks, including ballistics reports, fingerprints, DNA and Malvo's firsthand account of the pair's murderous rampage. Muhammad is on trial in Montgomery County for six counts of murder in the October 2002 sniper shootings.

One of the defense witnesses, Heidi Mansen of Silver Spring, said outside the courtroom that she believes Muhammad is guilty of the slayings, and she hopes her testimony won't sway the jury.

"I'm hoping that my testimony amounts to nothing compared to the other evidence against him," Mansen said. She testified that she saw a red car feet away from the scene of one of the sniper shootings. Police later said that the car was not involved in that crime.

"I felt bad because I had testified against the wrong person," Mansen said. "Just because I saw something doesn't mean that's what really happened."

Muhammad's lack of legal finesse hampered his efforts in questioning other witnesses.

He doggedly tried to ask a Secret Service agent about a report that could not be entered into evidence as prosecutors successfully blocked nearly every question.

A third witness, Elgin Jamison of Oxen Hill, testified that he saw an unusual white van parked several hundred yards away from one of the shooting sites an hour before the murder occurred. Early in the spate of shootings, which left 10 people dead and three injured in the Washington area, police released a sketch of a white box truck wanted in connection with the shootings.

Jamison was one of thousands who called tip lines and reported seeing white trucks or vans. Police later released a description of Muhammad's 1990 blue Chevrolet Caprice, which led to the arrest of Muhammad and Malvo. Both have been tried and convicted for sniper slayings in Virginia. Muhammad is on death row for a sniper murder there.

Several people Muhammad planned to call refused to come, saying they didn't want to take part in his defense because of his notoriety, according to an attorney who is helping Muhammad with his case.

"I've been threatened, I've been chased off people's property, I've had people's subpoenas balled up and thrown away right in front of me," said lawyer J. Wyndal Gordon.

Robert Metzger, who testified today that he saw two suspicious people at a Bowie middle school three days before a 13-year-old boy was shot there, said he initially tried to avoid appearing for Muhammad. He eventually agreed when Gordon found him.

"That guy killed a lot of people," Metzger said after his testimony. "I don't want to be a part of that."

Montgomery Circuit Judge James L. Ryan quashed Muhammad's subpoena for Fairfax County, Va., Detective June Boyle, who questioned Malvo after he and Muhammad were arrested Oct. 24, 2002.

Malvo told Boyle that he was the triggerman in all 13 sniper shootings, but Malvo testified this week that he lied to protect Muhammad and said Muhammad was the triggerman in 10 shootings. When prosecutors objected to the plan to call Boyle, Muhammad claimed Boyle fed sniper details to Malvo when he confessed.

"The information that Lee Boyd Malvo allegedly told her he didn't tell her," said Muhammad, who wanted to probe Boyle about notes she took during the lengthy interview. "She told him all the details pertaining to this crime."

Ryan said Muhammad missed his chance to ask Malvo about the interview and ruled against him.

"Those areas are not relevant to the evidence as it is being presented," he said.

Malvo agreed to plead guilty to the same six Maryland murders this week and gave a detailed, inside account of the planning and execution of the sniper shootings. He said Muhammad devised the scheme to terrorize the region, and planned even more killings.

Muhammad and Malvo are also suspected of earlier shootings in Maryland, Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

Muhammad claimed he and Malvo were simply driving around the Washington, D.C., area looking for the children Muhammad has lost in a custody battle. He said in his opening statement that he would prove himself and Malvo innocent.

Muhammad Gets Little Help From His Witnesses (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad had little luck yesterday with witnesses he called in his defense, so today he might testify himself.

"I reserve the right to answer that [later]," Muhammad told Montgomery County Circuit Judge James L. Ryan, when asked whether he planned to put himself on the stand.

Muhammad is representing himself, even though he has no legal training, and prosecutors objected to more than half of his hundreds of questions to witnesses yesterday, often successfully.

Muhammad, 45, is charged with six counts of capital murder stemming from the October 2002 sniper spree.

If he does take the stand, Muhammad's testimony would take the form of a "presentation," his standby attorney, J. Wyndal Gordon, said.

Closing arguments are expected Tuesday.

Muhammad called four witnesses yesterday after calling his first three Wednesday, and hopes to call "three or four" today, Mr. Gordon said.

But Mr. Gordon said many people subpoenaed by Muhammad have refused to come to court.

"Witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense," Mr. Gordon told the judge. "They're saying, 'I don't care what you do, even if you send the sheriff's deputies after me, I'm still not coming.'

"I've been threatened. I've been chased off people's properties. ... I've had subpoenas balled up and thrown at me," Mr. Gordon said. "I didn't realize how dangerous serving subpoenas could be."

The few witnesses who did come to court said that they didn't want to be there and that they didn't want to help Muhammad.

DOJ_NMG_0029967

"It was scary testifying for someone that you believe actually did it, and not wanting to help his case, but I had to tell what I saw," said Heidi Mansen, a Silver Spring architect who saw the sniper's sixth shooting.

Mrs. Mansen was in her car at a stoplight, heading north on Georgia Avenue Northwest, just inside the District line, on Oct. 3, 2002, when Pascal Charlot, 72, was shot on the sidewalk to her right.

The red car between Mrs. Mansen's car and Mr. Charlot sped off from the light as soon as the shot was fired.

Mrs. Mansen chased the car and called police, who pulled over the car in Maryland, just inside the Beltway. The car's driver was arrested on drug charges that were not related to the sniper shootings.

Robert Metzger, who ran a youth program at Benjamin Tasker Middle School in Bowie two days before 13-year-old Iran Brown was shot there Oct. 7, 2002, also testified for Muhammad yesterday against his will.

"I didn't want to be talking to him," Mr. Metzger said.

Mr. Metzger said he saw two strange men in the woods next to the school on the evening of Oct. 4, 2002, a Friday, and told them to leave. He said he had never seen Muhammad before.

Outside the courtroom, Mr. Metzger said he understood that Muhammad "wanted me to make [him] look good," and then cursed.

Muhammad questioned Ralph Daigneau, a Prince William County, Va., detective who is organizing the trial evidence, for about two hours, probing his handling of the evidence.

Muhammad also tried to call Fairfax County Detective June Boyle to the stand. Lee Boyd Malvo, Muhammad's accomplice, told Detective Boyle after he was arrested that he shot all 13 victims. In two days of testimony this week, Malvo said he lied to Detective Boyle to protect Muhammad.

Malvo once considered Muhammad a father figure, but said this week in court that Muhammad is a "coward" who pulled the trigger in 10 of the 13 shootings.

Judge Ryan denied Muhammad's request to question Detective Boyle. The judge also told the jury that prosecutors, despite Muhammad's many complaints, have provided all the evidence required under law.

Muhammad and Malvo each were convicted of one fatal shooting in Virginia, two of the 10 fatalities in the three-week spree that also left three persons wounded.

A Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death, but authorities said they brought him to Montgomery County for insurance, in case his first conviction is overturned. A Chesapeake, Va., jury sentenced Malvo to life in prison without parole. In Montgomery County, he testified this week for the prosecution and pleaded guilty to the six slayings for which Muhammad is being tried.

Witnesses In Sniper Trial Wary (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Call it the uncooperative witness defense.

Sniper John Allen Muhammad, who submitted a list of nearly 180 potential witnesses and has closely guarded his defense strategy at his trial in Montgomery County, intends to call no witnesses after today.

"The difficulty we're having is witnesses don't want to be a part of Mr. Muhammad's defense," J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's standby attorneys, told the judge. "I've actually been told: 'I don't care what you do. If the judge wants to send the sheriff after me, so be it. I'm not coming.' "

Closing arguments could come as soon as Tuesday, and a verdict on six first-degree murder charges in the October 2002 shootings is likely before the end of next week.

Muhammad questioned three witnesses Wednesday and five yesterday. Most had been near one of the sniper shootings and gave police statements that didn't incriminate Muhammad. None offered an account that contradicted the case prosecutors have laid out in recent weeks. But getting those witnesses to show up was a struggle.

"I've actually been threatened. I've been chased off people's property. I've had subpoenas balled up and thrown on the ground right in front of me," said Gordon, who with two other lawyers volunteered to represent Muhammad after he fired his public defenders and asked to represent himself. "It's been a very abusive situation. . . . I didn't realize how dangerous serving subpoenas could be."

Other defense witnesses included a Prince William County police officer who described a small clerical error that delayed obtaining a mouth swab to get a sample of Muhammad's DNA. Another was a U.S. Secret Service forensic document examiner who was not allowed to answer questions about documents he reviewed in connection with the case because he was not testifying as an expert witness.

While cross-examining Maria Jimenez, who heard a blast near one of the shootings, Muhammad appeared to grow irritated by her answers and called her "hostile."

At one point, for no apparent reason, he demanded to know: "Are you a citizen of the United States?"

A startled Jimenez did not have to answer after Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan sustained the prosecutors' objection to the question.

Another witness, Robert Metzger, testified yesterday that he had a bizarre encounter with two men outside a Bowie school three days before Iran Brown, a 13-year-old student at the school, was shot.

Muhammad was apparently trying to prove that two suspicious people who did not meet the description of him or accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo were near the shooting scene.

"There were actually two guys back there, and one of them was kind of like chanting, and I didn't really go too close to them to ask them what he was doing. He said he was praying for the grounds," Metzger testified. "The guy was whacked out. You could kind of tell he was messed up. What this has to do with this, I don't know."

Metzger said later that he disregarded a defense subpoena that asked him to show up Wednesday. Gordon stopped by his home yesterday morning and drove him to court.

"They were trying to get me to help that dude," Metzger said after he finished testifying. Later he said, "I don't even want to be here."

The defense expects to call three witnesses today. Muhammad, 45, could also choose to testify. Malvo, 21, agreed to plead guilty to the killings and testified against his former mentor this week.

Because he is representing himself, Muhammad would have to testify in narrative form, an unusual format during which defendants speak freely. Muhammad declined to tell Ryan whether he will testify.

"I'm reserving the right to answer that right now," Muhammad said.

A Killer's Testimony (WP)

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

WHATEVER Lee Boyd Malvo's reasons were for testifying against fellow sniper John Allen Muhammad this week -- whether to curry favor with prosecutors, or to redeem himself with the victims and their families, or to confront and defy his former mentor at last -- his appearance shed some light on the motive and method behind the pair's murderous binge in October 2002.

Taking the stand as a prosecution witness at Mr. Muhammad's trial on six counts of murder in Montgomery County, Mr. Malvo -- already sentenced to life in prison without the chance of parole in Virginia -- laid out the older man's sinister purpose in undertaking the series of killings that paralyzed this region for weeks. Mr. Muhammad's intent, Mr. Malvo suggested, was to induce a wave of mayhem in the Washington area that would somehow allow him to take back his three children, whom he had lost to their mother in a custody dispute and who were living in Clinton. The wave of shootings was just the first phase of Mr. Muhammad's plan, Mr. Malvo said; after that he intended to plant bombs that specifically targeted children.

Mr. Malvo also provided details about the pair's methodology in surveying sites and identifying victims -- in some instances while under cross-examination by Mr. Muhammad, who acted as his own lawyer. By representing himself, Mr. Muhammad was within his constitutional rights, but he did himself no favors. Rather than establishing a plausible defense, Mr. Muhammad, who has already been sentenced to die in Virginia, seemed more interested in displaying his old psychological dominance over Mr. Malvo, his former protege. His self-advocacy was a perversion of legal defense work and a platform for his own megalomania and extravagant self-regard.

We don't know whether Mr. Malvo's appearance provided any psychological comfort or closure for the surviving victims and their loved ones. For the most part, the face-off between two killers was a sickening spectacle. But it did fill in the blanks of what is publicly known about an event that traumatized this region and left lasting psychological scars, and that has its own value. Mr. Malvo may finally have come clean as to the events of that grim autumn, particularly when he looked Mr. Muhammad in the eye and said: "I think [you are] a coward. You took me into your house, and you made me a monster."

Psychiatric Care Denied To Gunman, Attorney Says (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

In the three months before he fatally shot two Fairfax County police officers, Michael W. Kennedy and his parents tried numerous times to get him immediate psychiatric help, their attorney said. Four times, Kennedy was sent home without getting help, and two mental health facilities told them not to bother coming in at all.

On one occasion, Kennedy, 18, who by this time claimed he was talking to God and was threatening suicide, was voluntarily admitted to a mental health facility in Rockville. But after several hours, he left of his own accord and carjacked a vehicle to return home to Fairfax.

"This young man was crying out for help," said Richard F. MacDowell Jr., the attorney for Brian and Margaret Kennedy, Michael Kennedy's parents. "On at least five occasions, they sought mental health services and were turned away. I can't think of another case that would be this compelling as to how ineffective our mental health system has become."

Michael Kennedy's last contact with mental health professionals occurred May 4, four days before he carried seven loaded guns to the Sully District police station and opened fire, MacDowell said. Kennedy fatally shot Detective Vicky O. Armel and Officer Michael E. Garbarino before being shot to death by other officers.

MacDowell spoke on behalf of Kennedy's parents to express their frustration at a system that seemed unable or unwilling to help their son. MacDowell said Kennedy's mental condition was never diagnosed, except for "a generalized diagnosis of depression and then anxiety at the end. This was somebody who was obviously deeply troubled."

Despite Kennedy's mental problems, the parents did not remove their guns from their home because the weapons were kept in locked containers, MacDowell said. The Kennedys did not expect their son to break into them.

Police could not verify the family's version of events, because the Kennedys have not met with authorities in the investigation of the killings. MacDowell said he could not comment on the reasons for that.

Beginning in February, Kennedy was evaluated twice at the Woodburn Center for Community Mental Health in Annandale and twice at Prince William Hospital in Manassas but was turned away all four times, MacDowell said. He was not given any medication or a plan for treatment. Officials at those facilities said they could not discuss individual cases because of privacy laws.

Woodburn is part of the Fairfax-Falls Church Community Services Board, with mental health professionals available 24 hours a day to evaluate people and, if necessary, recommend that they be hospitalized, even involuntarily. Prince William Hospital has its own psychiatric inpatient ward.

Experts said the refusal to treat Kennedy is far from surprising.

"Particularly here in Northern Virginia, it's so hard to get somebody in when they need psychiatric care," said Mary Zdanowicz, executive director of the Treatment Advocacy Center in Arlington. She said the definition of who must be given immediate treatment -- a person who is in "imminent danger" of harming himself or others or is incapable of caring for himself -- is usually interpreted too strictly, often because facilities don't have room for anyone but the most obviously dangerous people.

Northern Virginia has lost about one-third of its private psychiatric beds in the past three years and more than half of its beds -- a decrease from 402 to 196 -- since 1990, Zdanowicz said. The one state mental hospital in the region, Northern Virginia Mental Health Institute in Fairfax, is "always full," Zdanowicz said.

"The people that desperately need care aren't getting help."

Kennedy's family knew he needed help and had him seeing a private therapist early this year, MacDowell said. But on Feb. 13, while home alone, the teenager shot the family dog. Kennedy told police and friends that he had been suicidal that day, then decided against killing himself but accidentally fired a gun and hit the dog.

MacDowell said police took Kennedy to the Woodburn center that day. After an evaluation, "they determined he was not in need of future services. They had been told that he was seeing a therapist" and advised that was sufficient, MacDowell said.

Kennedy returned to Woodburn with his parents on Easter Sunday, April 16, after he told them "he's got to be seen by somebody," MacDowell said. After a lengthy evaluation, MacDowell said Kennedy was told: "You're too smart to be here. You don't need to be here. Just go home. Here are four sleeping pills. Go see your private doctor."

The Kennedy family was not satisfied and returned to Woodburn the next day. MacDowell said a crisis intervention team met with Kennedy, determined that his family had insurance and found a bed for him at Potomac Ridge Behavioral Health Center in Rockville. He was voluntarily admitted the next day, April 18, but broke out a window later that evening and left. He told friends that he didn't like the way he was being treated. He then stole a car and drove back to Fairfax.

Euphia Hsu Smith, a spokeswoman for Potomac Ridge, said she could not discuss the specifics of Kennedy's case because of privacy laws. But she noted that "because we're a health-care facility, we're not a detention facility. We're not set up for detention, especially if someone is here voluntarily."

On April 24, MacDowell said, Kennedy's mother again tried to get her son help. She called Inova Fairfax and Dominion hospitals, both with limited numbers of psychiatric beds, and was told that there was no room, MacDowell said. She then contacted Prince William Hospital, which said that Kennedy should be brought to the emergency room.

"He's talking about cutting himself, he's suicidal and God talks to him," MacDowell said of Kennedy. "They say he's fine and give him 10 milligrams of Ambien," a sleeping pill, MacDowell said.

DOJ_NMG_0029970

Donna Ballou, a spokeswoman for Prince William Hospital, said the hospital disagrees with MacDowell's claims but could not be more specific because of privacy laws.

By early May, Kennedy was talking about aliens, MacDowell said. Margaret Kennedy called Prince William Hospital on May 4 and took him back to the emergency room, in tears, MacDowell said.

MacDowell said the staff thought Kennedy was claiming mental problems to evade criminal charges. "The diagnosis is anxiety," MacDowell said. "And they let him go."

"It's astonishing," MacDowell said, "how the system has deteriorated to the point that a clearly troubled individual, such as Michael Kennedy, cannot receive inpatient services. Our mental health system in Virginia is essentially broken when the severely ill cannot receive vital and necessary services."

Financial Firms Attack Child Porn (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, May 26, 2006

The nation's leading banks and credit card companies will soon team with law enforcement in a groundbreaking coalition to catch people who sell child pornography online.

The financial institutions will report child porn sites they discover on the Web to a central tip line, slated to expand next month to receive the information. The companies will block transactions for online child porn or, if law enforcement opens an investigation, help track sellers and buyers.

The Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography represents a new phase in the war against what has become a multibillion-dollar, international business. Internet service providers, including AOL, already report child porn sites they find.

“The scope of the problem is much greater than we ever thought. It's mind-boggling,” says Ernie Allen of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, a private group that runs the tip line. Allen says one website can attract tens of thousands of customers, mostly men, who use credit cards to buy $29 monthly subscriptions. “People are getting into this because they see children as a commodity. There's no question organized crime is involved.”

Eager to take profitability out of online child porn, Allen and Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., brought together the companies.

“This is the broadest, most comprehensive coalition we've been involved in,” says Joshua Peirez, a MasterCard executive. “This is not a competitiveness issue. This is about protecting children,” he says.

Participants include Visa, MasterCard, American Express and Discover, which cover most of the U.S. credit card market. Also involved are Bank of America, Chase, Citigroup and PayPal. Visa, MasterCard and American Express say they will identify sites accepting their cards to sell child porn but won't reveal customers unless subpoenaed.

Canada Cracks Down On Rising Violence (CSM)

By Josie Newman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

TORONTO - The predawn sting operation last week that resulted in more than 100 arrests of individuals associated with Toronto's Jamestown gang, is being hailed as the city's largest anti-gang sweep ever. The raid netted a substantial cache of guns, cocaine, marijuana, and stolen cars, and more than 1,000 criminal charges were levied.

"The community is talking to us a lot more and providing us with crucial information since more officers started doing foot patrol late last year," says Toronto's deputy police chief, Tony Warr, who heads the city police's guns and gangs unit. "People ... seem relieved that gun-crime legislation is getting tougher," he adds.

Both the sting operation and the recent legislation are part of a larger crackdown on handguns and gang violence in Canada, particularly in Toronto where handgun murders and injuries doubled between 2004 and 2005.

But while police and the public applaud the hard-line approach, social pundits and criminology professors are skeptical that the approach is getting at the roots of the problem: poverty, illiteracy, dysfunctional families, and racism in a diverse ethnic population. They cite US cities such as Boston, where a similar initiative led to an 80 percent drop in homicide rates by 1999 - a success dubbed the "Boston miracle." But fatal shootings have more than doubled since.

In Canada, guns and gangs are a relatively new phenomenon, particularly in Toronto, known as "Toronto the Good" for its traditionally safe streets and low homicide rates. There were 52 deadly handgun shootings in the city in 2005, compared with 12 in 1995. Police and social workers alike attribute the acts largely to young black males - many of whom are the children of West Indian immigrants - who feel marginalized and drop out of school early to join the "gangsta" culture where they make quick money through drugs, guns, or prostitution.

The Ontario provincial government has earmarked $51 million Canadian ($46 million US) to spend on crime deterrence and new social programs related to education, employment, and skills training - C$5 million of that has already been spent on forming a 24-hour police street squad who ferret out drug dealers, illegal guns, and people breaking parole or on warrants for crimes in Toronto's most violent neighborhoods.

Provincial money has also been designated for a $26-million Operations Centre for the Guns and Gangs Task Force, as well as for 31 prosecutors, three judges, and several high-tech courtrooms specifically designed to try gun- and gang-related crimes.

In addition, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's new Conservative government recently introduced tough new legislation designed to curb handgun deaths, reduce the trafficking in illegal weapons, and shut down growing inner-city gangs. Coupled with other new legislation for "lesser" offenses like trying to steal a weapon, the initiatives will cost Canadian taxpayers an additional C$220 to C$240 million annually for extra prison facilities alone.

While several multimillion-dollar programs that address the educational, social, and employment needs of disenfranchised youth have been implemented over the past year, critics say effective solutions that get to the crux of the problem haven't yet been found.

"What [these kids] really want is respect, a school system that's responsive and sensitive to their social situation, money for education and employment, and positive male role models," says Anthony Hutchinson, a former professor of social work who served as a consultant to the "Safe Schools, Healthy Communities" initiative of the Conservative government last year.

"If you give them proper funding for skills training and provide those with good [grades] free postsecondary education, many of them will turn around and teach and do social work in the communities they left. If the government saved just 25 percent of the money they use to control crime for crime prevention, they'd eliminate a lot of it and save money in the long run," he adds.

"I work in Jane-Finch, one of Toronto's most violent areas, and it's nothing short of miraculous the transformation I've seen happen with potentially violent youth once we spend consistent time with them, listening, disciplining, and guiding," says the Rev. Alvin Nicholson of Coalition of Christian Leaders, which implements Down with Guns - a C$3 million program funded by the provincial government that primarily targets black youth vulnerable to gang involvement.

"We stay with them through whatever programs they're in until they come out the other end - many of them end up then mentoring other troubled youth," says Mr. Nicholson.

But such government initiatives are often hit-and-miss, says Josephine Grey, a widow who started the nongovernmental organization Low Income Families Together several years ago in response to what she saw as a huge discrepancy between the public system's treatment of the middle class and the working poor.

The widow - who says she supports her four children on C$1,200 a month - points to the new community center built for St. Jamestown, one of Toronto's largest multiethnic, low-income areas, where she lives. The free programs, including continuing education and language classes, are primarily used by outsiders with computers, she says, because they can register more quickly.

Man Gets 20 Months In Cross Burning (CO)

By Jen Aronoff

The Charlotte Observer, May 26, 2006

A former Morganton resident who admitted building and burning a cross has been sentenced to 20 months in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday.

In 2004, a federal grand jury accused Grady Allan Carswell, 36, now of Lenoir, of putting a burning cross in front of a black couple's home in the Bristol Creek community.

Carswell pled guilty in January 2005 to a one-count indictment related to the incident but said he burned the cross because of a land dispute with another neighbor, not out of racism.

At a sentencing hearing Monday, U.S. District Judge Lacy Thornburg rejected that argument and ordered Carswell serve the prison time followed by three years' probation. He will also have to pay the victims about $2,200 in restitution.

"Cross burning remains a vicious symbol of hatred and cannot be tolerated," Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said in a news release. "All American families have the right to live where they choose, undisturbed by racist threats.

Stop The Black-Only Treatment (WP)

By Michael Meyers

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

I'm sorry to report that 52 years after Brown v. Board of Education, separate but equal is all the rage in certain parts of the education world -- especially on college campuses where special programs are offered that target minority students for "special" and separate attention, counseling, mentoring, tutoring, residences and instruction.

The latest of these race fads are the Black Male Initiatives (BMIs), government-funded and university-sponsored, and underway on campuses in states including Georgia, Kansas, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. The initiatives focus on recruiting, schooling and "saving" black men.

Until recently, when the New York Civil Rights Coalition filed a complaint against the City University of New York, these special programs were unassailable. But more and more they are being shown to feature new variants of an old prejudice. This has included stereotyping all black male students as "at risk," and, for example, running special classes only for black men at CUNY's Medgar Evers College. This special instruction focused on black men's alleged deficiencies and their need to act more responsibly in order to reclaim their traditional patriarchal roles as leaders in the black community and of the so-called black race. A tenet of the program at CUNY's Queensborough Community College is to provide black men with special tutoring, career services and academic advice. Until caught, CUNY's Hunter College invited only black male students to a planning conference on its BMI.

Many black leaders in and outside academia seem to have no objection to these figurative black-only signs over certain doorways at America's colleges. Not surprisingly, this racial identity ferment -- aka self-determination -- is proudly endorsed by white liberals disturbed by the dwindling numbers of black men on campus, as well as by many black female students for whom interracial dating is either taboo or impracticable.

Hence, college presidents are listening to their black students and to their officials for diversity and affirmative action or minority affairs, and they are setting up BMIs as a way of making life on campus more comfortable for black students. And black faculty have a new source of grants to apply for, from foundations that urge the study of the black male problem and experimentation with intervention techniques. No educator rebukes such offerings with the hard, nonstatistical truth that there is no such thing as "the black male," just as there never was such a thing as "the Negro."

While not all BMIs look alike, they're typically designed with an Afrocentric, male-domination focus, replete with outreach and links to black men's fraternal, community and pride organizations. Through emphasis on racial pride and "black male identity," black male students are encouraged, as at Medgar Evers College, to think about the status and future of the race: "The people in the village are many but the warriors are few and are now scattered; thus, leaving the borders unprotected and us as easy prey for the enemy," according to the director of the college's Male Development and Empowerment Center. Racial breast beating is a powerful ingredient in winning and securing support for such separatist programming.

Some BMIs are open to all students, for legal reasons. But the nomenclature shows a mission of serving and rescuing "at risk" black men from their alleged self-destructive behavior and from the afflictions of their environment. Only legal curmudgeons, it seems, would stand in the way of college as parent and social engineer, full of missionary zeal to bring rehabilitation and redemption to the wretched, conflicted souls of black men.

When the college takes on such tasks it is only confirming and reinforcing pernicious racial stereotypes. The penchant to isolate, track and segregate black men is a deeply offensive and nasty American social habit, and programs that parrot and mirror such group prejudices are as crude as they are paternalistic. Indeed, schools treating black men separately and differently from all others of similar age and qualification is exactly what federal Judge Robert L. Carter cautioned against in his indictment of proposals for public schools for African American boys. "The advocates of this panacea place no blame on the public school system," Carter said, but black males "are stigmatized and must be isolated from others in order to develop into productive adults."

The psychologist Kenneth Clark, who was my mentor and whose research did so much to bring about Brown, steered his colleagues on the New York State Board of Regents away from state-sponsored racial thinking. He persuaded them in 1972 to declare as policy that college officials were to avoid "any practices which would perpetuate a caste system in which groups are placed in certain stereotyped positions with little regard for the needs and desires of the individual." That policy continued: "Racist patterns of segregation can lead only to blocked communications, with a resultant social climate that is close and tense, if not hostile. Moreover, the de facto segregation of a minority group, even if demanded by that group, often results in peer pressure on individuals which may lead to intragroup hostility."

Dr. Clark died just last year, by which time the regents had long since abandoned the wisdom in that policy.

ANTITRUST:

Benit, Wife Face Fraud Charges (AANEWS)

By MARJORIE KAUTH-KARJALA, News Staff Reporter

Ann Arbor News (MI), May 25, 2006

Fired Willow Run superintendent arrested in Ecorse district case

Former Willow Run schools superintendent Douglas A. Benit and his wife face federal criminal charges that they defrauded another school district and a federal program out of millions of dollars by steering contracts to companies they owned.

Benit and his wife, Mary Ann Elam Benit, were arrested Wednesday, a day after a federal grand jury in Detroit returned the indictment. Both were released on $10,000 personal bonds and are scheduled to be arraigned May 31 in federal District Court in Detroit.

Neither Benit nor his wife could be reached for comment. Benit's attorney in another matter, Don Gasiorek, said he is not representing Benit in the criminal matter and had no comment.

Benit was fired from Willow Run last fall after a district investigation concluded that Benit had a conflict of interest with two companies that did business with the district and that he may have benefited from the connection. There have been no charges stemming from the Willow Run investigation, although Justice Department officials said the probe is continuing.

The federal indictment includes charges of fraud against the Ecorse Public School district and a federal program called E-Rate, which was intended to help school districts gain better Internet access. Benit was subpoenaed to testify before Congress concerning the E-Rate investigation in 2004. He appeared but declined to testify, citing the protections of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution.

The indictments against the Benits are part of an ongoing antitrust investigation into the E-Rate program by the Justice Department that has resulted in charges against 13 people and 12 companies across the country. Six of the companies and three people have either pleaded guilty or have entered into civil settlements with the defendants agreeing to pay fines and restitution of more than $40 million. Two of the defendants have been sentenced to six years in prison, according to a statement from the Justice Department.

Other charges against the Benits include using fraudulent documents to obtain a line of credit and a mortgage to purchase the couple's Superior Township home and also laundering money. There are nine charges against Benit, with some of the same charges levied against Mary Ann Elam Benit. Charges were also filed against Coral Technology Inc. and School Management Services Inc., both companies that Benit helped form and of which he was an officer.

The indictment also indicates that Benit had three aliases that he used to disguise the fraudulent activities. The indictment states that the government will proceed with forfeiture proceedings for the Benits' assets, including their home, which in January was listed for sale for $1.5 million.

The indictment alleges that the Benits attempted to obtain contracts for projects at the Ecorse school district for about $7.27 million. Many of the contracts were directly with Coral Technology and some were with companies that used Coral as a subcontractor. Some of the contracts were refused by the E-Rate program, but the indictment states that Ecorse paid Coral at least $4.3 million.

Benit at various times between 1999 and 2003 identified himself as an officer, employee or chief executive officer of Coral Technology, the indictment states. Benit was employed in Ecorse from 1997-2003. Mary Ann Elam Benit, who married Benit in 2005, worked for Coral, according to the indictment. Elam Benit, Benit and others falsified documents to obtain payment from the Ecorse district, the indictment states.

The indictment alleges that Benit used the aliases J.D. Howen, D.J. Howen and Jack Howen to conceal his relationship to Coral. While working for Ecorse schools, Benit used the name J.D. Howen to bid on a project for Coral with another school district. An Ann Arbor News investigation found that Howen was listed as an officer for Coral, along with Benit, on a 1999 Ohio tax record.

The indictment also alleges that Benit paid a former Coral employee in exchange for the employee not reporting Benit's dual roles at Ecorse and Coral.

Penalties for the charges range from five to 30 years in prison. Statutory fines for the charges range from $250,000 to $1 million, and the fine can be increased to twice what either the victim lost or the perpetrator gained from the fraud.

Willow Run Community Schools Superintendent Ron Ciranna, who helped investigate Benit's actions in the district, said people in Willow Run generally trusted Benit but there were signs that made some uneasy. Benit worked for the district from June 2003 to June 2005.

Benit was out of the district often and "was always evasive of where he was or how to get a hold of him," Ciranna said. Ciranna said he hopes the investigation will uncover more information on Benit's actions in Willow Run and possibly result in restitution. The district paid about $260,000 to the two companies that Benit was connected with.

Rhonda McGill, president of the Kettering Elementary PTO, said she was saddened by the indictment.

"What a really unfortunate thing. (The parents) tried to support him and stick by him because he had done such good things for the school," she said.

McGill said Benit helped increase enrollment and improved communication. But McGill said she was glad the district investigated the issue and took action.

Ex-school Leader Accused Of Fraud (FREEP)

By Lori Higgins, Free Press Education Writer

Detroit Free Press, May 26, 2006

Ecorse district, U.S. government lost money

A former assistant superintendent for Ecorse Public Schools has been indicted, along with his wife, on federal charges for their alleged roles in steering almost $7.3 million from the district and a federal program to a company they had ties to.

Douglas A. Benit and Mary Ann Elam Benit of Superior Township, who were indicted Tuesday and arrested Wednesday, have been released from federal custody on $10,000 unsecured bonds.

Douglas Benit faces charges of federal program fraud, mail fraud, bank fraud and money laundering. Mary Ann Elam Benit is charged with bank fraud and money laundering.

Both will be arraigned Wednesday. If they're convicted, penalties could go as high as 30 years in prison and a $1-million fine.

The Benits could not be reached for comment Wednesday. A message was left late Wednesday for the attorney who represents them.

The U.S. Department of Justice says Benit used his position in the district, which he left in 2003, to steer contracts -- sometimes at inflated prices -- to Coral Technology Inc., an Ohio company he controlled. It allegedly occurred from March 1998 to October 2003.

The money came from the federal E-Rate program, which provides funding for Internet access and other telecommunications services to poor schools and libraries. The indictments bring to 13 the number of individuals charged as part of the Justice Department's ongoing investigation into fraud in the E-Rate program. Twelve companies have been charged.

The department "will continue to vigorously pursue those who cheat the competitive process and who violate the public's trust ... by stealing from federal programs and taking advantage of lending institutions," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said in a news release.

School officials in Ecorse had little to say Wednesday.

"At this time, I have no comment. Our attorney will be issuing a statement," said Ecorse Superintendent Emma Epps. That attorney, Floyd Allen of Detroit, could not be reached Wednesday.

Carol Salisbury, a Board of Education member, hung up on a reporter Wednesday, saying "I have no comment on this. Sorry."

Also silent was board Vice President Virginia Martinez, who said she couldn't comment because she didn't know anything about it. "I didn't even know he was married," she said.

According to Justice Department officials, the school district is assisting in the investigation, which is ongoing.

Benit resigned from the Ecorse district in 2003 and took a job as superintendent of the Willow Run Community Schools in Ypsilanti. The Willow Run Board of Education fired him at a Nov. 14 meeting and authorized school district attorneys to pursue a lawsuit against him, according to minutes of the meeting on the district's Web site.

It was unclear Wednesday what precipitated Benit's firing from Willow Run.

Among the allegations detailed in the indictment:

· The Benits, along with Coral and another company they controlled, School Management Services, conspired to launder fraudulently obtained money to purchase and make improvements to their Superior Township home.

· Douglas Benit schemed to defraud a lending company to obtain a $893,750 mortgage.

· He and his wife schemed to defraud a bank, causing the bank to issue Douglas Benit a $200,000 line of credit.

· He and his wife used aliases to conceal their involvement with the companies that received contracts from the Ecorse district.

UPDATE: House Judiciary Panel Votes To Ban Content Fees (DOW)

By Siobhan Hughes, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The House Judiciary Committee on Thursday voted to ban the nation's phone and cable companies from charging extra fees to companies such as Amazon.com Inc. (AMZN) (AMZN) and Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) for speedier delivery of their content.

By 20-13 the panel approved legislation being pushed by more than 100 consumer groups and businesses. The vote was, at least on the surface, a blow to Verizon Communications (VZ) (VZ) and AT&T Inc. (T) (T), which have said that new regulations may undercut their ability to invest in high-capacity networks.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., is speeding ahead with the bill to assert court jurisdiction over a matter that some would prefer left to regulators. In so doing, he is also seeking to counter efforts by phone companies to keep open the option of building business plans organized around additional fees.

"While the technological dynamics of the marketplace have changed over time, the threat of dominant firms abusing their market power to restrain competition has not," Sensenbrenner said.

One strategy he could employ is to attach his measure to a broader telecommunications bill that may reach the House floor as soon as next month. That broader bill, developed by House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, is favored by phone companies as it would make it easier for them to roll out cable television service.

However, it is unclear whether Sensenbrenner's measure would be considered germane to the broader telecommunications legislation. That, combined with a sense of reluctance from even those who voted with Sensenbrenner, underscores the obstacles facing the latest efforts to ensure that Internet sites may be downloaded without regard to whether the Web site has made payments beyond those they already make to access the network.

"I think the bill is a blunt instrument," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., who nonetheless voted for the bill, saying he wanted to ensure that telecommunications issues stayed within the purview of the Justice Department and antitrust laws.

The Federal Communications Commission last August weighed in on the so-called "net neutrality" debate, issuing a policy statement saying that consumers should be able to access lawful content, run any application they choose, connect their own lawful devices and have the benefit of competition.

However, the FCC didn't adopt official rules. As a result, the policy isn't enforceable.

Google Reaches Agreement To Have Its Software Installed On New Dell Computers (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, May 25 — Google and Dell have reached an agreement to install Google software on millions of new Dell computers over the next few years, Google's chief executive said on Thursday.

The executive, Eric E. Schmidt, said the arrangement meant that Google's search toolbar would appear on the screens of new Dell systems, and that Dell users would be directed to a Web page branded by the two companies.

Mr. Schmidt, speaking at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference in Las Vegas, said the companies would share revenue from the deal.

While financial terms were not disclosed, many analysts assumed that Google would pay Dell a fee for the arrangement. If that is the case, said Safa Rashtchy, an analyst with Piper Jaffray, this will be the beginning of a era in which Google pays for alliances in order to maintain its growth rate.

Spokesmen for both companies declined to comment.

Mr. Schmidt said that this would be first of several agreements with Dell. The time period of the deal was not disclosed.

The software, Dell said, would be put only on machines sold to consumers and to small and medium-size businesses. While the consumer market accounted for roughly 14 percent of Dell's revenue last quarter, the deal would nonetheless involve millions of new computers over time.

Google could receive a significant boost in its intense competition with Microsoft for search advertising revenue. By ensuring prime real estate on Dell computers, Google will gain exposure to millions of consumers who might otherwise have used Microsoft's search technology.

The agreement comes only two weeks after the Justice Department found that the design of Microsoft's new Web browser did not pose a threat to competition in the Internet search market. Google had expressed concern to antitrust officials that Microsoft's browser routinely steered users to its search service, MSN, giving it an unfair advantage.

"This is very important for Google, particularly if you look at how Microsoft is going to be pushing its search technology by embedding it in Internet Explorer," Mr. Rashtchy said. "Most people are going to stay with the default search technology that comes with their machine."

Google announced the deal at the close of regular trading. Shares of Google rose $1.74, to $382.99, and were roughly unchanged in after-hours trading. Dell shares increased 12 cents, to $24.30, then rose another 8 cents in after-hours trading.

The prospect of additional revenue from the deal would be a welcome lift for Dell, which has been struggling to hold onto its market share and maintain the heady growth rates it once enjoyed. Dell's profit declined 18 percent in the first quarter, though revenue grew 6 percent, mainly from growth overseas.

"It's a slight positive for Dell," said Cindy Shaw, vice president for research at Moors & Cabot. "But it will not solve Dell's larger issues. It's not going to be what gets people to buy a Dell."

Dell To Sell PCs Installed With Google's Software (SEATIMES/BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo And Jonathan Thaw, Bloomberg News

The Seattle Times, May 26, 2006

Dell, the world's biggest maker of personal computers, will sell PCs installed with Google software, dealing a setback to Microsoft's longtime control of the desktop.

Under the three-year agreement, Dell will offer machines with Google programs for searching hard drives and e-mail as well as its Web browser tool bar, Google Chief Executive Officer Eric Schmidt said at a conference in Las Vegas that was sponsored by Goldman Sachs.

The accord is a victory for Google, the world's most-used search engine, putting its software before 100 million new PC owners over the life of the deal. Until now, Microsoft's Internet browser and services have been the default settings on Dell PCs and the agreement may derail Microsoft's attempts to draw users to its search services with its new Windows operating system.

"The gloves have come off," said Jordan Rohan, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets in New York. He rates Google "outperform" and said he doesn't own it. "This is a bare-knuckles distribution move for Google."

Google's software will be installed on Dell's PCs by the end of this month, Dell spokesman Jess Blackburn said. He declined to comment on financial terms of the deal.

The transaction came hours after Yahoo, the No. 2 search engine, and eBay, the largest online auctioneer, said they formed an alliance to combat Google's grip on the Internet.

Schmidt said he won't outline terms of the deals. The companies will share revenue, he said. "The real reason to do this is the end-user benefit," Schmidt said. Google's software is designed to make computers easier to use, he said.

Google will probably pay Dell a fee of about $5 to $10 for each PC, Rohan said. That would hand Dell a new revenue stream as it grapples with a slide in sales and profit growth. Dell Chief Executive Officer Kevin Rollins is struggling to reignite sales after Dell last week reported first-quarter earnings that missed a February forecast. Price cuts crimped profit and failed to spur orders as anticipated.

"For a long time, PC makers have wanted to sell real estate on their systems because it's prime real estate," said Roger Kay, an analyst with Endpoint Technologies Associates in Wayland, Massachusetts. "If they get a few bucks per copy, that could add up to a lot of money."

Hewlett-Packard declined to comment on whether the company is considering a deal with Google, according to spokesman Ryan Donovan. Hewlett-Packard is the world's No. 2 PC maker.

Google will be able to recoup the money quickly through revenue from search-linked ads, RBC's Rohan said. A payment by Google of $5 for each PC would be made back in about 12 clicks by users on a Google ad, Rohan said. Google gets between a few cents to tens of dollars each time a user clicks on its ads.

Dell sold 37.7 million PCs in calendar 2005, according to market researcher IDC. The company sold 9.64 million PCs in the calendar first quarter, down from 10.5 million in the fourth quarter, IDC said.

The deal curbs Microsoft's ability to close the gap with Google. Microsoft is putting search in the new Vista version of Windows, scheduled to hit stores in January, in an effort to encourage more customers to use it.

While Microsoft dominates desktop software, Google has four times more users for its Internet search and Google leads in advertising revenue. Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer escalated spending on the company's MSN Internet unit to challenge Google and reclaim share of Internet search.

Microsoft handled just 11 percent of U.S. searches in March, compared with Google's 49 percent, Nielsen//NetRatings data show.

In the new Windows, Microsoft has placed search panes on the start menu, the Internet browser, as well as the program that helps users organize files and folders. The new version of Office also has search integrated into its programs.

Google's ability to buy a place on Dell desktops was made possible by a settlement between Microsoft and U.S. government regulators. Microsoft, in its settlement after the U.S. antitrust case, agreed to allow PC makers to promote and highlight rival software on their machines.

The company was found to have violated antitrust law by restricting computer makers from changing the way Windows was displayed when users turned on their machines in a bid to shut out rival Netscape Communications Corp.'s browser.

Google complained to the European Commission about Microsoft's new browser, which directs Web surfers to Microsoft's MSN and other search sites.

"The Dell deal and similar deals like it are the Vista vaccine," Rohan said. "They help to prevent against a loss of share between a tight integration between Vista and MSN search."

Yahoo, EBay Team In Battle With Google (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, May 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES — In a bid to challenge Google's growing domination of the Internet, auctioneer eBay joined forces with Google rival Yahoo on Thursday. The alliance brings text-based advertising to eBay from Yahoo and eBay's PayPal payment program to Yahoo.

“This is a real boost for Yahoo at a time when they really needed it,” says Allen Weiner, an analyst at researcher Gartner. “Yahoo is in a battle to the death with Google and Microsoft, and getting eBay's base into the Yahoo network will make people look at Yahoo's ad platform as a real plus.”

Weiner says PayPal represents 20% of eBay's revenue. Expanding PayPal to the Yahoo network “is an interesting way for Yahoo to offer digital content for sale, like movies and TV shows, and offer its customers a really easy way to pay for it.”

Yahoo is the most visited website, with more than 100 million monthly visitors. But it has been losing market share in online searches to Google, which dominates the hot search advertising business — those little text ads that appear near search results. According to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix, Google's search share rose 6.6% in April over the same time a year ago, while Yahoo's fell 2.7%.

EBay, the Internet's fifth-most-visited site, according to ComScore, is also the Internet's largest purchaser of search ads, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. “It was inevitable that Yahoo and eBay would do this deal, because eBay needed to counterbalance its dependence on Google for traffic,” he says.

John Donahoe, president of eBay's marketplace division, says eBay supports its network of sellers by advertising their wares elsewhere on the Web with a heavy use of search-based “keyword” advertising. In the past year, eBay's purchases of keywords for use in search queries has gone from 1 million to 15 million keywords, he says.

Google late last year introduced a classified-ad service, Google Base, where individuals can buy and sell goods. Google has consistently denied that it was going after eBay's business.

Yahoo and eBay executives insisted Thursday that competitive pressures with Google had nothing to do with their deal. “We're not focused on what others do but what we think is best for our community,” said Yahoo Chief Operating Officer Dan Rosensweig.

Yahoo until recently provided search advertising for Microsoft's MSN. This year, Microsoft introduced its own ad platform.

Donahoe says no money is changing hands in the deal with eBay. Instead, both companies will share revenue, splitting proceeds from advertising and PayPal fees.

Martin Pyykkonen, an analyst at securities firm Hoefer & Arnett, says he doesn't expect the deal to generate a lot of cash immediately for either company.

The alliance is more “tactical,” he says. “Yahoo and eBay have a common enemy, Google, and they're both protecting themselves.”

New Tech Alliances Signal More Scrambling Ahead (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney, Mylene Mangalindan And Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The land rush over the Internet entered a new phase yesterday as four tech titans -- Yahoo Inc., eBay Inc., Google Inc. and Dell Inc. -- announced alliances that signal more jockeying ahead over access to online consumers and the advertising they view on the Web. The high-profile deals also raise fresh questions about Microsoft Corp.'s efforts to keep step in the race.

Yahoo and eBay unveiled a broad partnership under which eBay will display ads brokered by Yahoo on its U.S. online auction site and marketplace. Yahoo will promote eBay's PayPal electronic-payment system as a way for consumers to pay for Yahoo services.

Separately, Google and Dell confirmed an agreement to install Google software on Dell PCs before they are shipped to users. The deal, which Dell says could include as many as 20 million computers a year, will get Google's search services and ads in front of more users.

The agreements are the result of behind-the-scenes efforts by tech companies big and small to form alliances that strengthen their efforts to own a bigger piece of the Web landscape. At stake are huge future profits from Internet users and advertisers, whose buying and spending habits are still in flux.

EBay's decision to tie up with Yahoo appeared to be a tacit acknowledgement that it didn't feel comfortable more closely aligning itself with long-time partner Google, which has begun efforts over the past year that some believe compete with eBay in areas such as payment services and listings. Meanwhile, Google's Dell pact was driven partly by Google's desire to keep a leg up on Microsoft, say people familiar with the matter.

The deals come amid growing ambitions of the Internet companies that increasingly have them encroaching on one another's turf. Rivalries are building as Internet penetration in the U.S. has reached a mature, slower-growth phase. That augurs more battles over attracting and retaining current Internet users, who are increasing the time they spend online. At the same time, relationships among many Internet companies exist already, complicating rivalries and prospective alliances.

More scuffles for new alliances appear to already be underway. Google and Microsoft, for example, are competing to provide search technology and related advertising to News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media division, which includes the popular MySpace social networking site, according to people familiar with the matter. A Fox Interactive spokeswoman declined to comment. EBay itself could be a further object of heated courting by rivals. The Yahoo-eBay ad agreement is exclusive to the U.S., leaving open the possibility of eBay doing an ad deal with Google or Microsoft in Europe and Asia.

Yahoo's announcement with eBay caps years of partnership and discussions between the companies, including a near-merger that fell apart in 2000. In recent months, mounting concern about a competitive threat from Google has led eBay to intensify discussions with Yahoo and Microsoft, say people familiar with the matter. Under the agreement announced yesterday, visitors to the U.S. eBay site will see graphical ads with images brokered by Yahoo. They will also view text ads from Yahoo linked to phrases they enter when they search for specific goods.

Analysts say the linkup should increase the companies' revenue and provide a critical boost to Yahoo's search-related ad business, which is going through a major overhaul. The chief executives of eBay and Yahoo say the agreement, which centers around sharing revenue from ads and electronic payments, will have no material impact on their revenue in 2006.

EBay is grappling with slowing growth of its U.S. auction marketplace, and the deal is a bet that Yahoo -- more than Google or Microsoft -- can help increase revenue from existing Web users and drive new users to eBay. EBay Chief Executive Meg Whitman, in an interview, said she chose to ally with Yahoo because "there is no one who can help us with graphical as well as text search ads the way Yahoo can." Google's graphical-ad offerings are relatively fledgling.

Ms. Whitman declined to comment specifically on eBay's talks with Google and Microsoft or on concerns about Google's encroachment. Google CEO Eric Schmidt told investors at a Goldman Sachs Internet conference yesterday that the Yahoo agreement was "a very good deal for eBay," and that Google's "relationship with eBay will only get closer in the next year or two as we both do very well."

Yahoo's partnership will give it access to eBay's tens of millions of users as well as to valuable data about consumers' searches on eBay. Users perform about 345 million searches daily on eBay's sites, rivaling total searches on the top Web-search sites. That information could help Yahoo refine its search technology to offer better ad-targeting capabilities.

One complication for eBay: it must make sure that Yahoo-provided ads don't pull away too many buyers from eBay's own auction listings. Under the agreement, which will begin with a testing phase over the next several months, Yahoo will provide search-related ads for "complementary products," the companies said. The companies also said they will explore developing "click to call" advertising linked to eBay's Skype and Yahoo Messenger Internet phone technology, which would allow consumers to directly call advertisers.

Google, under the roughly three-year pact announced yesterday, will pay Dell an unspecified amount to have its Web-browser-search toolbar and desktop-search software -- which consumers can use to search the content of their hard drives and emails -- installed on PCs. Dell shipped over 37 million PCs and servers globally in 2005, according to research group IDC.

Dell will also set its PCs so they "default" to Google's search engine, automatically providing it in certain instances when consumers search using Microsoft's Web browser.

The agreement should help mitigate some of Google's concerns about Microsoft's new Web browser, to be released this year. Google has complained that Microsoft is making it too difficult for users to change the default setting away from Microsoft's search engine. The Justice Department earlier this month said that Google's concerns were unfounded.

By expanding its placement on PCs, Google will instantly gain a spot in front of millions of consumers, who industry analysts say are far more likely to use software and access Internet services if they are pre-loaded on PCs. For Dell, the agreement is an opportunity to boost revenue from software shipped on new computers.

The new alliances pose serious questions for Microsoft, which in recent years has dramatically increased its focus on the Internet and online advertising -- with mixed results. People familiar with the matter say the Redmond, Wash., company had at some stages been in the running for both the eBay and Dell agreements announced yesterday. Google late last year snatched away from Microsoft an agreement that included providing search advertising on AOL's sites.

The eBay deal doesn't preclude Microsoft from creating closer ties with Yahoo or eBay itself. All three see Google as a common threat and have spent the past year exploring a variety of ways to work together, say people familiar with the matter. A big concern among the three companies, though, was avoiding any appearance of teaming up against Google, especially given Microsoft's past antitrust problems in the U.S. and Europe, these people say.

The Yahoo-eBay deal could pull Microsoft's top management deeper into the problem of how to compete with Google and better capitalize on the growth of online advertising. Microsoft is now picking around the edges for partners that can direct traffic to its services and display Internet ads it brokers. Potential partners could include MySpace and FaceBook, a site used by millions of college students. Microsoft could also tighten an existing link with Amazon.com. "Clearly there are going to be a lot of partnerships and alliances in this area," says Vivek Varma, a Microsoft spokesman.

The Dell-Google alliance potentially cuts into Microsoft's most coveted and important partnership with a computer maker. By increasing the amount of its software in Dell PCs, Google squeezes onto a stage where Microsoft has long been the lead player. As the world's largest PC maker by number of machines, Dell has been arguably Microsoft's most important distribution channel for its most important software, the Windows operating system and Office business applications. Those two products are Microsoft's largest source of profit and revenue.

Microsoft says it sees the Google and Dell deal as an expansion of options for PC users. "Customers are going to have choice," Mr. Varma says, when asked if the deal threatens Microsoft's position in PC software.

Yahoo And EBay Join To Fight The Giants (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

EBay Inc. and Yahoo Inc. forged an alliance yesterday aimed at capturing more online sales and advertising dollars, while giving both greater leverage against their primary rivals, Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp.

The partnership spans some of the most critical areas of both companies' businesses, adding eBay's Paypal online payment system throughout Yahoo's operations and giving Yahoo an exclusive deal to sell display ads for eBay.com.

That two of the Internet's top brands decided to cooperate so closely highlights how powerful Google is becoming as it roves across the online business world, competing with eBay in online classifieds and payment systems and with Yahoo in search and content. It also leaves Microsoft in increasing need of a partner of its own, as its online service trails the others in search and advertising.

"This deal is partially offensive, partially defensive for eBay and Yahoo," because it allows the companies to share technologies and combine resources, said Philip Remek, an analyst for Guzman & Co.

Yahoo is the most visited site on the Internet, and eBay is the world's largest auctioneer. Consumers will start to see experimental versions of joint offerings in coming months. Yahoo users will more easily be able to make calls off the Internet by "clicking-to-call" local merchants, for example, using eBay's Internet-phone company Skype. EBay users will have greater access to Yahoo's news and entertainment content through a toolbar championed by both brands.

"I think it plays to the complementary strengths of both companies," said eBay president and chief executive Meg Whitman, speaking at a Goldman Sachs investor conference yesterday.

Speaking at its annual shareholder meeting, Terry Semel, chairman and chief executive of Yahoo, said the deal is a "terrific strategic partnership for our company."

One area not covered by the arrangement: instant messaging. Yahoo's service will not be compatible with eBay's Skype instant messaging; Yahoo already has such an agreement with Microsoft's MSN.

Such overlapping deals show how Internet companies are jockeying for Web surfers' time and interest, which translates into more opportunities to sell advertising.

Microsoft appears to be planning to chart its own course in competing for an advertising network, and for building its online audience. Earlier this year, Microsoft lost out to Google in negotiations to forge a deal with Dulles-based AOL LLC. Google invested $1 billion in AOL and deepened its search and content-sharing arrangement.

Separately, Google yesterday announced a partnership deal with Dell Computer Corp. to install Google's software on its computers, an arrangement that threatens to diminish Microsoft's presence on the consumer desktop.

"Microsoft has been jilted twice this year, by AOL and eBay," said David Card, an analyst with Jupiter Research. Through MSN, Microsoft still has a large community of users for its Web-based services, but it is trying to improve in areas of both search and advertising sales, he said. "They are trying to go it alone."

Advertisers are also spending more to run ads alongside search results, or pictorial ads that run on Web pages, as viewers spend more time online and less time with traditional media sources. Google, the search engine with the most traffic, dominates the search-based advertising market, while Yahoo has the largest advertising network for pictorial ads, and is also trying to catch up to Google on search-related ads.

"It's a bigger win for Yahoo, in many ways, to win against Google," said Charlene Li, an analyst with Forrester Research. EBay, meanwhile, pays both Google and Yahoo to sponsor links next to those companies' search results, but it has been cautious about selling ads on its own site. By employing Yahoo to provide such ads, it could boost its relatively meager share of the online ad market, she said.

EBay also might tap more locally based advertisers by integrating Skype throughout Yahoo's network, Li said.

For now, the companies' collaboration will happen exclusively in the United States, but if it succeeds, it might extend into other parts of the globe, Whitman said.

Shares of eBay closed up $3.68 yesterday, at $33.88 a share. Shares of Yahoo closed up $1.13 a share at $32.92.

Yahoo Makes Deal On Ads With EBay (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

EBay and Yahoo, two top Internet companies that have been losing ground to Google, said yesterday that they would work together in several areas, including advertising and online payments.

The deal will expand Yahoo's share of Internet advertising, a market where it lost leadership to Google. Investors have been worried that eBay's highly profitable shopping site is being undercut as consumers increasingly find products through search engines or through free listing services like Craigslist. Google and Yahoo have introduced similar free services.

At the same time, eBay is spending $260 million a year to advertise its auctions on search engines, with 60 percent of that on Google, according to estimates by Jordan Rohan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets.

The deal announced yesterday gives eBay some new ways to make money from its large audience, but it does not directly address the concerns about competition. Yahoo will continue to offer its auctions and other online shopping services that compete directly with eBay.

For Yahoo, however, the deal represents a potentially significant expansion of its advertising business. EBay agreed to place on its site text advertisements sold by Yahoo. That gives Yahoo a major new partner just as the MSN service of Microsoft, which was the largest outlet for Yahoo's text ads, has switched to selling its own advertising.

Small text ads that automatically appear next to related material on Web pages have proved hugely profitable, but eBay has long been wary of placing them on its site because they are likely to refer people to sites that compete with its marketplace.

"EBay is selling a little bit of its soul by doing this deal," Mr. Rohan said. "The idea of eBay as a destination site is marginalized by a deal that drives traffic outside of eBay."

Margaret C. Whitman, eBay's chief executive, said the company was starting to change its policy because "we have to embrace some of the things that are happening on the Web." Still, she said, the company will test the impact of the text ads to make sure they do not hurt revenue.

Ms. Whitman added that the text ads would be restricted so they did not offer products that competed directly with eBay's sellers. They will be for "complementary products" like cases for digital cameras, she said, and they will also appear when a user searches for a product that is not available on eBay.

EBay also agreed to have Yahoo sell graphical display advertising on its site, the first time Yahoo has sold graphic ads for another company.

"EBay brings the best of quality inventory and a huge community," said Terry S. Semel, Yahoo's chief executive. "It gives us the opportunity to do a big job."

Yahoo and eBay said the revenue from the deal would be small this year, and they declined to characterize its financial impact for next year. Mr. Rohan said that if eBay placed text ads on 25 percent of its pages, the revenue could be about $130 million a year, and about 80 percent of that would go to eBay.

Mr. Rohan said the deal might help establish Yahoo as an advertising network that is an alternative to Google. "Yahoo was clearly able to play the fear-of-Google card," he said.

Microsoft, too, has been trying to establish its own advertising network and is reported to have bid for eBay's business.

Google, which is by far the leader in selling text ads for other Web sites, has been moving to sell graphic ads as well, and said this week that it would start selling video advertisements for other sites.

Google's approach is to create an automated auction in which marketers enter their own advertisements and bid for placement. Yahoo, which uses such an auction for text ads, will sell graphic ads on eBay through its traditional sales force, which negotiates rates with major marketers.

EBay will also offer its customers a new version of its browser toolbar that will encourage people to use Yahoo search and other services. Yahoo agreed to offer eBay's PayPal payment service as an option for customers buying goods and services through Yahoo's site.

The companies said they would explore developing features that would let people click on ads on either of their sites and be connected with the advertiser through either eBay's Skype voice chat service or the voice calling feature of Yahoo Messenger.

EBay's shares rose to $33.88, up $3.68. Yahoo rose $1.13 to $32.92

Ms. Whitman said the deal did not mean eBay would cut back its huge spending on Google advertisements. Search and other advertising brings in about 40 percent of eBay's traffic.

She said she did not see the competition from search engines and free classified sites as undercutting eBay's position with consumers.

"There is a lot more to running a marketplace than getting a lot of listings," she said. "There is trust and safety, and payments and reputation. That stands eBay in good stead."

GAO Report Faults Voluntary Programs To Cut Air Pollution (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Bush administration's voluntary programs to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by industry have yet to deliver promised results, according to a report issued yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

The 51-page report, which was requested by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), highlights shortcomings in two projects aimed at encouraging the private sector to cut emissions linked to global warming. The Environmental Protection Agency sponsors "Climate Leaders," while the Energy Department oversees "Climate VISION."

Both encourage polluters to cut their greenhouse-gas releases, but in each case, according to the study, the administration has failed to ensure that participating firms set firm reduction targets or meet their stated goals.

"EPA and DOE each expect participants in their voluntary emissions reduction programs to complete a number of actions; however, participants' progress toward completing those actions, as well as the agencies' efforts to track accomplishments, has varied," the report said.

The United States, unlike most developed countries, has repeatedly resisted mandatory curbs on carbon dioxide and other gases linked to climate change, instead relying on voluntary programs.

This week, Bush's senior environmental adviser, James L. Connaughton, told an audience at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, that the country does not have to regulate such pollutants because it is on track to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 18 percent relative to the gross domestic product by 2012.

"Why do you need a mandate to deliver an outcome you're already going to get?" he asked.

The GAO report, however, indicated that many firms in the voluntary reduction programs have not established specific targets. As of November 2005, only 38 of the 74 firms in the EPA program had set reduction goals, according to the report. In the Energy Department program, 11 of the 15 participating trade groups have established targets, and five have reported on their emissions. The DOE has no deadline for emissions reporting.

"This report makes clear that letting the fox guard the henhouse is not working," Kerry said in a statement. "It's unbelievable enough that President Bush refuses to accept the very clear scientific evidence on greenhouse gas emissions, but now he can't even get his own non-action plan right."

EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood responded in a statement that, to date, half of the 87 organizations that joined its Climate Leaders program have completed inventories of their emissions "and have set aggressive public reduction commitments." The agency "continuously tracks the progress" of the participants, she said.

DOE spokeswoman Megan Barnett said the department is taking steps to better track cuts in emissions under its program.

House Votes For Oil Drilling In Alaska (USAT)

USA Today, May 26, 2006

The House of Representatives voted Thursday to allow oil exploration on a small portion of Alaska's 19 million-acre Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The vote was 225-201 to allow drilling on 1.5 million acres that federal geologists estimate hold 5.4 billion to 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

Supporters cited gasoline prices and U.S. reliance on foreign oil. Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., said an additional 1 million barrels a day would reduce the need for imports. About 60% of the U.S. daily consumption of 21 million barrels of oil comes from abroad.

Rep. Lois Capps, D-Calif., and other opponents prefer conservation and alternative energy sources and cite concerns over the welfare of wildlife in the refuge.

In the Senate, drilling backers have been unable to get the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

Congress approved drilling in the refuge in 1994, but President Clinton vetoed the bill.

The mine safety bill that passed the Senate this week hit a snag in the House. Rep. George Miller of California, the top Democrat on the House committee that oversees labor issues, blocked the bill from being considered under an expedited process. Miller said he wants it amended. Among the changes he wants is a requirement that miners have air supplies that last two days rather than two hours. Miller released a statement of support for his changes from a lawyer for relatives of three of the 12 miners killed in the Sago Mine accident in January in West Virginia.

The bill won't be considered until after lawmakers return from their holiday break June 6. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., said Miller's objection was “a huge disappointment for miners who are relying on us to help protect them.”

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he is not optimistic the world body will adopt U.S.-led proposals to impose more fiscal discipline and other changes by June 30, when the interim U.N. budget runs out of money. Bolton cited the “culture of inaction” at the United Nations.

The United States and its allies, who pay 87% of the budget, want more efficiency, transparency and accountability. But some developing countries say Secretary-General Kofi Annan would have too much power.

“We're not going to continue to throw away money at an organization that has no credibility,” said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., cautioned against precipitous action because the United Nations supports many U.S. interests.

President Bush will meet with Rwandan President Paul Kagame at the White House on Tuesday to discuss AIDS and economic issues affecting east Africa.

Rwanda is part of the U.S. emergency plan for AIDS relief, economic development, trade and investment under the African Growth and Opportunity Act.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said first lady Laura Bush will represent the United States at a major United Nations AIDS conference next week in New York City. The conference will chart progress made over the past five years in combating AIDS and HIV.

House OKs Oil Drilling In Alaska Refuge (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, May 25, 2006

Citing the public outcry over $3-a-gallon gasoline and America's heavy reliance on foreign oil, the House on Thursday voted to open an Alaska wildlife refuge to oil drilling, knowing the prospects for Senate approval were slim.

Drilling proponents argued that the refuge on Alaska's North Slope would provide 1 million barrels a day of additional domestic oil at peak production and reduce the need for imports.

But opponents to developing what environmentalists argue is a pristine area where drilling will harm caribou, polar bears and migratory birds, said Congress should pursue conservation and alternative energy sources that would save more oil than would be tapped from the refuge.

The House voted 225-201 to direct the Interior Department to open oil leases on the coastal strip of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge — an area of 1.5 million acres that is thought likely to hold about 11 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

But the action may be little more than symbolic. Arctic refuge development, while approved by the House five times, repeatedly has been blocked in the Senate where drilling proponents have been unable to muster the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

"We need to develop energy, here at home. ... We can't say no to everything," declared Rep. Richard Pombo (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., who pressed for a House vote on opening the refuge that lies east of the declining Prudhoe Bay oil fields 200 miles north of the Arctic Circle.

Access to ANWR's oil has been a key part of President Bush's energy agenda, although over the last five years he's been unable to convince Congress of its merits. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday urged the Senate to pass a drilling measure "so we can strengthen our nation's energy security."

The refuge was set aside for protection in 1960 and expanded by Congress to 19 million acres in 1980 with a stipulation that its oil — limited to the coastal strip — could be developed, but only if Congress allows it.

The federal government would share revenues equally with the state.

While oil companies have long eyed the area where federal geologists estimate anywhere from 5.4 billion to as much as 16 billion barrels of oil may be recoverable, environmentalists consider one of its top priorities for protection.

"There are simply some places that should be off limits to drilling. The Arctic refuge should be one of them," said Rep. Lois Capps (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif.

The coastal strip is a calving area for caribou, home to polar bears and musk oxen, and a seasonal destination for millions of migratory birds.

Drilling opponents cited an Energy Department analysis that ANWR's oil would have little impact on gasoline prices and reduce imports by only a few percentage points. Currently 60 percent of the 21 million barrels of oil used daily in the United States comes from imports.

Advocates for opening the refuge to energy development said the tundra and its wildlife can be protected using modern drilling techniques and environmental restrictions. They argued the additional domestic oil would help move the country toward more energy independence.

Congress approved drilling in the refuge in 1995, but President Clinton vetoed the bill.

Had Clinton not issued his veto "we would have had a million barrels of oil today," said Rep. Don Young (news, bio, voting record), R-Alaska. "We should be drilling off shore, we should be drilling in the Rockies and most of all we should be drilling in the Arctic refuge."

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (news, bio, voting record), R-N.Y., countered that had Congress passed improved auto fuel economy measures 11 years ago when they were considered, today "we would save far more oil than ANWR would produce."

"This Congress hasn't voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon," said Boehlert.

"Rather than debating how we could increase the fuel efficiency standards (of cars) over the next few years, we are debating about a bill that won't produce the first barrel of oil for 10 years and it will come from a pristine wildlife refuge," complained Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., a leading drilling opponent.

The vote fell heavily along party lines. Twenty-seven Democrats joined the Republican majority in support of the legislation. Only 30 Republicans opposed the measure.

House Votes To Allow Drilling In Arctic Refuge (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The House voted 225 to 201 yesterday to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling, with proponents arguing that new domestic production will ease the nation's energy crunch.

The measure marks the 12th time since 1995 that the House has voted in favor of opening the refuge to oil and gas development. But it has little concrete impact because its backers have not obtained the 60 Senate votes needed to surmount a filibuster.

"Once again, the House has voted to put Americans to work producing more of our own energy," said House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), author of the bill to allow drilling on the land, which is home to caribou and other migrating species. "And, once again, liberals defied the common-sense principle of supply and demand by voting no. That's a great way to keep prices on the rise."

Twenty-seven Democrats voted for Pombo's bill, which proponents say would add 10.4 billion barrels to the nation's oil reserves, and 30 Republicans voted against it.

DOJ_NMG_0029984

House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.), a key opponent, said that if the nation had adopted stricter fuel economy standards for vehicles when they were first proposed 11 years ago, they would have saved more oil than could be produced in the Arctic refuge. Mileage standards have remained the same for 30 years.

Rep. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), also a Resources Committee member, called "The American-Made Energy and Good Jobs Act" a shortsighted approach to address rising gasoline prices.

"This shows once again how bankrupt the majority is in finding new ideas to solve our energy crisis. Drilling in ANWR seems to be their solution for everything, when what we really need is a bold and comprehensive national energy policy for the 21st century."

Environmentalists, who argue that drilling will harm wildlife on Alaska's North Slope, said they are confident that moderate Republicans will join with many Senate Democrats to block the proposal.

House Votes To Allow Drilling In Alaska Refuge (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — With gasoline prices around $3 a gallon as the Memorial Day weekend approaches, the House again voted Thursday to approve drilling for oil and gas in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

It was at least the 12th time that the House had voted to allow energy exploration in a small piece of the preserve's 19 million acres along the northern coastal plain of Alaska. The final tally was 225 to 201, with 27 Democrats joining the majority and 30 Republicans voting against.

But given the Senate's recent disposition toward drilling in the Arctic, the vote may be little more than symbolic.

Since 1995, when Congress passed an arctic drilling bill and President Bill Clinton vetoed it, Senate proponents of drilling have failed to gather the 60 votes needed to end a filibuster against it. The outcome is expected to be no different this year.

Drilling in the Arctic has become a major fault line in the debate over how to wean the nation from foreign oil and bring down gasoline prices.

Backers of the drilling contend that the promise of 10.3 billion barrels of oil would lead to greater energy independence and job creation. Opponents say that the risk of spills and other environmental damage outweighs the benefits and that drilling for oil delays the development of alternative fuels.

"A vote against energy production in ANWR is a vote for increasing our dependence on foreign oil and sending good American jobs overseas — two things we simply cannot do anymore," said Representative Richard W. Pombo, a California Republican who is chairman of the House Resources Committee and the bill's sponsor.

But Representative Alcee L. Hastings, Democrat of Florida, said the bill represented "the triumph of politics over geology" and would not reduce the price of gas at the pump.

Representative John W. Olver, Democrat of Massachusetts, said, "It will be five years at best, and probably eight years, before the first barrel of oil flows" if drilling is allowed.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman applauded the House vote, but the administration was dealt a setback on Wednesday night, when the House voted on spending for one of President Bush's signature energy initiatives, the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership.

In providing $24.4 billion for the Energy Department — about $300 million more than the administration requested and $327 million above current spending — lawmakers gave Mr. Bush $120 million for the partnership, less than half the $250 million he had sought.

Under the plan, the United States and Russia would provide reactor fuel to other countries and reclaim the spent fuel to assure that it would not be used for weapons. The administration is advancing the plan as a way to promote expanding the use of nuclear fuel in the United States.

Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate energy committee, vowed to reverse the House, saying, "I plan to restore full funding for G.N.E.P. and go looking for more."

House Again OKs Drilling In Arctic Refuge (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

Jittery about voters' sour mood over high gasoline prices less than six months before congressional elections, the Republican-controlled House on Thursday passed an old favorite: legislation seeking to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

DOJ_NMG_0029985

The measure, which was approved by a 225-201 vote, faces long odds in the Senate, where it has been blocked repeatedly by filibusters. A Senate GOP aide called the measure "DOA" in that chamber.

But House Republicans wanted to return to their districts for Memorial Day able to say that they had acted on energy legislation before the summer vacation season begins.

"It's an election year, isn't it?" Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, D-Fla., remarked.

The drilling measure is the first in a series of energy proposals expected to come before Congress in coming weeks, now that pump prices have become a campaign issue in the battle for control of Congress this year. Both parties have stepped up efforts to highlight their differences on energy policy.

During the debate Thursday, Republicans accused Democrats of opposing efforts to increase domestic fuel supplies. "Had President Clinton and the Democrats in Congress not blocked exploration in ANWR 10 years ago, a greater supply of American oil could have been available today," Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, argued, citing Clinton's 1995 veto of a budget bill that included a drilling proposal.

Democrats portrayed the Arctic drilling measure as a sop to Big Oil that would endanger an environmental treasure. "Everyone knows this bill is dead on arrival in the U.S. Senate," said Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo. "If the Republicans are serious about energy security, they would offer up real solutions -- like increasing alternative fuels and making our cars and light trucks more fuel-efficient."

GOP leaders were eager to put Democrats on the record in advance of the fall elections, even though 30 Republicans joined 170 Democrats and one independent in opposing the drilling.

Although the House has previously voted to authorize drilling in the refuge, Republican leaders predicted that with gas prices now above $3 a gallon, voters would pay closer attention to the vote.

"This is about the law of supply and demand," said Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Texas. "By increasing oil supply here in the U.S., we can impact rising energy costs in the long run and decrease our dependency on foreign sources of energy."

But drilling opponents contend that it would take years for Arctic oil to reach the market, and even then, it would have only a negligible impact on prices.

Opening a portion of the 19.6-million-acre refuge in Alaska's northeast corner to energy exploration has long been among the most contentious U.S. environmental issues. President Bush has pushed for allowing the drilling since taking office, calling it critical to national security and economic growth.

Proponents have repeatedly tried to pass the drilling measure, attaching it to budget and defense bills and seeking to entice more lawmakers to vote for it by offering to use government royalties from energy production for such things as home-heating subsidies and aid to the steel industries.

Federal estimates say the equivalent of 10 billion barrels of oil lies beneath the refuge's tundra, though opponents argue that only about 3 billion barrels are economically recoverable. The U.S. consumes about 20 million barrels of oil a day.

Many Democrats and some Republicans advocated greater conservation measures, such as tougher miles-per-gallon rules for cars.

"Astonishingly, this Congress has not voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon," said Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y.

But Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., the House Resources Committee chairman and the drilling measure's chief sponsor, ridiculed Democrats for promoting energy-saving technology without considering the immediate need to produce more domestic oil.

"Your response to everything has been 'no,' " he said. "You've got this pie in the sky (idea) that we're going to invent a 100-mile-per gallon carburetor and all of a sudden our problems are going to go away."

Death In The Mines, Action In Congress (NYT)

Another mine disaster is finally spurring Congress to pass long overdue repairs to the nation's threadbare safety laws. Mandates for such obvious necessities as extra oxygen supplies for trapped miners languished after an initial burst of concern over the disaster in January that killed 12 miners in Sago, W.Va. But the explosion last weekend in Kentucky that killed five miners has been followed by quick Senate approval of a bill ordering extra oxygen, more responsive rescue teams, and stronger underground barriers to seal off danger zones from workers.

The Republican leaders in the House, lagging behind the Senate, hurried to catch up. But the sad truth is that safety equipment and rescue procedures have been scandalously neglected for years under company-friendly regulations that have been laxly enforced by government agencies stocked with political appointees who have come from the coal industry.

The Senate bill does at least force companies to invest in new emergency communication and tracking equipment and to face tougher penalties and possibly a shutdown, rare now as companies let fines pile up. It also mandates the doubling of a miner's emergency oxygen packet to two hours, plus the stashing of extra oxygen along escape routes. In the two headlined disasters, some miners survived explosions only to die for lack of oxygen.

Other changes — aimed at the 11-hour delay in starting a rescue attempt in Sago — would require rescue teams to be nearer to each mine for faster response, and to be protected from damage liability. Some companies have actually hesitated to have mine rescue teams for fear of being sued. The Senate bill only begins to repair the problem. But it is preferable to pro-industry proposals in the House to require drug testing for miners — as if the victims, not government and industry, were to blame for miners' highest death rate in 20 years.

Man Admits Selling Stolen Prescription Drugs Worth $7.3 Million (AP)

AP, May 26, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) - A former drug distributor admitted Thursday that he sold $7.3 million worth of prescription drugs that he knew were stolen from warehouses and trucks.

Gregory Broccoli pleaded guilty to five conspiracy charges, acknowledging wrongdoing from 2002 through 2004 at a company he operated in Jersey City and Elizabeth called Providers Plus.

Broccoli, 39, of Staten Island, N.Y., is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with a federal investigation that began in 2003.

The FBI investigation and guilty pleas from the defendants exposed a network of thieves and crooked wholesalers who obtained prescription drugs through illegal means, created fraudulent documents, and then reintroduced the prescription drugs into the marketplace, federal prosecutors in New Jersey said.

Broccoli admitted that to sell the prescription drugs, he created bogus documents that are required to certify the origin and sales history of shipments.

Each conspiracy count carries up to five years in prison. Broccoli is to be sentenced Sept. 5 by U.S. District Judge Dennis M. Cavanaugh.

Drug Cocktail Causing Overdoses From Philadelphia To Chicago (AP)

By Sarah Karush

AP, May 25, 2006

DETROIT (AP) - Larry, a 53-year-old heroin addict, has two cardinal rules: Never shoot up alone, and only shoot up one at a time. If one person overdoses, "you need someone there to bring you back," he said.

Larry, who asked that his last name not be used because of his illegal habit, recited his rules after hearing that a mixture of heroin and a powerful painkiller has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin.

Officials from Philadelphia to Chicago have reported deaths from the drug, called fentanyl and considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. In the Detroit area - the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall and about two dozen suspected ones in the last week - officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are investigating, and community organizations are scrambling to get the word out to users.

The CDC says it has no national statistics on fentanyl deaths and has only been asked to investigate in Michigan. But individual reports from a scattering of states indicate the drug is widespread.

In Philadelphia, there have been 20 confirmed deaths from heroin mixed with fentanyl since April 17, and test results are pending for another eight suspected cases, the city health department said.

In New Jersey, where officials first raised the alarm about the drug in April, there have been about 10 confirmed fentanyl deaths and another 10 to 20 suspected cases since last month, according to the state's poison control center.

"This is a huge, huge problem," said Stephen Marcus, medical director of the New Jersey Poison Control Center.

In Chicago, 30 people have died from fentanyl or fentanyl-laced heroin from September 2005 to March 2006, said Christopher Hoyt, a spokesman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in that city. Another 23 suspected cases were reported in April and May.

In Wayne County, which includes Detroit, Medical Examiner Carl J. Schmidt said he began noticing an uptick in fentanyl-related deaths in September. In total, medical examiners found 63 people in Wayne County with fentanyl in their blood when they died last year. From the beginning of 2006 to mid-April, there were 70 such cases.

But county officials did not begin treating fentanyl as a crisis until last week, when the number of overdoses began to soar.

"Sometimes divining what the role of fentanyl is in an individual's death is more an art than a science," Schmidt said, noting that drug users often have multiple substances in their blood.

Still, it was clear something was amiss when 12 people died of overdoses May 18-19, Schmidt said. Over the next four days, there were 15 more fatal overdoses, Schmidt said. The county of 2 million typically sees two to three drug deaths a day.

Fentanyl is a suspected culprit in most of the recent deaths, though that won't be confirmed until after the toxicology results come back in four to six weeks.

The drug kills by inhibiting respiration, Schmidt said. "It literally suppresses your natural impulse to breathe," he said.

Before the recent surge, Wayne County saw 20 to 30 fentanyl deaths a year, Schmidt said. Those cases tended to be severely ill people with legitimate prescriptions for fentanyl patches who committed suicide by putting on many patches at once or the occasional person who had stolen the drug, he said.

The fentanyl behind the current problem appears to be manufactured illegally and mixed with heroin long before it gets to the user, Schmidt said.

In one case, three people found dead in a car last month took fentanyl not with heroin, but with cocaine. Schmidt said he fears that could indicate a new trend.

Detroit police spokesman James Tate said the department is following up on several leads about where the fentanyl is originating. So far, however, there is no indication that it is being manufactured locally, he said.

Organizations that run needle exchanges and other health programs for drug users are trying to spread the word. "Is your friend turning blue?" reads one flier that describes what to do in an emergency.

Officials emphasize that there is help for people who have overdosed if they get to an emergency room immediately.

"Treatment is available, and treatment works," said Michele Reid, medical director of the Detroit-Wayne County Community Mental Health Agency and chairwoman of the newly created Wayne County fentanyl work group.

But to some drug users, the warnings are in fact an advertisement.

"When they hear about people OD-ing somewhere, they want to go there" to get the more potent drugs, said Larry, the Detroit heroin user.

That's what New Jersey officials found last month. "The drug addicts were actually looking for the drug, so what we did was actually counterproductive," said Marcus, the poison control director.

Like Larry, 37-year-old Latonja, of Detroit, said she would do her best to stay away from the tainted heroin by sticking to dealers she knows. However, she acknowledged it may be difficult, since users can never know for sure what they're buying.

"We're not analyzers when we're trying to shoot our dope," said Latonja, who also asked that her last name not be used. "We're like, 'OK, it's time to get happy.'"

A Look At A Drug Cocktail Problem Around The Country (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

A look at problems reported around the country related to a mixture of heroin and the powerful painkiller fentanyl that has been killing unsuspecting users who believe they are taking pure heroin.

WAYNE COUNTY, MICH.:

-The county that includes Detroit has the most fentanyl-linked deaths. The drug was found in 63 people who died last year and 70 this year, through mid-April.

-The county saw 27 fatal overdoses over six days ending Tuesday. Fentanyl is suspected but not confirmed.

REST OF MICHIGAN:

-State health officials say the problem appears to be limited to the Detroit area.

-Not all medical examiners in the state routinely screen for fentanyl in drug deaths, so the problem may not be apparent.

PHILADELPHIA:

-20 confirmed deaths from heroin mixed with fentanyl since April 17; test results pending for another eight suspected cases. In the same five-week period in 2005, there were seven drug-related deaths of any kind.

CHICAGO:

-30 fentanyl-linked deaths from September 2005 to March 2006. Another 23 suspected cases in April and May.

NEW JERSEY:

-Since April, about 10 confirmed fentanyl deaths; 10 to 20 suspected cases.

DELAWARE:

-Five suspected drug deaths over two weeks beginning at the end of April, awaiting test results.

FENTANYL DEATHS RISE: Mom: Cops Failed To Act On OD (FREEP)

By Ben Schmitt, Amber Hunt And Kim Norris, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, May 25, 2006

Son died last year; now drug is crisis

When Justin Wortmann's life ended in December in a White Castle parking lot after he took a dose of heroin, it was a silent warning about an unprecedented crisis now bubbling over in metro Detroit.

His mother, Janice Wortmann of Plymouth Township, learned from autopsy results 8 weeks later that the killer actually was a drug called fentanyl. She called police in Taylor, where her son died Dec. 27.

"The detective told me they didn't have the manpower to look for a dealer, that they were on every street corner," she said.

Police responded that they tried, to no avail.

Now, the body count of people suspected of overdosing on a mix of heroin and fentanyl is rising -- and an urgent search is on.

Wortmann, 47, wonders whether the death of her 26-year-old son could have been prevented.

"Maybe if they took me seriously they could have gone to the source," Wortmann said Wednesday. "Maybe this wouldn't be happening now."

Local toxicologists say they've seen a steady increase in fentanyl-related deaths since last fall, but nothing prepared them for the jump that began last week: At least 23 people have died in Wayne County since May 18 from what investigators believe was a lethal combination of heroin or cocaine and fentanyl, a prescription painkiller typically given to terminally ill patients for pain.

Now, as Michiganders gear up for the long holiday weekend and outdoor activities, county and Detroit officials are scrambling to get the word out about the drug's dangers.

Workers are distributing flyers in areas known to be frequented by drug users that warn of the dangers of using heroin or cocaine laced with fentanyl, which they might not be aware they are buying.

If the numbers from the past week prove true, fentanyl experts agree: The rash of Wayne County deaths is unprecedented.

"It's amazing," said Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida, who has published several studies on fentanyl abuse. "I've seen fentanyl deaths, but not in terms of the outbreak you have."

As a result, Wayne County Prosecutor Kym Worthy said Wednesday that her office is prepared to charge with murder the dealers of the deadly mix of drugs, and authorities acknowledged they're navigating new territory as they hunt for the dealers.

Tracking down the dealers won't be easy, officials said.

Detroit Police spokesman James Tate said police are fielding numerous tips about the sale of the heroin-fentanyl mix. No arrests were made as of Wednesday.

Lawrence Meyer, chief of field operations for the Wayne County Sheriff's Office, said he has never seen a similar case in his 30 years in law enforcement. He and other investigators first had to learn about fentanyl itself, and then how it's distributed.

"We're just at the point where we're sorting all the records," he said. "Our investigators are pulling records ... on the victims and we're trying to establish a nexus with a distribution point or source.

"We're talking to victims' relatives, their associates, their friends. We're just at the preliminary stages."

Law enforcement and medical officials said the most likely source is an illegal lab.

"It's probably clandestinely manufactured," said Daniel Isenschmid, chief toxicologist with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office. He said a change in the fentanyl-to-heroin ratio might explain the rising body count.

Goldberger agreed the fentanyl is probably homemade. "You can synthesize it if you're a good chemist," he said.

Deaths linked to fentanyl-laced drugs have been reported in smaller numbers in cities across the country, including Chicago and Philadelphia, and investigated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency since last fall.

Investigators from the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention arrived Monday in Detroit to gather information. They're expected to stay at least through the week -- and possibly longer -- to comb through medical records and toxicology reports and to conduct interviews.

"This is the first time we have taken a look at heroin overdoses connected to fentanyl," said Bernadette Burden, a CDC spokeswoman, who said the agency typically doesn't give a time frame for investigations. "This is new territory for CDC investigators."

Authorities learned of another Wayne County drug death Wednesday that might also be linked to fentanyl.

County officials would not release the names of the victims Wednesday or the specifics about where they died, offering no explanation. They insisted the Free Press file a Freedom of Information Act request.

The true death count won't be known until toxicology reports are completed in the next few weeks, but officials with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office said some of the bodies showed telltale signs -- including syringes still stuck in victims' arms, indicating the type of sudden death that a fentanyl overdose causes.

Oakland County confirmed 20 such deaths from Sept. 28 through early April. Most of those deaths were from Genesee County, which does not have its own medical examiner.

Drug-related deaths in Macomb County have risen in recent weeks, said Medical Examiner Daniel Spitz, but he won't know if the deaths are linked to fentanyl until toxicology reports come back in another week or so.

In the Taylor case involving Justin Wortmann, from Dearborn, police said they searched for the drug dealer but were unsuccessful.

"We understand she's a grieving mother, but detectives worked on the case to get to the bottom of it," said Jac Desrosiers, Taylor's director of police services. "It's hard to accept the fact that it happened, but our detectives don't let these cases slide."

CDC investigators have to confirm the deaths truly are linked to fentanyl, and then they'll help state and local authorities develop guidelines to try to halt the carnage.

Gary Kunsman, chief forensic toxicologist for the Oakland County Medical Examiner's Office, has been tracking fentanyl-related deaths since Sept. 28, when the first of seven victims arrived at the morgue in a three-week period.

"It's been sort of steady since," Kunsman said. He said three of the 20 total cases came from the Pontiac area; the rest were from Genesee County.

Kunsman reported the cases to the crime lab in the county sheriff's office so the lab could test for the potentially lethal combination.

Isenschmid said he also noticed an increase in fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County beginning last fall.

Isenschmid's office usually confirms fentanyl as the cause of death through standard toxicology tests, which can detect the drug in "high-therapeutic" doses -- or amounts at which patients might legitimately be using the drug.

In response to the recent deaths, however, the office plans to begin a new screening test that will detect fentanyl faster and in smaller quantities.

"We'll have the results of a screen in less than a week," Isenschmid said.

Janice Wortmann, whose son died in December, said she has relived the loss because of the deaths in the past week.

"This should not be happening at all. It shouldn't have happened to my son," she said. "I know exactly what these parents are going through."

Possible Sources Of Fentanyl (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, May 25, 2006

The drug fentanyl, a potent painkiller often prescribed to terminally ill patients, landed on the streets years ago, authorities said. But it's now more popular than ever before. And authorities don't know where it's coming from.

The drug usually is prescribed as patches -- dubbed "pain patches" by cancer patients -- or on lollipop-like sticks, though it also can be administered in liquid form during surgeries.

Law enforcement officials investigating fentanyl-related deaths in Wayne County say drug dealers could be crystallizing prescription fentanyl to use as a cutting agent for heroin and cocaine, but they doubt it.

They believe someone is manufacturing the drug in an illegal lab.

"It's probably clandestinely manufactured," said Daniel Isenschmid, chief toxicologist with the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office.

As with other painkillers, fetanyl is strictly regulated. Hospice workers are instructed to destroy whatever remains after a patient dies, and they're told to slice up used pain patches with scissors so that excess fentanyl can't be removed and used inappropriately.

That's why experts such as Dr. Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida, say the fentanyl killing people in Wayne County is likely homemade.

"You can synthesize it if you're a good chemist," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029990

A change in the fentanyl-to-heroin ratio might explain the rising body count, Isenschmid said. At least 23 people have died since May 18.

"Fentanyl is 80 times more potent than morphine," he said. "One of the problems is that users don't know how to dose themselves."

Fentanyl Deaths Hit 33 In A Week (DN)

Detroit News, May 26, 2006

The Wayne County death toll attributed to fentanyl-laced drugs has reached 33 people in one week, putting Metro Detroit at the epicenter of a national health concern that reaches into several other states.

There have been at least 200 confirmed deaths in five states attributed to the painkiller mixed with heroin or cocaine, with 130 of them in Wayne County since January 2005. That total doesn't include the 33 Wayne deaths from May 18 through Wednesday, which are suspected but not yet confirmed by toxicology tests.

"It's a lot bigger than we thought it was in the beginning," said John Kashani of the Poison Control Center in New Jersey, where 30 suspected fentanyl-related deaths occurred in the past month, about the same as in Philadelphia.

Nowhere is concern higher than in Metro Detroit.

"The officials of this county should have taken this on a long time ago," said Randy Richter, whose son was found dead in Canton on Feb. 27. "It is absolutely ridiculous to hear they didn't know it was a problem because they knew it was a problem. How many lives could have been saved?"

Richter's son's death was among nine over three days this winter, a Detroit News review of toxicology reports found.

Richter was told his son, 18, was the 30th person to die this year because of fentanyl. He's livid officials waited until Friday to make the concern public. He suspects officials kept the deaths quiet for Super Bowl XL, held in Detroit on Feb. 5, a charge county officials emphatically deny.

"We've never done that and never will we do that," said Sharon Banks, spokeswoman for the Wayne County executive office, who called that suggestion "offensive and irresponsible."

The surge in Wayne County fentanyl-related deaths began in August 2005 and climbed steadily, according to health records.

Public health officials put out an alert last weekend when 12 people died Thursday and Friday.

Most of the victims are believed to have used heroin mixed with fentanyl, which is 80-100 times more potent than heroin and can cause rapid death through respiratory failure.

This year's victims had fentanyl concentrations in their blood ranging from .002 to as high as .19, according to toxicology reports from the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office reviewed by The News. Victims were a mix of men and women, black and white.

Before this week, the highest concentration of deaths occurred Feb. 27, 28 and March 1, when nine people died, including Richter's son, health reports show. Of those, two had lethal amounts of the drug in their blood of .11 or higher and others had high levels.

While some support more public awareness, others fear publicity will have the opposite effect.

"One of the concerns many treatment providers have is this: Are heroin users going to be seeking out fentanyl for their desire to get the ultimate high?" said Christopher Parks of the Neighborhood Services Organization. "They heard people are dying from it so it must be a potent drug."

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention officials are trying to develop a profile of those most likely to die from the painkiller, so they can target groups with educational information.

County officials say they have heard the fentanyl may be manufactured in a lab, but law enforcement says they are investigating all angles, including whether health officials may be stealing it.

Fentanyl is a synthetic opiate used for pain relief and anesthesia. Therapeutic concentrations in the bloodstream range between .001 and .01, officials say.

"You are basically playing Russian roulette by using this," said Wayne County Deputy Chief Medical Examiner Cheryl Loewe.

Operation Street sweep (CA)

Commercial Appeal, May 26, 2006

Just two hours into Thursday's roundup, two teams of officers supervised by Memphis Police Lt. Charles 'Bubba' Cox had picked up four of 10 suspects on his list of those wanted on state or federal warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0029991

By late afternoon, 48 of 67 people indicted on drug and gun charges were behind bars in Operation Street Sweep. The sweep was a joint effort by Memphis Organized Crime Unit officers, Shelby County Sheriff's deputies, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives (ATF) and deputy U.S. Marshals.

Despite the atypical ease his teams had finding and arresting the suspects Thursday morning, Cox cautioned his people to stay on their toes.

"You don't want to become complacent," he said. "You take them one at a time. ... Violence has become more prevalent."

Many of those being sought by roughly 130 officers, deputies and federal agents were repeat offenders, many gang members.

"They go armed," said Memphis Police department spokesman Sgt. Vince Higgins. "They have expressed a desire not to go back to jail."

Dogs accompanied the teams to search for drugs and chase down suspects known for running when the cops show up.

And though no suspect fought with the police, several tried to run. At least one hid in an attic.

"I'm on pins and needles every time we do one of these," Higgins said. The officers face the potential of "bullets, dogs, someone with a knife" every time they go through a door.

Thirty of the suspects were being sought on federal indictments returned this week, and 24 are wanted for state crimes, mainly drug offenses. The rest were wanted on previous warrants.

At their first stop, one team, led by Joe Hoing, a 32-year Memphis Police veteran assigned to the DEA drug task force, caught up with Nicholas Hull, 28, named in six counts of crack possession.

Hull, a known Gangster Disciple wanted for drug sales, was holed up at 1316 Inglewood in South Memphis with several friends.

The friends were allowed to leave, since none had outstanding warrants.

After prolonged harping by one member of the group, Hoing ordered the group to disperse.

"The clock is ticking. You have 30 seconds to leave, or you're coming with me," he told them. They left quickly.

A five-shot .22-caliber Derringer was found in the house, and a Dodge Intrepid with stolen tags was towed away.

The other team under Cox had to ram down the door at 1421 Hemlock to get the cuffs on Walter Holmes, 45, charged with three counts of crack possession.

Holmes joined Hull in the back of a squad car. The two were taken to booking stations in Tobey Park where they were photographed and fingerprinted.

The array of charges included impersonating a federal officer, possession by a felon of firearms, possession of body armor, and crack, heroin, and powder cocaine possession.

Brandon Clayton was indicted in federal court for allegedly impersonating an ATF agent and using his assumed status to get discounts on rent and sales tax exemptions on the purchase of communications equipment.

The suspects ranged in age from 18 to 55 and included several known gang members.

17 Arrested In Regional Drug Sting (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

Seventeen people from Maine, New Hampshire and Massachusetts have been arrested on drug charges after a seven-month undercover investigation.

Edward Arias and Jose Ortiz, both of Lawrence, Mass., were indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine by a federal grand jury in New Hampshire.

They supplied more than 150 pounds of cocaine to southern Maine, said Kittery, Maine, Police Chief Edward Strong. Up to 15 more people could be arrested as the investigation continues, he said yesterday. Strong helped lead the multi-agency investigation.

York, Maine, Police Detective Thomas Cryan said he hopes the arrests will slow the drug trade in the area and serve as a warning to other dealers.

"Maybe this will let them know that we are looking. Either way, I think it's going to be a busy summer," he said.

Demetries Agiasotelis, 29, of Rollinsford, was indicted separately on a federal charge of conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

Six others also face federal drug charges, all in U.S. District Court in New Hampshire:

q Chris Knight, 24, of Sanford, Maine, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

q Chris Cote, 25, of Sanford, Maine, was charged with distribution of cocaine and marijuana.

q Michael Ducharme, 23, of Milton, Mass., was charged with distribution of marijuana.

q Mouen Chan, 26, of Sanford, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

q Virak Tin, 20, of Berwick, Maine, was charged with distribution of marijuana.

q Sothear Kim, 25, of Sanford, was charged with distribution of cocaine.

The police arrested eight more suspects on state drug charges: Trevor Small, 28, of Eliot, Maine; Alan Hall, 50, of Kittery; Erin Glen, 26, of South Berwick, Maine; Thomas Millette, 40, of York; Justin Bellissimo, 25, of Berwick; Kyle Clark, 19, of Newburyport, Mass.; Donald Crocker, 25, of Wells, Maine; and William Burke, 38, of York.

They will be arraigned in York District Court, Strong said.

The investigation was led by the York and Kittery police departments and the New Hampshire office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, assisted by the Portsmouth Police and the New England State Police Information Network.

Kittery Chief: Arrests 'put A Dent' In Drug Trade (PHN)

By Deborah McDermott

Portsmouth (NH) Herald News, May 26, 2006

News this week that 17 people are facing federal and state cocaine and marijuana distribution charges has "definitely put a dent" in the local drug trade - from significant suppliers right down to street dealers, said Kittery Police Chief Edward Strong.

Kittery and York police departments Tuesday announced the arrests and, in many cases, indictments of four different sets of dealers, each facing an array of distribution and trafficking charges.

The joint investigation was "a model of cooperation" between the two departments, Strong said. He and York Police Chief Douglas Bracy have officers devoted only to drug cases, who share information and work together.

"We've put a lot of effort into trying to make a dent into drug trafficking in this area," he said.

In each of the 17 cases, either Kittery Detective Steven Hamel, York Detective Thomas Cryan or members of the New Hampshire Drug Enforcement Agency allegedly purchased drugs from the defendants, which led to their arrests. Most were arrested in their homes or at work in the past three weeks, and some turned themselves in.

According to Hamel, the investigation began last fall, when a local confidential informant gave police information on Edward Arias of Lawrence, Mass.

Strong said Arias was allegedly "a high-level supplier with connections in New York." He led them to Jose Ortiz, also of Lawrence, who Strong called Arias' "mule, who would run cocaine into this area and deliver it."

Both men, whose ages are unknown, were arrested this week and arraigned in federal district court in Concord on charges of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and distribution of cocaine.

"They'd been supplying the entire area. It's going to take a while for someone to fill those shoes," Strong said.

A separate informant gave Hamel information on Demetries Agiasotelis, 30, of Rollinsford, N.H., whom Hamel said has been "a target of this area for four or five years." Hamel called Agiasotelis a "mid-level supplier" of cocaine in the area, "supplying the whole Seacoast."

Agiasotelis has been arraigned in federal court in Concord on charges of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine.

Yet another set of federal charges were filed against five individuals from Maine and one from New Hampshire who together, Strong said, had "a network" in the Seacoast area.

Finally, eight others who Strong identified as "low-level street dealers" are facing state charges. They have arraignment dates in the next few months in York District Court, although Strong said they will likely all be indicted in superior court prior to their arraignment.

Bracy said the arrests are proof of not only Kittery and York cooperation, but also police departments in New Hampshire and Massachusetts, because "we're all in this together. The drugs don't come from York, Maine or Kittery, Maine."

He said by bringing federal charges against these defendants, "we're sending a message. We know they aren't coming into this area as much as they used to. We're making a dent at the street."

Clayton Man Admits To Money Laundering (DDN)

Dayton (OH) Daily News, May 26, 2006

Dayton | A Clayton businessman admitted Thursday to a federal felony charge of money laundering that could put him in prison for four years.

Glen Hurst, 55, of Butler Twp. pleaded guilty as part of a plea agreement that provides that his wife, Debra Hurst, will plead to a misdemeanor tax charge after federal prosecutors dismiss a felony. He also pleaded to a misdemeanor tax offense.

The Hursts were indicted in a wide-ranging case that focused on drug kingpin Earl Marshall, who pleaded guilty April 18 to five felonies and faces at least 18 years in prison.

In 2004, federal officials called the case one of the largest trafficking operations in Dayton. It was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration.

Hurst owned and operated the American Funding Agency Inc., a mortgage company at 8126 N. Main St. in Clayton. DEA and IRS agents raided it June 24, 2004.

According to facts presented in court:

Marshall would provide information, much of it false, to Hurst's mortgage company. From that information, American Funding employees created fraudulent documents to support loan requests. Hurst was aware the documents were based in part on false information from Marshall and others.

Financial sources for the loans came from Marshall, even when he was not connected by the documents. Hurst was aware the money was coming from illegal sources and the transactions were done in part to conceal Marshall's financial involvement in the real estate transactions.

Purchases involved properties at 272 Valley View Drive in Englewood, 4424 Genesee, 2285 Diamond Mill Road in Brookville, 106 Deans Court in Union; 6600 Westford Ave., 5104 Gardendale Ave. and 2516 Germantown, according to the statement of facts.

In the tax charge, Hurst admitted to failing to file an income tax return for 1999, failing to comply with withholding obligation for employees and other acts. The tax loss to the government for 1999 and 2000 was $55,733.

U.S. District Judge Thomas M. Rose set sentencing for Aug. 24.

Study Finds No Cancer-Marijuana Connection (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The largest study of its kind has unexpectedly concluded that smoking marijuana, even regularly and heavily, does not lead to lung cancer.

The new findings "were against our expectations," said Donald Tashkin of the University of California at Los Angeles, a pulmonologist who has studied marijuana for 30 years.

"We hypothesized that there would be a positive association between marijuana use and lung cancer, and that the association would be more positive with heavier use," he said. "What we found instead was no association at all, and even a suggestion of some protective effect."

Federal health and drug enforcement officials have widely used Tashkin's previous work on marijuana to make the case that the drug is dangerous. Tashkin said that while he still believes marijuana is potentially harmful, its cancer-causing effects appear to be of less concern than previously thought.

Earlier work established that marijuana does contain cancer-causing chemicals as potentially harmful as those in tobacco, he said. However, marijuana also contains the chemical THC, which he said may kill aging cells and keep them from becoming cancerous.

Tashkin's study, funded by the National Institutes of Health's National Institute on Drug Abuse, involved 1,200 people in Los Angeles who had lung, neck or head cancer and an additional 1,040 people without cancer matched by age, sex and neighborhood.

They were all asked about their lifetime use of marijuana, tobacco and alcohol. The heaviest marijuana smokers had lighted up more than 22,000 times, while moderately heavy usage was defined as smoking 11,000 to 22,000 marijuana cigarettes. Tashkin found that even the very heavy marijuana smokers showed no increased incidence of the three cancers studied.

"This is the largest case-control study ever done, and everyone had to fill out a very extensive questionnaire about marijuana use," he said. "Bias can creep into any research, but we controlled for as many confounding factors as we could, and so I believe these results have real meaning."

Tashkin's group at the David Geffen School of Medicine at UCLA had hypothesized that marijuana would raise the risk of cancer on the basis of earlier small human studies, lab studies of animals, and the fact that marijuana users inhale more deeply and generally hold smoke in their lungs longer than tobacco smokers -- exposing them to the dangerous chemicals for a longer time. In addition, Tashkin said, previous studies found that marijuana tar has 50 percent higher concentrations of chemicals linked to cancer than tobacco cigarette tar.

While no association between marijuana smoking and cancer was found, the study findings, presented to the American Thoracic Society International Conference this week, did find a 20-fold increase in lung cancer among people who smoked two or more packs of cigarettes a day.

The study was limited to people younger than 60 because those older than that were generally not exposed to marijuana in their youth, when it is most often tried.

Idaho Man Indicted For Drug Smuggling From Canada (AP)

AP, May 25, 2006

SPOKANE, Wash. -- A federal grand jury has indicted a Sandpoint, Idaho, man on charges he attempted to smuggle marijuana, methamphetamine and the designer drug Ecstacy into the United States from Canada.

Joseph A. Roberts, 43, was arrested by U.S. Border Patrol agents May 7 near Molson, just south of the Canadian border in Okanogan County.

The grand jury indicted Roberts on Tuesday on three counts of importation and three counts of possession with intent to distribute drugs.

Federal prosecutors allege Roberts had nearly 170 pounds of "B.C. Bud" marijuana, 143 pounds of methamphetamine and 16 pounds of Ecstasy when arrested. The street value of the methamphetamine alone is estimated at more than $1 million, prosecutors said.

Conviction on the methamphetamine counts would carry a mandatory minimum penalty of 10 years to a maximum of life imprisonment, a fine up to $4 million, and a life term of court supervision after release.

The remaining counts each carry a maximum penalty of up to 20 years in prison, a $1 million fine and life supervision.

Judge Won't Halt Gun-store Closure (CHICOER)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Chico (CA) Enterprise Record, May 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge refused today to postpone the government-imposed closing date for Northern California's largest gun dealer, Trader Sports of San Leandro, due to extensive violations of federal law.

Chief U.S. District Court Judge Vaughn Walker found that although Trader Sports likely will be hurt more by the closure than the public would be by allowing the store to remain open, the gun dealer hasn't substantially disputed the claims against it and isn't likely enough to succeed in its claims of an unfair administrative hearing to deserve a court-ordered stay.

Vaughn gave the store until June 2 - one day past the government's previously imposed deadline - to take the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and seek a stay there. The store's attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said he'll have to ask store owner Anthony Cucchiara whether to appeal.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms served Cucchiara months ago with notice that he'd have to surrender his license and close his store effective June 1. This followed a 13-month administrative hearing in which the ATF used evidence from a September 2003 inspection, along with earlier information, to argue Trader Sports has flouted federal firearms sale reporting requirements for years.

The 2003 inspection found 3,659 firearms in stock at the store, yet computer records showing 9,100 firearms should have been in inventory. The discrepancy later was whittled to more than 1,700 firearms unaccounted for.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee argued Thursday that this, atop record-keeping deficiencies found in past inspections, proved Trader Sports couldn't be trusted to keep proper track of its sales.

``A license is a privilege... It comes with certain responsibilities," he told Walker, later adding ATF inspectors have found 19 instances in the three years since the inspection in which Trader Sports couldn't properly help law enforcement trace firearms found at crime scenes - a rate far higher than that of similar dealers. ``There is no substantial disagreement on this point."

Evidence also shows firearms sold by Trader Sports have been found at crime scenes at a rate of roughly one per week over the past two years, also out of line with similar dealers, Lee said.

Segal argued among other things that closing the store means more than 20 longtime employees will lose their jobs; police and hunters will be deprived of a valuable resource; and the business will miss its most profitable time of year as hunting season begins in June. He also argued that ATF violated its own rule by inspecting Trader Sports in 2003 a few weeks short of a year after its last meeting with Cucchiara, so all evidence from the inspection should be excluded from the case.

But this appeal of the administrative order to close the store is a civil lawsuit, and Walker said Thursday he could find no reason to exclude evidence from non-criminal cases.

He also said Trader Sports' claims that its administrative hearing was unfair - due to excluded evidence, and to alleged collusion between the ATF's ``prosecutor" and the hearing officer - were ``essentially insubstantial" and not enough to support the store's claim of due-process violations.

Thursday's hearing was merely for a preliminary injunction to halt the closure; Cucchiara can continue his lawsuit after the store closes in order to try to regain his license and reopen.

Griffin Dix of Kensington, president of the California chapters of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence's Million Mom March, said he believes the judge's order and the store's impending closure set good precedent.

``Enough is enough," he said. ``Just consider the harm done to the community by the guns that are spread all over the place by this irresponsibility."

The Brady Campaign has issued a report, ``Trading in Death," outlining all of Trader Sports' past and present violations.

``Trader Sports has supplied more criminals with firearms than almost any other gun dealer in the nation," Brady Campaign legal director Dennis Henigan said in a statement. ``Congress should strengthen ATF's power to revoke licenses of corrupt dealers rather than enacting new special interest laws to protect them."

SAN LEANDRO Gun Shop Tries To Keep U.S. From Closing Store Trader Sports Losing License Over Weapons That Can't Be Found (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, May 26, 2006

The owner of the Bay Area's biggest firearms store will ask a judge today to stop regulators from shutting him down at the end of the month, in a case that is being watched on both sides of the gun debate.

The hearing before U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker in San Francisco will center on federal agents' 2003 inspection of Trader Sports, which has operated on East 14th Street near downtown San Leandro for more than 35 years. It sells more than 3,500 revolvers, pistols, shotguns and rifles a year, along with fishing tackle and other goods.

Regulators from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives ordered Tony Cucchiara to surrender his firearms license because he allegedly could not account for 1,723 guns, among other bookkeeping problems that officials argued could endanger public safety and hinder police investigating gun crimes.

His lawyer sued U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other federal officials in an effort to overturn the revocation, saying agents had found only "hyper-technical" violations.

Cucchiara is asking the judge to postpone the revocation, which is scheduled to take effect June 1, and hold a full hearing.

Those who have been watching the fight between Cucchiara and the firearms bureau said it carries implications beyond the plight of a San Leandro gun shop. Trader Sports has a history of run-ins with regulators and is a high-profile target of gun-control groups.

"Trader Sports is one of the worst of the worst," Daniel Vice, a staff attorney for the pro-gun-control Brady Campaign in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday. He said license revocations are significant because the government issues them so rarely.

Malcolm Segal, an attorney for the store, said regulators had pushed too far in the other direction. In a legal filing, he said the federal agency is "engaged in an unfair campaign to intimidate firearm purchasers and remove the licenses of firearms dealers based on hyper-technical and inadvertent violations."

The U.S. attorney's office, which is defending the firearms bureau in the lawsuit, said the inspection of Trader Sports in September 2003 found 3,659 firearms on hand, even though store records showed 9,100 guns in inventory.

Cucchiara and the federal inspectors had tried to reconcile the discrepancy and found that an additional 2,036 guns could not be accounted for, bringing the total to 7,477, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Lee wrote in a legal filing.

Most of those weapons were eventually tracked down, Lee said. But when the firearms bureau issued its final notice of revocation in December, 1,723 guns still had not been found.

Lee said the firearms bureau also found that the shop routinely filed faulty sales records and failed to properly document the sale of high-powered guns to police.

Authorities also suggested that the store's guns show up too often at crime scenes. They said police asked Trader Sports last year to trace 447 guns that had been recovered -- the second-highest number among more than 100,000 licensed gun dealers in the country.

On 19 occasions in the past three years, Trader Sports was unable to produce a weapon's history, authorities said.

Segal said guns end up in police custody for many reasons other than use by a criminal. "The fact that a firearm is found at a crime scene could mean that it is a firearm that a victim had, trying to protect themselves," he said.

The attorney wrote in a court filing that Cucchiara and Trader Sports had received a disproportionate number of trace requests because the store sold a lot of guns and had been in business for more than 35 years.

Gun Crime Program Team Wins Award (DALLASBIZ)

Dallas Business Journal, May 26, 2006

The city of Dallas' criminal prosecution team has received federal laurels for a program that has helped to reduce gun crime involving repeat offenders.

Gun crimes committed by parolees in Dallas between October 2003 and September 2005 fell by about 45 percent, according to a recent crime study.

The prosecution team -- which helped plan and implement the program -- was honored with a U. S. Department of Justice Project Safe Neighborhoods Achievement Award for exemplary local training, according to a Justice Department news release.

The community prosecutors, who have offices in seven Dallas neighborhoods, and others in law enforcement created a program that requires probationers and parolees to attend workshops that inform them of the consequences of violating terms of their release, which include not using or possessing firearms.

The Dallas team was nominated for the award by U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper of the Northern District of Texas. The award was presented by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul J. McNulty during a national conference earlier this month.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate OKs Immigration Bill 62 To 36 (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate, closing one round of acrimonious debate but setting the stage for another, passed legislation today that would both tighten the borders to new immigrants and provide procedures for the 12 million foreigners already living in this country illegally to gain legal status.

The bill would also authorize a guest worker program by which foreigners could work temporarily in this country.

The vote was 62 to 36.

The bill now goes to a committee of House and Senate members, who will try to forge a compromise between the Senate legislation and a much more punitive bill approved by the House in December.

The task may prove impossible. House Speaker Dennis J. Hastert (R-Ill.) said this week that he would not schedule a compromise bill for floor action unless it commanded the support of a majority of the House's Republican majority.

"If Speaker Hastert insists on the 'majority of the majority,' "Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.)said this week, then immigration reform is dead.

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives as head of the 100-plus Republican Study Committee, criticized the Senate bill for providing amnesty to large numbers of people who had broken the law.

"This does not mean, however, that we cannot work together to find a solution to the problem of illegal immigration," Pence said. "The real rational middle ground can be found in a bill that is tough on border security, employer enforcement, and contains a no-amnesty guest worker program run by the private sector."

The House bill triggered massive protest demonstrations in Los Angeles and other cities this spring by a population that had been largely politically inactive.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said the Senate had passed "good, comprehensive immigration reform legislation…. It deals with security, by providing new agents and new resources to secure our porous borders. It deals with employers who break the law, by making sure employee sanctions are tough and real — a big difference from the last five years."

And for foreigners in this country illegally, he said, the bill puts them on the road to legal status if they pay a fine and learn English.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), a leader of the opposition, said the bill's provisions to beef up border controls and provide tougher sanctions against employers of illegal immigrants were insufficient. "The border is not secured by this bill," he said.

And as for foreigners already here illegally, Sessions complained, "A vast majority of the illegal alien population will be given every benefit our nation can bestow on its citizens, including participation in the Social Security System, based on their illegal work histories."

The bill would authorize future legal immigration levels of three to five times current rates, he said.

"This bill is a huge, monumental budget buster," Sessions said, citing a Congressional Budget Office report that the costs would approach $120 billion over the first 10 years.

Like Sessions, House Republicans have resisted White House efforts to push them beyond their "enforcement only" approach to immigration reform.

DOJ_NMG_0029997

"The basic difference of opinion that we have seen on this issue between the House and Senate and the White House is real, it is honest, and it was exhibited at this meeting," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said.

Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, a Republican supporter of the bill, said the value of the bill was that it included the dispatch of National Guard troops to the southern border and the construction of hundreds of miles of fence along between the U.S. and Mexico.

"By securing the border, discouraging the hiring of illegal immigrants and addressing the illegal immigrants currently living in the U.S., this bill implements a comprehensive response to solve our nation's illegal immigration woes," Coleman said.

Speaking for the Bush administration, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, himself an immigrant from Cuba, applauded the Senate vote.

"Comprehensive immigration reform must secure our borders, toughen interior enforcement, create a temporary worker program, and provide employers with tamper-resistant identification cards that will help them determine the legal status of their employees," Gutierrez said. "I urge the House and Senate conferees to work in good faith to work out the differences in legislation."

Senate, In Bipartisan Act, Passes An Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The Senate easily passed legislation on Thursday that would give most illegal immigrants a chance to become American citizens. But the vote did little to soften opposition to the measure among House conservatives, and Republican leaders acknowledged that delivering a final bill to President Bush's desk would be enormously difficult.

The Senate legislation, which also creates a guest worker program and seeks to tighten control of the border, passed 62 to 36. Twenty-three Republicans and one independent joined 38 Democrats to win approval of the bill in one of the few displays of bipartisanship on a major piece of legislation in years.

If the Senate bill's provisions were to make it into law, they would be the most substantial overhaul of immigration law in two decades. The key architects of the bill, Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, hailed the bipartisan coalition for withstanding a slew of amendments intended to sink the legislation.

The bill was also praised by some immigrant advocacy groups, the Roman Catholic Church and business leaders, who worked to ensure its passage. And Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, described the vote as "a success for the American people" as well as for the immigrants "who hope to participate someday in that American dream."

Mr. Bush issued a statement praising the Senate for its vote and the House for passing an earlier immigration bill that he said "began a national dialogue." He urged both chambers to work together to pass a bill that he could sign into law.

But with Republicans deeply divided over immigration, the bill's future remains in doubt, reflecting the fluid politics of the issue in a Congressional election year. House conservatives, who passed a border security bill in December, vowed to thwart any deal that includes a central provision of the Senate bill: its call to give most illegal immigrants a chance to become citizens if they meet certain conditions.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House majority leader, said on Thursday that he was hopeful that the Senate and House could reach a compromise. But when asked whether that compromise might include a guest worker program, he said he did not know.

The House bill did not include a guest worker or legalization plan.

"This is a very difficult issue," Mr. Boehner said, adding, "I don't underestimate the difficulty of the House and Senate trying to come together in an agreement."

Conservatives in the House denounced the bill for legalizing illegal immigrants and creating a guest worker program that would admit 200,000 foreign workers each year. Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona, called it an amnesty for lawbreakers and "a nonstarter."

But some Republicans in the House said that the ground seemed to be shifting, if only slightly.

They pointed to Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, the leader of the conservative caucus in the House, who proposed a bill this week that would allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, though not permanent residents or citizens.

They also said that the effort to reach a compromise could benefit from a strong push for a deal by Mr. Bush. And they noted the sizeable numbers of Republicans, including Mr. Frist, who offered vigorous support for the Senate legislation.

All of those developments, they said, might provide enough political cover for Republicans facing midterm elections in the fall to sign on to a plan that might include at least a temporary worker program.

Representative Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who supports legalizing illegal immigrants, said that a week ago he was betting that the House and the Senate might not even agree to a meeting. On Thursday, he described the chances of a House-Senate compromise bill as "50-50."

Representative Peter T. King of New York, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said he also thought there was significant support for a temporary worker program. "A good number of Republicans who are opposed to legalization are willing to support guest workers," Mr. King said.

But supporters of the Senate legislation said they hoped to keep their central principles intact. Democrats said they would not support legislation that did not place most of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship.

Under the legislation, illegal immigrants who have lived in the United States for five years or more, about seven million people, would eventually be granted citizenship if they remained employed, passed background checks, paid fines and back taxes, and enrolled in English classes.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here two to five years, about three million people, would have to leave the country briefly and receive a temporary work visa before returning, as a guest worker. Over time, they would be allowed to apply for permanent residency and ultimately citizenship.

Illegal immigrants who have been here less than two years, about one million people, would be required to leave the country altogether. They could apply for the guest worker program, but they would not be guaranteed acceptance in it.

Some immigrant groups criticize the plan for leaving out illegal immigrants who have been here for less than two years. Others praise the legislation, but not without qualms.

"It means there is real hope that we will have immigration reform that will legalize millions of people who are here," said Cecilia Muñoz, a vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group. "But we still have some real reservations."

Border Fight Divides G.O.P. (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The negotiations between the White House and Congress that will follow the Senate's passage on Thursday of an immigration bill could decide not just how the nation confronts illegal immigration but also what strain of conservatism the Republican Party carries into the midterm elections and beyond.

Will it be the compassionate brand Mr. Bush considers crucial to the party's future, in this case by signaling support for a provision in the Senate bill that would give most illegal immigrants an opportunity to become legal? Or will it be the more doctrinaire variety embraced by much of Mr. Bush's party in the House, one that shuns anything that smacks of amnesty for illegal immigrants and seeks to criminalize them further?

The 62-to-36 vote in the Senate was a victory for a fragile bipartisan coalition. [Page A19.]

It will now be challenged in negotiations with the House. While the Senate bill calls for tougher border security, the establishment of a guest worker program and a plan to allow millions of illegal immigrants a chance to become citizens if they meet certain conditions, the House bill is focused on border control.

As on several issues, especially the increase in federal spending under Mr. Bush, immigration has shown Republicans to be struggling to define what they stand for.

Since Mr. Bush's influence among Republicans has ebbed with his poll numbers, the outcome of the intraparty battle rests in large part with the House leadership, especially the speaker, J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and the new majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio. They have kept their options open, but neither has shown enthusiasm for moving substantially toward the Senate position.

Some well-known Republicans came out in support of a comprehensive plan, and argued that progress was possible. But it does not help the prospects for a deal that relations between the administration and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill are especially chilly at the moment because of the showdown about whether the Justice Department overstepped constitutional bounds over the weekend by raiding the office of a member of Congress.

Mr. Bush has made clear that he wants to sign an immigration bill this year, and his ability to pull his fractured party together on the issue may be the starkest test yet of whether he has enough remaining strength to drive any agenda at all for the remainder of his second term.

Mr. Hastert has indicated he will go only so far for the president. He has expressed some openness to Mr. Bush's guest worker proposals, but has more often emphasized enforcement against illegal immigrants and their employers, and securing the border, as top priorities.

That Mr. Bush has chosen to put so much capital behind an issue so divisive within his own party — and during an election year in which Republican prospects seem particularly grim — has bewildered some conservatives.

"Clearly, Bush is not in tune with where I think the bulk of the Republican Party is today," said Bruce Bartlett, a conservative critic of the president who worked for Mr. Bush's father's administration and that of Ronald Reagan. "He's getting hammered on a lot of the talk-radio shows, and I kind of wonder what the motivation was."

Mr. Bartlett said he could only surmise that the issue was so close to Mr. Bush's heart that he was willing to risk further division within his party to see his plan, or some close version of it, become law.

Mr. Bush's aides and allies are only too happy to agree that the president's personal conviction is at play.

They clearly see a chance to show the president as leading on principle.

"He's got to lead his country and the party in a direction he thinks is right," Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, said. But some allies have argued in interviews that Republicans who are pushing solely to criminalize illegal workers fail to understand that Mr. Bush's approach will broaden the party and make it more appealing to Hispanic voters.

"The party can't be a dominant party without reaching out to minority communities, especially Latinos," said Matthew Dowd, Mr. Bush's chief strategist in the 2004 campaign, who has also worked for Democrats.

But Mr. Dowd and others acknowledge that the president and Congress will have to proceed carefully as they try to craft an immigration overhaul that legalizes a foreign work force, which business leaders want badly, even as it strictly enforces the law and seals the border.

Some Republicans suggest that the solution is to jettison the citizenship provisions of the Senate bill, but retain its guest worker program, which was the focus of Mr. Bush's original proposal. But it is not clear that the Senate would accept such a deal.

"If we have the right mix of border security and a guest worker or temporary worker program," said Ed Gillespie, a Republican lobbyist who is a close White House ally, "we can continue to hold rank-and-file conservative Republicans, as well as continue to gain votes with Hispanics as we have in the past two cycles."

Aides to Mr. Bush liken their strategy to that of arms negotiators during the cold war: by first bringing the two sides together on matters of agreement and then moving onto the issues that divide them.

But as of now all indications are that once the negotiators move from the border security measures that both sides can support to guest worker and citizenship provisions that conservative House members oppose, they will hit a wall.

And it is unclear how much Mr. Bush, with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, will be able to prevail upon hard-liners who face tough campaigns this fall. Though Mr. Bush's allies argue that those most vocally opposed to anything beyond border security are in the minority of the party — and indeed the country — they matter especially in elections. And they are angry.

"He's facing an open rebellion," said Richard A. Viguerie, a conservative direct-mail veteran and one of those openly rebelling. "And he's determined to force something down the throats of the conservatives that's going to cause them to abandon him in droves in 2006."

With so many in the House agreeing with Mr. Viguerie's view, it is difficult to handicap whether the president will get a comprehensive immigration law before fall. That possibility has prompted a frenetic round of discussions among Republicans about whether it would be best to put the House-Senate negotiations off until after the elections.

There is no clear consensus about how to proceed, but few argue that delay would be good for Mr. Bush, who badly needs a victory right now.

"If he can bring this one off, it won't necessarily save his presidency," said William A. Galston, a former adviser to President Bill Clinton who is now a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research organization. "But if he doesn't, I think he loses everything except the title of the office."

Senate Passes Sweeping Bill On Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Thursday approved a sweeping bill that would upgrade border security and offer a path to citizenship to most illegal immigrants in the U.S., setting up a major — and probably bitter — confrontation over revamping immigration policy.

The bill passed 62 to 36, moving Congress a significant step closer to the first overhaul of immigration law since 1986.

But key differences between the Senate measure and a bill the House passed late last year mean that the legislation's final contours — if an agreement can even be reached — remain uncertain.

The effort to reach a compromise, strongly endorsed by President Bush, now rests with House and Senate negotiators who will conduct their talks behind closed doors.

Staunch opposition to the Senate bill from House conservatives is a key hurdle to an accord. They view any provisions that would permit illegal immigrants to become citizens as a reward for criminal activity.

Still, passage of the Senate bill represents a victory for Bush, who began a push for a broad overhaul of immigration policy with a speech in January 2004. His proposals sparked an extended debate about border security, the role of immigrants in American life and how best to deal with the estimated 12 million people who are in the country illegally.

For many lawmakers, the challenge in rewriting immigration laws has been to find a middle ground between recognizing the nation's heritage as a nation of immigrants and planning for its future in an uncertain age of terrorism.

Resolving the immigration issue in a comprehensive way "is a national security issue," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the leaders of the bipartisan coalition that shepherded the Senate bill to passage.

Referring to the path to citizenship that the bill would create for illegal immigrants, McCain said: "Some Americans believe we must find all these millions, round them up and send them back. I don't know how you do that. I don't know why you would want to."

But some conservative senators roundly condemned the legalization provisions.

"This bill is going to make the problem of illegal immigrants much worse," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.), arguing that the legalization measures would simply draw more people across the border.

Like many of the Senate bill's opponents, Vitter said Congress needed to produce a measure that dealt solely with beefed-up security at the nation's borders and stricter enforcement of immigration law in the workplace.

The House bill adheres to that course.

The Senate roll call on its bill illustrated the GOP divide on the issue: 23 Republicans, 38 Democrats and one independent voted for the legislation; 32 Republicans and four Democrats opposed it.

California's senators, Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, supported the bill.

Immediately after the vote, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) offered his odds on the prospects for a compromise during the negotiations ahead.

"I want to warn people, it is a 50-50 proposition to get a bill on the president's desk," he said. "I would like to see us improve those odds, and I think we will."

As Senate passage neared this week, House Republican leaders signaled a willingness to consider a guest worker program. But they continued to draw the line at legalization measures.

Despite that position, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) insisted he was optimistic a compromise could be reached — with the help of Bush.

"I believe we can do it," he said. "The time has come for very active participation by the president."

A statement by Bush on Thursday night underscored his backing for the broader Senate approach rather than the narrower House version.

"An effective immigration reform bill will protect our borders, hold employers to account for the workers they hire, create a temporary worker program … address the issue of the millions of illegal immigrants already in our country and honor America's great tradition of the melting pot," he said.

The Senate legislation resembles the outline that Bush laid out in his 2004 speech.

Border security would get a boost, with 14,000 Border Patrol agents added to the existing 11,300 over the next five years. Extra detention facilities would be built to hold the illegal immigrants caught at the border. And the bill authorizes the construction of 370 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico boundary.

Employers would have to start using an electronic verification system within 18 months to ensure that all new hires are legal. Companies that hired illegal workers would be fined up to $20,000, and repeat offenders would draw prison terms.

In its most controversial section, the bill creates a three-tiered system to determine the future status of illegal immigrants.

Those who arrived in the U.S. in the last two years would be required to leave. Those in the country more than two years but less than five years would have to leave the country and get a work visa before reentering, after which they could work toward legal status.

Those in the U.S. longer than five years could stay and eventually apply for permanent legal status, a step toward citizenship, as long as they paid back taxes and fines of at least $3,250, continued working, and learned English and U.S. civics.

A guest worker program would allow foreign workers to enter the country in the future and provide a way for them to gain permanent legal status.

The bill also declares English the national language.

In contrast, the House bill has no provisions for a guest worker program or for accommodating illegal immigrants. Instead, it would criminalize illegal presence in the U.S., a status that is now a civil offense.

DOJ_NMG_0030001

It also provides for a 700-mile barrier along the U.S.-Mexico border and would require that employers verify the status of all employees within six years.

It is not clear how quickly the House and Senate will begin talks over a joint bill.

Mexican President Vicente Fox, visiting Sacramento, praised the Senate's approval of the immigration bill as a "monumental step forward."

"It is a moment that millions of families have been hoping for; this is the moment that millions of people have been working for," Fox said in a speech to the California Legislature.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that by late Thursday, he and Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) would finish appointing senators to negotiate with House members in what is known as a conference committee. Frist added that he would urge the House to appoint negotiators "as soon as possible."

But at least some House Republicans argue that it might be better not to negotiate at all.

"There might be some strategic advantage in not calling the conference and just asking the Senate to pass the House bill as written," said Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.). "My fear is that the bills are so far apart that it may dissolve into chaos if conference is called."

Other House Republicans say the party will look incompetent if Congress doesn't send a bill to the president before November's midterm elections.

"We are better off with any bill than no bill," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.). "This is our best shot, and for both political and strategic reasons, we're best off getting this done."

"The wrath of the voters will be upon" the GOP majorities in the House and Senate if no bill is produced, added Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.). "I think you have to have something."

Scores of House Republicans, however, have stressed that they cannot support any form of legalization for those in the country illegally.

"I'm not opposed to a guest worker status. I'm opposed to illegals becoming legal," said Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.). "I think it's better to have no bill than a bad bill," which he described as "any bill that has legalization."

Some Senate conservatives view negotiations with the House as a chance to correct the flaws they see in the bill. These senators oppose the legalization measures, and some prefer the House approach of addressing only security and enforcement issues.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who will take part in the conference talks, expressed conservatives' hopes for the closed-door sessions.

"We'll have the ability to craft something, in effect, from scratch," he said.

But in another example of the complicated task that faces the negotiators, a proposed compromise that lacks legalization provisions probably would spur opposition from most Senate Democrats and doom its chances in that chamber.

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds in Washington and Peter Nicholas in Sacramento contributed to this report.

Requires those in the country less than two years to leave.

House bill: Contains no provisions providing a path to legal residency or citizenship for illegal immigrants.

Makes illegal presence in the country a felony.

Issue: Temporary worker program

Senate bill: Creates a special guest worker program for an estimated 1.5 million farm workers, who could also earn legal permanent residency.

House bill: Contains no new temporary guest worker program.

Increases maximum fines on employers for hiring illegal workers to $20,000 for each worker and imposes jail time for repeat offenders.

House bill: Increases maximum fines for employers of illegal workers from the current $10,000 to $40,000 per violation and establishes prison sentences of up to 30 years for repeat offenders.

Beginning in six years, all employers would have to use a database to verify Social Security numbers of all employees.

Next steps

The Senate and House have passed immigration bills with key differences, so a committee with members from each chamber is expected to try to reach a compromise.

· House and Senate negotiators may hold public sessions, but the real work is usually conducted behind closed doors.

· Talks could begin shortly and wrap up quickly, or they could last for months.

· An unusually large Senate contingent of 14 Republicans and 12 Democrats is expected, probably led by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

· The makeup of the House team is not yet known, though it is expected to be led by House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.).

· If negotiators fail to reconcile their differences, the legislation dies.

· A compromise would go to the floor of both houses for a vote. Usually, but not always, the compromise is approved and sent to the president, whose signature makes it law.

Senate Approves Immigration Bill (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Senate yesterday approved legislation that would trigger the biggest changes to U.S. immigration policy in decades, by strengthening border security, establishing a guest-worker program, and providing the means for millions of illegal immigrants to stay in the country and possibly become citizens.

The product of a tenuous bipartisan coalition that faced tough conservative opposition, the measure calls for 370 miles of triple-layer fencing along the Mexican border, a complicated three-tiered system for determining who can stay and who must leave the country, and more jail cells for those awaiting deportation. It would declare English the country's national language, a gesture that many advocates found insulting but accepted in hopes of helping millions of undocumented workers achieve legal status.

But even as the Senate approved the bill 62 to 36, the measure's backers acknowledged that it faces formidable opposition in the House, whose political dynamics differ markedly from the Senate's. Numerous House members insist that Congress do nothing about legalizing immigrants until illegal border crossings are dramatically reduced.

Democrats and Republicans alike said a House-Senate accord will be nearly impossible without the vigorous involvement of President Bush, who favors an approach similar to the Senate's. The White House has already begun lobbying efforts, but it faces resistance from more than 200 House Republicans seeking reelection this fall, many in districts where the sentiment against illegal immigrants runs high.

"This is the most far-reaching immigration reform in our history," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a leader of the Senate effort, said of the bill's passage. "It is a comprehensive and realistic attempt to solve the real-world problems that have festered for too long in our broken immigration system."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Kennedy's partner in the effort, said more than 11 million illegal immigrants "harvest our crops, tend our gardens, work in our restaurants and clean our houses" and added: "Some Americans believe we must find all these millions, round them up and send them back to the countries they came from. I don't know how you do that. And I don't know why you would want to."

But opponents called the bill fundamentally flawed and predicted that it will be completely rewritten by a House-Senate conference committee, which will try next month to craft a compromise version acceptable to both chambers.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) called the measure "a bad bill" that "puts more emphasis on amnesty than on border security."

The House in December passed a bill that dealt only with border and workplace enforcement. It would make illegal presence in the country a felony.

After mass demonstrations by immigrants in several cities and complaints by Roman Catholic officials -- plus Bush's recent televised speech calling for a comprehensive approach that would include pathways to legal status for undocumented aliens -- House GOP leaders signaled a willingness to modify their bill. But they said the Senate bill goes too far and would amount to "amnesty," a term that many dispute, for millions of foreigners who broke the law and jumped ahead of would-be immigrants waiting for legal entry.

A possible compromise, some lawmakers said, might start with tighter border security and then -- if there is measurable evidence the crackdown is working -- proceed to a mechanism for some illegal immigrants to achieve legal status. But lawmakers said it is far from clear whether such a plan would appeal to enough House Republicans, and enough Senate Democrats, to win passage in either chamber.

Further complicating matters is Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's policy of allowing votes on major issues only if most of the House's 231 Republicans back them. Theoretically, a compromise immigration bill could be supported by most of the House's Democrats and nearly half of its Republicans -- making up a clear majority in the 435-seat chamber -- only to be thwarted by Hastert's dictum.

If the Senate had embraced the same policy, the bill would have died. Twenty-three Republicans, 38 Democrats and one independent voted for the immigration bill; 32 Republicans and four Democrats voted against it. Sens. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) voted for the bill. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) voted against it.

The Senate bill calls for 1,000 new Border Patrol agents and thousands of National Guard troops to support them, plus 500 miles of vehicle barriers on the Mexican border. Several such provisions, added during two weeks of debate, were designed to appease Senate conservatives who threatened to kill the entire bill. But senators repeatedly rejected conservatives' bids to strip or weaken the provisions allowing legal status for undocumented immigrants.

The Senate bill would provide 200,000 new temporary guest-worker visas a year, while creating a separate guest-worker program for immigrant farm laborers. Its key compromise would divide the nation's estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants into three groups.

Those here five years or longer would be allowed to stay and apply for citizenship, provided they pay back taxes, learn English and have no serious criminal records. Those here two to five years would eventually have to return to another country and apply for a green card, which could allow their immediate return. The roughly 2 million immigrants who have been in the United States illegally for less than two years would be ordered home and be subject to deportation. Illegal immigrants convicted of a felony or three misdemeanors would be deported no matter how long they have been in the United States.

Critics on the left and right call the bill -- and especially its three-tiered formulation -- unworkable. The notion of apprehending and deporting 2 million illegal immigrants who have been in the United States less than two years defies logic, some say. They add that the task would be six times as great under the House proposal to empty the nation of all illegal immigrants.

Immigrants who have lived largely underground for more than five years might have trouble proving their length of stay, advocacy groups say, while those who arrived less than five years ago might try to convince officials that they have been here longer. The bill would obligate immigrants to prove their length of residency, and fraudulent claims would be a crime.

Those claiming five years of residency or more would have to prove they were employed for at least three years to qualify for a citizenship application.

Senate Passes Sweeping Immigration Reform Bill (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress' struggle to overhaul America's immigration law heads next into House-Senate negotiations that could last all summer. They will test President Bush's ability to forge a compromise on an emotional issue in an election year.

As expected, the Senate voted 62-36 Thursday to pass landmark legislation that would put nearly two-thirds of the nation's illegal immigrants on track to eventual U.S. citizenship and create a guest-worker program to give U.S. employers a steady supply of low-skilled foreign labor.

The Senate bill embraces the basic concepts of Bush's call for comprehensive immigration reform and also includes toughened enforcement provisions, increased penalties on employers who hire illegal workers and a combination of fences, technology and increased manpower to help plug the porous U.S.-Mexico border.

But the volatile debate over immigration next moves to a House-Senate negotiating committee, where lawmakers will be hard pressed to find middle ground between the multilayered Senate bill and a House measure that focuses more on expanded enforcement.

Leaders on both sides say the ultimate outcome is impossible to predict.

Backers of the bipartisan Senate plan are calling on Bush to use the full force of the White House to forge a compromise, but acknowledge that the president is weakened by declining polls and his growing lame-duck status.

"After tonight, whether this bipartisan balance still survives or not really rests in the hands of the man at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

House Republican leaders denounce the Senate's legalization provisions as "amnesty" and remain adamantly opposed to the Senate bill. Some declared it all but dead on arrival.

"The nation needs legislation that will secure our borders and provide meaningful immigration reform - this bill completely misses that mark," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., who opposed it. He vowed to rewrite the Senate bill as a member of the House-Senate conference.

Hailed as the most sweeping immigration bill in two decades, the Senate measure emerged from weeks of rancorous deliberations that paralleled massive demonstrations by immigrants and their supporters across the country. The bill was co-sponsored by Sens. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb.

As many as 12 million illegal immigrants, more than half from Mexico, have entered the United States to find work. Their presence has provoked an angry response from many U.S. citizens, who say illegal immigrants cause a multibillion-dollar drain on social services and unfairly wrest jobs from U.S. workers.

Perhaps the Senate bill's most controversial provision is a three-tiered approach to illegal immigrants. The nearly 7 million who've been in the United States five years or longer would be allowed to stay. They could become permanent legal residents in six years and U.S. citizens five years later by paying $3,250 in fees, learning English, paying back taxes and passing background checks.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here between two to five years - estimated at nearly 3 million - would be eligible for "deferred mandatory departure," allowing them to stay and work for another three years.

They would be required to leave after three years, but could return as participants in the guest-worker program. A so-called "touch-back" provision would enable them to satisfy the requirement by briefing exiting the country and returning through a U.S. port of entry. They would also be eligible to apply for "green cards" to become permanent legal residents.

The more than 1.5 million immigrants who've been here less than two years would be required to return to their native countries.

Martinez and Hagel crafted the three-tiered structure as a compromise to draw wavering Republicans, but even proponents acknowledge that it could be difficult to administer.

Another lightning-rod provision sets up the H2-C guest worker program. It would allow U.S. employers to hire foreign workers for low-skill jobs, largely in hotels, restaurants, construction and landscaping, if they're unable to find American workers for those positions. The workers would hold temporary visas for up to six years and would be eligible to apply for green cards.

Bush has urged Congress to enact a guest-worker program since he first began pushing his proposed immigration overhaul in January 2004, backed by a broad coalition of business groups seeking foreign workers to fill what they say is a chronic labor shortage. But the concept encountered stiff resistance in Congress.

The Senate bill originally called for up to 400,000 guest workers a year, but the ceiling was lowered to 200,000 through an amendment co-sponsored by Sens. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

The bill also creates a five-year pilot program that would offer eventual legal status for up to 1.5 million undocumented farm workers. Another provision, known as the DREAM Act, would put illegal immigrant children who have graduated from high school on track to legalization if they complete college or join the military.

Embraced by the Senate's Republican and Democratic leadership, and supported by a bipartisan coalition, the bill withstood most major challenges during nine days of debate. But it was refined to include two elements to boost conservative appeal: 370 miles of fencing along the Southwest border and a declaration of English as the national language.

Its enforcement provisions are similar to those in the House bill, including an additional 14,000 Border Patrol agents over five years, a crackdown on smugglers and document forgers, and an array of new border technology such as unmanned aerial vehicles, sensors and cameras. The House bill proposes a 700-mile border fence.

The bills include differing versions of an electronic verification system that employers would use to confirm the eligibility of job applicants. The House bill makes illegal presence a felony, but House leaders have signaled a willingness to reduce it to a misdemeanor. The Senate bill retains current law: a criminal misdemeanor for illegal entry and a civil violation for overstaying visas.

The House-Senate conference committee may begin work shortly after Congress returns from a week-long recess in early June. It will be under intense pressure from all sides.

Although pro-immigration groups support the basic thrust of the Senate bill, they'll press to increase the cap on the guest-worker program and eliminate the three-tiered treatment of illegal immigrants. Frank Sharry, the executive director of the National Immigration Forum, described the bill as "a rough draft."

Conversely, advocates of a get-tough stance toward illegal immigrants are calling on House conferees to stand firm against any movement toward the Senate bill. "There's an entrenched wall of opposition in the House led by people who know better," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform. He denounced the Senate measure as a "disaster" and "a pig of a bill."

Bush dispatched White House adviser Karl Rove to Capitol Hill this week to try to soften opposition among House members, apparently with negligible results. The president has elevated his profile on the issue in recent weeks, including giving an Oval Office address in which he announced plans to send the National Guard to the Southwest border to assist Border Patrol agents.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill; GOP Advocate Of Crackdown Pledges 'battle' (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — A bipartisan coalition held together to give President Bush the comprehensive immigration bill that he says he wants. But the president may have to shatter his own party's unity in the House of Representatives if the bill is to become law.

"The ball is in the president's court," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Thursday as the Senate approved the first rewrite of immigration law in 20 years with mostly Democratic and independent support.

The 62-36 vote capped a month-long debate punctuated by lawmakers' stories of their own immigrant roots. In the end, 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent supported the bill.

The Senate bill would add staff and technology at the nation's borders, expand opportunities for foreigners to work in the USA and give millions of illegal immigrants who have lived here since Jan. 7, 2004, a chance to become citizens.

"It strengthens our security and reflects our humanity," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., an architect of the bill. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., opposed the bill, calling it "a tremendous budget-buster."

The legislation faces strong opposition in the House, which passed a bill in December that would make illegal immigration a felony, increase penalties for hiring undocumented workers and beef up border security.

Some backers of the House bill say the Senate version awards amnesty to lawbreakers. They promised to take a tough line in the House-Senate conference committee that will hammer out differences between the bills.

"I'd rather see no bill than a bad bill," said Rep. Pete King, R-N.Y. "An overwhelming majority of House Republicans are opposed to legalization."

DOJ_NMG_0030006

Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who has become a national spokesman for cracking down on illegal immigration, sounded a defiant note. “The battle has been joined,” he said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., a supporter of the Senate immigration bill, joined Democratic leaders in calling on Bush to overcome GOP opposition. “We are looking forward to the president's more intensive participation,” he said.

Specter and House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., have said they want to begin ironing out differences. “The public deserves to know where their elected representatives stand on this before the elections in November,” Sensenbrenner said.

Specter warned that Republicans, who control the House and Senate, could pay a price if Congress fails to reach a compromise. “There is an election in November, and our leadership position as Republicans is on the line,” he said.

That could put Bush in the politically awkward position of relying on Democrats to produce an immigration bill. Of the Senate's 55 Republicans, 32 voted against the bill containing many elements the president favors. The House bill was supported by 203 of the chamber's 231 Republicans.

Democrats and Republicans said Bush will have to flex his muscle to get a bill he can sign. “His biggest work is ahead of him,” said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

House GOP Expected To Yield On Legislation (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The House is the only obstacle that stands between President Bush and a comprehensive immigration bill, and the White House yesterday predicted that the chamber's Republicans will give in.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said House Republicans will want to pass border security badly enough to back down from the fight against what many consider amnesty for illegal aliens, knowing there is a "heavier political price for failing to act, than for acting."

"If you are a Republican member of Congress and you're concerned about illegal immigration, do you really want to say to your constituents: You know, I'm going to wait a couple of years before I take up the issue of people knowingly hiring illegal aliens, I want to wait a couple of years before I go ahead and try to identify who the illegal aliens are, I want to wait a couple of years before I start grappling with what to do with these 11 or 12 million people who are here illegally," Mr. Snow said.

A president always has the most influence in the backroom House-Senate negotiations, but yesterday, Mr. Snow wouldn't tip the administration's hand when asked how they would approach the conference committee.

"At this point, let's get a bill through the Senate, let's figure out where the fault lines are," he said.

But those fault lines between the House and Senate are fairly public, deep and fundamental.

The House passed a bill in December that stepped up border enforcement and interior enforcement, enabled local law enforcement in border areas to help enforce immigration laws and cracked down on employers who hired illegal aliens.

The Senate included some of those measures but put far more emphasis on future foreign workers and a pathway to citizenship for the current estimated 10 million to 12 million illegal aliens, a move House Republicans consider an unacceptable amnesty.

"If both parties in a negotiation are running the other way, they will never meet in any middle," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

"The question for the House is some agreement to do more than just border security. The question for the Senate is: Are they willing to be less generous than the Senate bill? Without a yes on both of those two questions, there's no point in the conference going forward."

From the House side, Majority Leader John A. Boehner acknowledged there were "two very separate and distinct directions that we're going," but said he still thinks they can reach an agreement with the Senate.

Still, the Ohio Republican said, the House position is clear.

"You can't control the problem without first strengthening the borders and beginning to enforce the laws," said Mr. Boehner.

Mr. Bush last week called the Senate measure "a good immigration bill." He also recently reversed his administration's earlier position and now endorses the idea of a path to citizenship for some illegal aliens.

He said any final bill must include border security, employer sanctions, a temporary-worker program and a way to handle the current illegal alien population.

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, said the House has some areas in common with the Senate, including provisions to build more fencing -- 370 miles in the Senate version and 698 miles in the House version.

Mr. Kingston said House Republicans are willing to accept a temporary-worker program for future workers but, in exchange, would have to win agreement on delaying it until the borders are secure and adopting some sort of biometric identification card.

"We think probably we might be able to do something on a temporary visa basis, but where we will have a line in the sand is on the pathway to citizenship, because pathway to citizenship, by almost any angle, leads to somebody's definition of amnesty," he said. "We don't want 'Republican' and 'amnesty' in the same sentence."

He estimated that there are 180 members of the House "just adamant about no amnesty."

Although Mr. Bush has generally favored the Senate's approach and has recently said some illegal aliens can gain citizenship, he has been insistent that future foreign workers not have a path to citizenship. That sets up a major conflict with the Senate, where the bill that passed yesterday does grant that right to future workers.

Mr. Bush did win an unlikely ally in former President Jimmy Carter, a Democrat, who this week said Mr. Bush's efforts to create a right to citizenship have been "quite admirable."

Immigration: Now The Hard Part (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - As hard as it was in the Senate to pull together a winning coalition on immigration reform, getting to "yes" with the House - in a form that can again pass both bodies - will be even tougher.

But it's not impossible. Even before the Senate completed work on its immigration bill Thursday, House Republicans were signaling an openness to compromise, as long as the final legislation maintains a focus on border security.

"I believe it is resolvable, and we will be successful in putting an illegal immigration bill on the president's desk," said House majority leader John Boehner, before the Senate vote Thursday. But he cautioned: "This is going to be a delicate negotiation between the House and Senate."

On some fronts, the way forward is obvious. Both the House and Senate bills include measures to improve border security. The House bill proposes building 700 miles of fence along the border with Mexico; the Senate bill, 370 miles.

But the guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for millions of people in the US illegally are sticking points for many House Republicans. Their position is that any form of amnesty is unacceptable.

"We shouldn't be selling American citizenship," Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R) of Wisconsin said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation." "What the Senate is doing is it is providing illegal immigrants benefits that we don't give to legal immigrants, and that's dead wrong."

Moreover, House leaders say that unless a compromise plan has the support of most House Republicans, it will not be allowed to come to a vote - even if the members of the conference committee agree on a compromise.

"The Speaker will not bring a conference report on immigration to the floor unless it has the support of a majority of the majority," says Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert.

GOP leaders are hopeful that threshhold can be met, he adds. "This will be a difficult conference, but the Speaker believes we can get to a balanced bill that will put border security first."

This week, President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, made his second trip to Capitol Hill to boost prospects for a compromise. While several Republicans who spoke with the press after the closed meeting said they were not convinced, others are signaling they may be interested in helping to broker a deal.

On Tuesday, Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, leader of the Republican Study Group, proposed a privately operated guest-worker plan in a talk before the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

"I agree with the president that a rational middle ground can be found between amnesty and mass deportation, but I disagree with the president that amnesty is the middle ground," he said. The solution, Representative Pence said, is to set up a system that "will encourage illegal aliens to self-deport and come back legally as guest workers." Under this plan, the federal government would license private worker-placement agencies to match willing guest workers with jobs that cannot be filled with American workers.

Meanwhile, the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group of moderate Republicans in the House and Senate, is offering to help broker a deal. Last weekend, Rep. Michael Castle (R) of Delaware and Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, both Main Street members, opened discussions on the bill.

Senate conservatives, however, are urging their House colleagues to hold the line against amnesty and for border protection.

Commenting on the Senate immigration bill, which had not been passed at press time, Sen. Rick Santorum (R) of Pennsylvania said: "This [bill] is not acceptable to me, and I hope that the House of Representatives thinks the same way. This is not what I would expect from a country of laws."

Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, already designated as a conferee who will meet with House conferees, says he remains committed to comprehensive reform and thinks it can be achieved in the conference.

"I am concerned that we still have not learned the lessons of [immigration-law overhaul in] 1986, which resulted in massive fraud and [in] the federal government refusing to provide the information needed for enforcement" of sanctions against employers who hire illegal immigrants.

The House bill, which passed in December, addresses only border protection and illegal immigration "control." Mr. Bush and a bipartisan coalition in the Senate want border control plus an expanded guest-worker program and a path to legalization for most of the 11 million people in the country illegally.

Many GOP lawmakers worry that voters in November will punish legislators who back any measure that appears to reward illegal behavior. Rep. Tom Osborne, who ran in the Nebraska Republican primary for governor, lost his bid after an ad campaign criticized his support for in-state tuition for children of illegal immigrants.

More registered Republicans (19 percent) cite immigration as the most important national problem than cite any other issue, according to a Pew Hispanic Center poll this month. Only 6 percent of Demo-crats cite it as the most important problem.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill Overhaul (AP)

By David Espo

The AP, May 25, 2006

Landmark legislation to secure U.S. borders and offer millions of illegal immigrants a share of the American dream cleared the Senate on Thursday, a rare election-year reach across party lines and a triumph for President Bush.

The 62-36 vote cleared the way for arduous summertime compromise talks with the House on its immigration measure focusing on border enforcement with no guarantee of success. Republicans and Democrats said energetic participation by Bush would be critical.

"Why not say to those undocumented workers who are working the jobs that the rest of us refuse, come out from the shadows," said Arizona Republican John McCain, a key architect of the bill.

The legislation includes money to better secure the borders, provide a new guest worker program and give an eventual shot at citizenship to many of the estimated 11 million to 12 million immigrants in the country illegally.

The bill "strengthens our security and reflects our humanity," said Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., McCain's partner in the Senate compromise. "It is intended to keep out those who would harm us and welcome those who contribute to our country."

Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, both sided with supporters, a reflection of the bipartisan backing for a bill that was months in the drafting and survived several near-death experiences. In all, 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent voted for the bill, while 32 Republicans opposed and four Democrats opposed it.

Conservative critics attacked the legislation to the end after trying unsuccessfully to pull it apart with amendments.

"This bill will not secure our borders," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), R-Ala., one of the most persistent critics.

"This is amnesty," added David Vitter, R-La., who tried last week to strip out provisions relating to citizenship.

Not so, said Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in a rebuttal to weeks of debate. "They have to pay a fine. They have to undergo a criminal background check. They have to pay back taxes, they have to learn English and they have to go to the back of the line," he said, referring to illegal immigrants who would apply for citizenship.

Still, Sessions, Vitter, John Cornyn of Texas and others echoed a view widely held among House Republicans, many of whom have vigorously denounced the Senate bill as well as Bush's call for a "comprehensive approach" to the issue.

That portended difficult compromise talks in the shadow of midterm elections, at a time when Bush's poll ratings are low, congressional Republicans are concerned and Democrats are increasingly optimistic about their chances in November.

Lawmakers in both parties pledged strenuous efforts to reach a compromise. Specter said that Republicans, as the party in power in Congress and the White House, had a special burden to produce a compromise. "I believe the president will put a heavy shoulder to the wheel," he added.

Internal GOP divisions will complicate compromise talks. In the Senate alone, four members of the leadership voted against the bill, including Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairman of the party's senatorial committee.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, issued a statement that said, "we owe it to the American people to seek common ground on responsible solutions, while always stressing our most important priority is to secure our borders and stop illegal immigration."

The House bill, which passed on a largely party-line vote last year, is generally limited to border enforcement. It would make all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and it contains no provision for either a new temporary worker program or citizenship for men, women and children in the country unlawfully.

In contrast, the Senate bill would mark the most far-reaching changes in immigration law in two decades.

Built on compromise after painstaking compromise, it was designed to appeal to conservatives and others seeking tougher border enforcement; business interests eager for a steady supply of legal, low-wage labor; unions seeking enhanced protections for migrants who often toil in seasonal work the fields and Hispanics who are on the cusp of greater political power and determined to win a change in legal status for millions of illegal immigrants.

That last group — Hispanics — comprises the fastest growing segment of the electorate, and millions made their feelings clear in street demonstrations denouncing the House measure and calling for passage of a broader measure.

Bush played a prominent role in the run-up to passage. An Oval Office speech last week made explicit his support for the Senate's overall approach. A later trip to Arizona was designed to reassure conservatives about his commitment to stanching illegal immigration.

In more than a week of debate, the Senate made a series of changes in the legislation. Still, the key pillars were preserved when opponents failed to knock out the guest worker program or the citizenship provisions. A new program for 1.5 million temporary agricultural workers also survived.

To secure the borders, the measure calls for the hiring of an additional 1,000 new Border Patrol agents this year and 14,000 by 2011, and backs Bush's plan for a short-term deployment of National Guard troops to states along the Mexican Border. The bill calls for new surveillance equipment as well as the construction of 370 miles of triple-layered fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers.

The new guest worker program would admit 200,000 individuals a year. Once here, they would be permitted for the first time to petition on their own for a green card that confers legal permanent residency, a provision designed to reduce the potential for exploitation by employers.

A separate new program, a compromise between growers and unions, envisions admission of an estimated 1.5 million immigrant farm workers who may also apply for permanent residency

Even supporters of the bill conceded the three-tiered program related to illegal immigrants was complicated.

Those in the country unlawfully for five years or more would be permitted to remain, continue working and eventually apply for citizenship. They would be required to pay at least $3,250 in fines and fees, settle any back taxes and learn English.

Illegal immigrants in the country for more than two years but less than five would be required to travel to a point of entry before re-entering the United States legally and beginning a lengthy process of seeking citizenship. They would be subject to the same fines, fees and other requirements as the longer-term immigrants.

An immigrant in the country illegally for less than two years would be required to leave with no guarantee of return.

Senate Passes Immigration Bill (CHIT)

By Frank James

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate's bipartisan passage Thursday of sweeping changes in the nation's immigration laws could lead to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants. But it also created an immediate confrontation with the House's enforcement-only approach and will offer a test of President Bush's ability to lead on an issue that has deeply divided the nation.

The Senate, on a 62-36 vote, approved a sweeping measure along the lines favored by Bush that provides a path to legalization for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S. and also would beef up security along the porous border with Mexico.

But strong conservative opposition to the citizenship provisions in the Senate bill, which some critics describe as an "amnesty" for illegal immigrants, and the powerful emotions evoked by the issue, make the legislation's future uncertain, especially in an election year.

Many voters oppose granting eventual citizenship to people who entered the U.S. illegally, as provided for in the Senate bill and supported by the president.

House Republicans have sharply criticized the Senate bill and its accommodation of illegal immigrants. Thus it was not immediately clear how the Senate bill could be reconciled with the tougher House version, which lacks provisions to provide a way for undocumented immigrants to gain legal status.

Despite the difficulties they face, senators who supported the bill said they were optimistic that Congress could produce immigration legislation this year that the president could sign.

What's more, they also said it proved that the Congress could work toward compromise legislation on a controversial issue, even in the often poisonous, partisan atmosphere that exists in Washington.

"This is truly landmark legislation produced by a big-league team," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee that wrote the legislation.

"The next step is going to be the conference [with the House] and I believe we can do it," Specter said. "We're going to work as hard to get a bill to the president's desk as we did to get a bill passed today. And I predict success."

The troubles ahead were almost immediately apparent, however. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) issued a non-committal statement that didn't even acknowledge that the Senate bill had any acceptable provisions and instead espoused the immigration priorities sought by the House majority in passing its measure in December.

"The American people expect Congress to secure our borders and stop the flood of illegal immigration," Boehner's statement said, "and House Republicans responded by passing a strong border security bill that re-establishes basic respect for our immigration laws.

"Now that the Senate has passed a bill, we owe it to the American people to seek common ground on responsible solutions, while always stressing our most important priority is to secure our borders and stop illegal immigration," he said.

Boehner also urged House Democrats to stop advocating "troubling policies that encourage open borders and invite more illegal immigrants into our country" and to join House Republicans in making U.S. borders more secure.

That criticism paralleled comments House conservatives have made about the Senate legislation, which they have said would cause more illegal border crossings because of its provisions creating a guest worker program and eventual citizenship.

The hard-line House stance led both Republican and Democratic senators to say after they passed their bill that Bush's leadership was essential to realize their hopes of enacting a bill this year.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said, "If comprehensive immigration reform is to succeed, the Senate conferees [with the House] must be resolute in their commitment to what we have achieved tonight in the Senate. And we must turn to the president and ask him to share our commitment for comprehensive immigration reform."

The president, in a statement issued by the White House, said he looked forward to working with both houses to "to produce a bill for me to sign into law."

For his part, Specter said, "Now the time has come for very active participation by the president. "And I believe the president will put a very heavy shoulder to the wheel."

Bush, in a prime-time speech this month, outlined an approach to immigration reform that was very similar to the Senate bill. He called for a guest-worker program as well as a path to citizenship.

He also called for stronger border enforcement and said he would send 6,000 National Guard troops to states along the U.S. border with Mexico to augment the Border Patrol.

As senators debated the measure this month, the bill took on a harder edge. That was a practical response to the reality that if the Senate hoped to win over enough support in the House, the senators needed to narrow the distance between the two measures.

Senators also were responding to polls indicating that many Americans want stronger border enforcement.

Thus the Senate legislation includes 370 miles of triple-layered fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers along the southern border. The House bill would build a fence 700 miles long.

One of the best-known provisions of the Senate bill would make English the official national language. Under that provision, the federal government would not have to provide services and materials in languages other than English unless specific federal laws required it, such as statutes that require translators in court cases.

Despite the efforts of senators who supported the bill to make it a tougher measure, Senate opponents were not won over.

"The amnesty provisions and the fact that the enforcement provisions will not kick in immediately mean to me that this will not solve the illegal immigration problem," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) "This will, in fact, make the illegal immigration problem much bigger."

And senators who opposed the bill said they hoped their counterparts in the House would change some of the provisions in the Senate bill they found objectionable.

"I'm hopeful that the House will save us from this bill," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.).

Nonetheless, passage was a victory for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican and a 2008 presidential hopeful.

By navigating the bill through treacherous political waters, he appeared to burnish his leadership credentials and gain a major accomplishment he could campaign on.

Immigration Bill Passes Senate, Still Faces Chasm (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- By a 62 to 36 vote, the Senate passed legislation that offers eventual citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants, assures employers that hundreds of thousands of legal foreign workers will be allowed into the country every year and sets up a worker-verification system aimed at stanching the flow of illegal immigrants.

But marked differences with a House bill, deep divisions within the Republican Party and hardening public attitudes -- all in the shadow of congressional elections -- make the path for any legislation to the president's desk difficult.

Employers won key victories in the Senate bill, including measures that would more than quadruple the number of visas for skilled workers to 650,000 a year. But employers of low-skilled workers say the bill would leave them hundreds of thousands of workers short. And the measure is so complicated it may set up conditions for even more illegal immigration down the road. Even supporters warned that the Senate bill would be difficult to enforce.

"You still have the longest land border between a rich and poor country in the world," said Michael Fix, vice president of the Migration Policy Institute, a Washington research group.

Still, a month of Senate debate may have changed the political atmosphere for years to come. It has activated a huge Hispanic population that has been politically passive, but that both parties see as a potentially vast new constituency. "This community has more than once demonstrated its capacity to act when it gets mad," said Cecilia Munoz, of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group.

It also has inflamed many native-born voters who may have benefited from the goods and services low-skilled immigrants produce, but are increasingly wary of their spreading influence over U.S. culture. A largely symbolic Senate amendment making English the national language, for instance, turned into a fiery public debate.

The bill rode to an easy victory after dozens of amendments -- calling for a 370-mile border fence and steep cuts to a temporary-worker plan among other things -- brought reluctant senators on board. But those compromises also tested the support of the bill's advocates, including some business and immigrant groups that quickly denounced it. "Everyone's got problems with it," said John Gay of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a group that includes the restaurant and landscaping industries and has been a crucial supporter of immigration overhaul.

The bill next must be reconciled with a House border-security bill that passed in December without any measures for dealing with the illegal population, now estimated at about 12 million. Many House Republicans remain staunchly opposed to a central tenet of the Senate bill that would allow most of those immigrants to eventually become citizens.

"It's got to be border security first; that's just how I feel," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.).

Supporters of the Senate bill also hope to make changes during the conference. Democrats want to bring back a proposal that would allow about five million illegal immigrants who have been in the U.S. for five years or less to stay in the country while they pursue citizenship.

As it is, they either would be deported or return home before they become citizens -- a move many employers said would deprive them of at least a million workers. Immigrants who have been in the U.S. for more than five years would be allowed to remain under the bill. They could become permanent residents after six more years and citizens after 11 years.

Business lobbyists also hope to use the conference to boost the guest-worker program to 325,000 workers yearly from the 200,000 the bill now allows, and permit the number to rise further to meet labor-market demands.

But the House and Senate bills are so vastly different that there may be little room for compromise, and even less for measures that could be seen as improving the prospects of immigrants. With midterm elections approaching, there may be little incentive to tackle an issue that its opponents are labeling an amnesty for law breakers.

House leaders haven't said whom they would send into negotiations with the Senate, but they are likely to stack their team with critics of the legalization plan, while the Senate names supporters.

That could stymie a bill for this year or longer -- a huge disappointment to the bill's supporters, but a move that isn't unusual with such sweeping pieces of legislation. "If a conference isn't successful, it sets the stage for 2007" and a new Congress, said Randel Johnson, vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Senate OKs Citizenship For Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The Senate yesterday easily approved an immigration bill that allows 10 million illegal aliens to become citizens, doubles the flow of legal immigration each year and will cost U.S. taxpayers an estimated $54 billion over the next 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0030012

The leaders of both parties hailed the 62-36 passage as a historic success.

Majority Leader Bill Frist said the vote represented the "very best" of the Senate.

"This is a success for the American people," the Tennessee Republican said. "It is a success for people who hope to participate someday in that American dream."

Four Democrats -- Sens. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan -- joined 32 of the chamber's 55 Republicans, including several members of the GOP leadership, to vote against the bill. Three of the four Democrats who opposed the bill face voters in November.

Opponents said that the Senate is ignoring clear public will and that the bill would have disastrous consequences for decades to come.

"We will never solve the problem of illegal immigration by rewarding those who break our laws," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican. "We must stop illegal immigration by securing the border and creating a temporary-worker program that does not reward illegal behavior with a clear path to citizenship and voting rights."

In the moments before the vote, Mr. Frist and about a dozen senators, from both parties, tearfully congratulated one another for all their hard work in producing the legislation. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and the leading proponent of the bill, called it "the most far-reaching immigration reform in our history."

After the vote, more than a dozen giddy lawmakers from both sides of the aisle gathered before television cameras to again commend one another.

"I am so proud of the Senate," Minority Leader Harry Reid said as those around him smiled broadly. "This is the way we should legislate -- on a bipartisan basis."

As he spoke, a television screen behind him showed a live picture of the Senate floor, where fellow Democrats were at that moment trying to mount a filibuster against President Bush's latest judicial nominee.

In the end, Democrats failed and a final vote was set for today on the nomination of White House lawyer Brett M. Kavanaugh, named to the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. After speaking to reporters, Mr. Reid returned to the Senate floor and cast his vote in favor of the filibuster.

Those senators who voted against the immigration bill said it should have left out the "amnesty" provisions and instead focus solely on securing the border and enforcing the immigration laws that have been on the books for decades.

Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, said the bill "puts the cart before the horse" because it gives citizenship rights to illegals, grants full-blown amnesty to employers and opens the borders to millions of new immigrants each year.

"The horse here, that I've been hearing from my constituents, is we need a border-security bill first," said Mr. Santorum, who spends much of his time campaigning for re-election this fall. "And we need a program that makes sure that our country's borders are secure and that they are not a threat either to our national security or economic security."

The bill also includes approval for 370 miles of new fencing along the border, 500 miles of vehicle barriers and authorization of 3,000 new Border Patrol agents this year.

But conservatives in Congress -- like many voters -- are skeptical that the federal government will make good on promises to secure the border and enforce the laws. They suspect that immigration reform is headed for a repeat of the 1986 reforms that granted amnesty to 3 million aliens and promised to seal the border. Ultimately, the laws were never enforced and 3 million illegals were replaced with some 12 million new illegals.

"The amnesty provisions and the fact that the enforcement provisions will not kick in immediately mean to me that this will not solve the illegal immigration problem," Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, said today. "This will, in fact, make the illegal immigration problem much bigger."

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, said yesterday he has been amazed by the Senate's inability to do what voters clearly want.

"There seems to me to be a sense of surreality here, where people in the Senate just are not listening to what the American people are telling us," he said. "We've tried, through the course of the amendments that have been offered that people standing here have offered, to highlight some of the problems that we have identified and which I believe are responsive to the concerns that we've heard from our constituents."

Chief among them was an amendment by Sen. Johnny Isakson, Georgia Republican, that would have delayed implementation of the amnesty and guest-worker provisions until after the secretary of homeland security had certified that the border had been secured. The Senate killed that suggestion.

An amendment by Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican, would have barred illegal aliens from collecting Social Security benefits for past illegal work. The Senate rejected that proposal, even if the aliens had forged Social Security documents to get the employment.

An amendment by Mr. Cornyn and Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona would have required that the 200,000 new workers ushered into the country each year under the guest-worker program be allowed to stay for only a set period of time rather than permanently. The Senate rejected that proposal as well.

Immediately before the final vote yesterday, conservatives suffered what they viewed as one final insult. Buried in a 125-page last-minute amendment was a requirement that local, state and federal officials in the U.S. consult with their Mexican counterparts before they can start building the fence.

IMMIGRATION VOTE

The 62-36 roll call by which the Senate yesterday passed a broad immigration-reform bill. Voting "yes" were 38 Democrats, 23 Republicans and one independent. Voting "no" were 32 Republicans and four Democrats.

Here are major points of the bill:

Amnesty: 10 million illegals can apply for citizenship.

Border security: Adds 370 miles of triple-wire fencing and 500 miles of vehicle barriers; adds 3,000 Border Patrol agents this year

Employers: No penalties for businesses that hired illegals

Critics Say Bill Diminishes Due Process For Immigrants (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The legislation approved by the Senate yesterday would offer many illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship. But advocates of expanded immigration rights complain that "hidden traps" woven through the bill's 300 pages erode significant due-process protections for all foreign-born people living in the United States.

A coalition of civil rights, religious and legal groups says the legislation would make it easier for the government to detain or deport immigrants -- whether in the country legally or not -- while making it more difficult for them to prove they deserve asylum or naturalization.

One provision would add to the list of acts considered "aggravated felonies" under immigration law -- automatic grounds for removal from the country. The rewritten list would include carrying fraudulent documents. According to immigration and civil rights lawyers, that change could prompt the government to expel people who use such documents to escape oppressive regimes or those who have been working in the United States for years under false Social Security numbers.

Another change would give federal courts less latitude to review the cases of immigrants who have applied for asylum or citizenship and been turned down by immigration boards. Currently, U.S. circuit courts consider such appeals from scratch. Under the bill, courts could consider only whether the immigration agency had any reasonable grounds for its decision -- not whether its decision was correct.

The bill also would give Border Patrol officers new powers to jail and deport, without a judge's review, immigrants suspected of having recently crossed into the country illegally. Border officers would be allowed to make such decisions on their own for any foreigners, except Mexicans, they stop within 100 miles of the Mexican or Canadian line. The provision essentially would cement in law a controversial policy that the Department of Homeland Security has phased in during the past few years.

Critics predict that it would lead to racial profiling, and they complain that the enforcement area is so wide it would encompass several major cities, including San Diego, El Paso and Detroit.

The changes indicate that the bill is far more intricate than its public image as a measure that is relatively friendly to immigrants, particularly in comparison with an immigration measure passed by the House late last year.

The merits of the changes are a matter of intense debate.

"We had counted on senators taking the time to eliminate . . . the unwise and unsound provisions that strike due process," said Timothy D. Sparapani, legislative counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union. "And the Senate failed to do its job."

Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a group that favors low immigration, disagreed. "The limits on what the other side calls 'due process' are actually essential if we are going to get control of the immigration system," he said.

Krikorian said so many illegal immigrants are crossing into the country that the immigration and judicial systems do not have the capacity to review every case. "We need to restrict the amount of access illegals have to the court system. There is nothing morally problematic about it. It's not a criminal matter. We are simply deciding whether they should stay in the country or be sent home," he said.

Late yesterday afternoon, the Senate removed from the bill one provision that had alarmed immigration rights groups. An amendment sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) eliminated a section that would have made it more difficult for immigrants to avoid being deported while they are appealing asylum or other applications.

Still, Paul M. Igasaki, executive director of a coalition called the Rights Working Group, said that, on balance, the Senate measure represents "a very serious deterioration of the rights of immigrants."

In several instances, the Senate essentially embraced the due-process restrictions included in the House bill. In at least a few ways, however, senators included provisions that are stricter than those created by the House.

Nancy Morawetz, a law professor at New York University, said that in the Senate version legal residents would be counted as having committed an aggravated felony if they had been convicted repeatedly of driving under the influence of alcohol, even if the convictions happened years ago.

And only the Senate bill, Morawetz said, would create penalties for legal residents if they do not notify the government when they move. She said the requirement has existed for years, but many immigrants do not know they are supposed to file an address change and the federal government has done a poor job of keeping track.

USCIS Could Process Immigration Plan, Ombudsman Says (AP)

The AP, May 26, 2006

DALLAS -- The nation's immigration service could handle a program offering millions of illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship if lawmakers provide enough time and money, the ombudsman who reviews the agency said Thursday.

"Yes, USCIS can definitely do it. The key is funding and time allocated under the law," said Citizenship and Immigration Ombudsman Prakash I. Khatri.

Legislation calling for a new guest worker program and giving many illegal immigrants an eventual chance to become citizens gained the Senate's approval Thursday.

It now heads to compromise talks with the House, which previously passed legislation focused on border enforcement rather than legalizing undocumented immigrants. An estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country would be affected by legislation that comes out of the compromise talks.

The result would greatly increase the workload of an agency already facing a backlog that has left some immigrants waiting years for citizenship or the "green cards" that provide permanent residence status. U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services would need to hire and train more staff and require facilities to process the millions of applications expected, Khatri said.

The amount of time and money needed would depend on the provisions lawmakers ultimately approve. But a tighter deadline for processing immigrants in the plan would cost more, Khatri said.

"There's no way for a fee-funded agency to start up a 10-fold increase in annual processing ... unless Congress really funds it in advance," he said.

Khatri was appointed in July 2003 as the first ombudsman for Citizenship and Immigration Services. He was charged with helping people and employers solve problems with U.S. CIS and gives advice on policies and programs for the agency.

Since then, Khatri has focused on improving the agency's processing times and making the CIS district offices' work more uniform. He's recommended upfront screening to help speed processing of applications and eliminate temporary immigration benefits.

In March, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services Director Emilio Gonzalez said the agency hoped to get through a backlog of immigrant petitions in time to handle another immigration program.

Secure Border Takes Serious Study (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, May 26, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. — In a sand pit in 100-degree sun, two dozen trainees run, jump, and crawl through obstacles. In air-conditioned classrooms, some of their classmates study nationality law. And on the driving course, others learn to control a car during a high-speed chase.

The 482 students on this remote campus are Border Patrol agents-in-training undergoing a rigorous, 19-week course. The Border Patrol Academy prepares men and women to join the rapidly swelling ranks of the agency that polices the nation's porous borders.

The number of Border Patrol agents has been growing since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and the grounds here reflect that. A new academic building with nine 50-seat classrooms has just been completed; a $14 million, 50,000-square-foot addition to the gym is under construction; and new dorms are on the way.

The academy's going to need the extra space.

After three years of steady growth, the Border Patrol is about to embark on an unprecedented expansion. If Congress approves President Bush's request for 6,000 new agents over the next 21/2 years, the patrol will have 18,000 agents on the nation's 5,000 miles of border with Mexico and Canada.

That would double the number of agents since 9/11 raised new concerns about terrorists' ability to slip into the country across land borders.

Bush's announcement that 6,000 National Guard troops will be available for deployment along the Mexican border dominated headlines earlier this month. But the Guard soldiers would be relied upon only for a year or two while the government recruits and trains the new Border Patrol agents, all of whom Bush wants on board by the end of 2008.

On average, 40 people apply for every one accepted at the academy, and some in Congress are skeptical that the Homeland Security Department, which runs the Border Patrol, can move fast enough to get so many new agents hired.

“The track record of this department in this area is not stellar,” Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said in a Senate floor speech on May 17. Gregg chairs the Senate Appropriations homeland security subcommittee.

If Bush's plan works, it will fundamentally change the Border Patrol and make it the largest federal law enforcement agency, surpassing the FBI.

“Our objective is straightforward,” Bush said in his speech announcing the plan May 15. “The border should be open to trade and lawful immigration and shut to illegal immigrants, as well as criminals, drug dealers and terrorists.”

Trainee Stephen Crudale says it was the idea that terrorists could enter the USA undetected that motivated him to join the Border Patrol and spend months at the academy here.

A husband and father of two young boys, he says he gave up his high school teaching job in Los Angeles because “I see this as an opportunity to give something back to my country” and help prevent terrorism.

In Week 11 of the 19-week course, Crudale says the hardest part is being separated from his family. But learning the nation's immigration codes hasn't been easy either, he says, and “I'm not a big fan of long-distance runs” in the wilting desert heat.

Heather Teeple, 25, says she signed up because she was bored with her job as an immigration inspector at the port of Calexico in Southern California. “I've always been one for excitement,” she says.

She almost didn't make it through the program. Trainees have to be able to run a mile and a half in 13 minutes, and Teeple failed her midterm test when she came in at 13 minutes and nine seconds. But after her classmates helped her train every day for weeks, she passed the final test with 22 seconds to spare.

She'll graduate in her dark green dress uniform today.

Former Marine Matthew Dover, 35, of San Diego, has had no trouble with the physical requirements. But he says Spanish has been hard to master.

Trainees are tested repeatedly in Spanish because all new agents begin their careers on the southern border. Eventually, some are reassigned in the north — but not many. Only about 10% of all agents are sent to Washington, Michigan, New York and other states bordering Canada.

Spanish instructor Greg Burwell says about half the trainees who come in are native speakers. For the rest, it can be tough getting through 222 hours of intensive language training — a year's course load crammed into three hours a day for 19 weeks.

“It's a big hurdle for a lot of people,” Burwell says.

The trainees have to be conversant in the language of the border, including phrases such as “How much did you pay the smuggler?” and “When did you cross?” They also have to be able to advise people of their rights in Spanish while maintaining eye contact.

At simulated border crossings, agents are put through various scenarios to practice trying to determine whether the occupants of a car are legal or might be hiding something.

In some cases, role-playing instructors refuse to turn down a blaring radio or jump out of their cars and start to run; in others, they become violent or belligerent to see how the trainees respond.

During one recent exercise, in which trainees had to board a bus and ask people to state their nationality and show ID, instructors told female actors on the bus to try to provoke the trainees. One woman badgered a trainee about whether he was married; another told him what “pretty eyes” he had. He kept his poise.

In more tense situations, when instructors play violent, armed smugglers, trainees are often taken to task for being too rough or too timid in their response. Or for mangling their Spanish commands.

Dover, who grew up in Flint, Mich., and who has had to spend all his free weekends studying Spanish so he can pass the tests, says he's eager to join the growing ranks on the southern border.

Like most of the trainees, he doesn't have the time — or the inclination — to follow the debate over immigration policy and border security a world away in Washington. “That's not up to us,” he says. “We're here to protect the border. My job is to enforce the law.”

Border Deaths Expected To Rise As Summer Arrives (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol says an increase in the number of people who die trying to cross the desert to enter the United States illegally is expected as summer temperatures rise, and efforts are being made to ask the Mexican media to warn would-be crossers of the dangers involved.

"As the summer approaches, it is important that the people understand the seriousness of the situation," said Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar. "The temperatures are deadly, the terrain is unforgiving, and the risks are real. People that do not understand the situation or do not heed the warnings will face reality which too often results in unnecessary and tragic situations."

Last year, 473 persons died on the Southwest border -- a record number of deaths. Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol reported 210 deaths -- 43 more than the same period a year ago. The western desert of Arizona accounted for more than 56 percent of the total number of deaths.

Chief Aguilar said alien smugglers, charging an average of $1,500 to $2,000 a person to cross into the United States, "routinely prey on the desperation of undocumented migrants, callously lead aliens into harm's way." In an effort to prevent heat-related deaths, he said, the Border Patrol has increased its search and rescue efforts.

Since Oct. 1, the Border Patrol's Search, Trauma and Rescue team, known as Borstar, has rescued 1,887 persons -- an increase of 49 percent or 620 more than last year.

"The Border Patrol will continue its efforts on reducing the number of heat-related deaths and remain steadfast in its commitment to securing the border," the chief said.

In an effort to reduce the number of deaths, the agency has implemented a program known as the Border Safety Initiative (BSI), whose two main objectives are to reduce injuries and prevent deaths in the southwest border region. Begun in 1998, the program seeks to "educate and inform" would-be border crossers of the dangers and hazards involved and to respond to those who are in life-threatening situations.

The BSI has four major goals:

·Prevention -- Working with Mexican officials to identify dangerous crossing points along the entire southwest border, discouraging illegal crossings and addressing safety problems.

·Search and rescue -- Targeting hazardous areas where migrants may become lost, abandoned or in distress because of difficult terrain and the willingness of smugglers to lead aliens into dangerous territory.

·Identification -- Establishing procedures and deploying resources to help officials identify those who have died attempting to cross the border illegally through our target zones.

·Tracking and recording -- The BSI Tracking System is the main repository for data collected on BSI-related deaths and rescues for reporting and analysis.

"Smugglers and human traffickers are criminals who have no regard for human life," Chief Aguilar said.

In California, Fox Gets Warm Embrace And A Cold Shoulder (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif., May 25 — In an echo of the debate on immigration under way in Washington, the California Legislature gave visiting President Vicente Fox of Mexico a two-edged welcome on Thursday.

Democratic and Latino members, including the Assembly speaker, Fabian Núñez, embraced Mr. Fox, while some Republicans boycotted his evening address to a joint session of the Legislature. Other Republicans attended the speech, but wore yellow buttons reading "No mas!" to protest Mr. Fox's support for liberalizing American policies on immigration.

Chuck DeVore, a Republican Assembly member from Orange County, refused to attend Mr. Fox's speech because, he said in an interview, a foreign leader has no right to come to the United States to lobby openly on a piece of domestic legislation.

"I do not at all appreciate a foreign head of state telling my nation how to deal with its own sovereignty and the issue of immigration," said Mr. DeVore, an aerospace executive and a lieutenant colonel in the California Army National Guard.

Mr. DeVore, like many other Republicans in the California Legislature, supports the House version of national immigration legislation that focuses on securing the southern border and imposes sanctions on employers who hire illegal immigrants.

He opposes the provision of the Senate bill that would lead to legalization for many of the millions of illegal immigrants already in the country, saying it is nothing more than amnesty for those who broke the law to come here.

Mr. Fox, who is in the last months of his six-year term, is in California on the final leg of a four-day visit to the United States to advocate comprehensive immigration legislation, including better enforcement on both sides of the border.

He told the California lawmakers that his country would do its share to reduce the unregulated flow of people across the border. "We want to be part of the solution, not part of the problem," Mr. Fox said.

ICE Set To Deport 15 Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency is preparing to deport 15 illegal aliens from Mexico and Guatemala who were arrested Tuesday in Hanover County after the speeding van they were in was stopped by police.

"They were issued notices to appear before an immigration judge and more than likely will be removed from the United States," said Ernestine Fobbs, an ICE spokeswoman.

The illegals went through initial interviews yesterday morning with ICE agents who were working to determine their immigration status, Ms. Fobbs said.

Then the group was driven to an ICE facility in Norfolk where officials conducted further background checks to determine whether they had criminal histories or had histories of entering the country illegally, she said.

"They are in removal proceedings," Ms. Fobbs said, adding that a judge will take each person on a case-by-case basis to determine whether they should be removed immediately or whether additional charges will be levied.

The incident began at 6:45 p.m. Tuesday when a patrolman with the Hanover County Sheriff's Office stopped a Ford van that was traveling at 62 mph in a 45 mph zone south on Washington Highway, said Sgt. Michael Trice, spokesman for the sheriff's department.

When the patrolman approached the van and asked for identification, he was handed Mexican documents indicating that the man behind the wheel was in the country illegally, Sgt. Trice said. The patrolman also noticed 12 persons in the back of the van, some of whom had what appeared to be gang-related tattoos.

"As he was conducting the investigation, another car pulled up with two people, and that driver gave police fake identification and presented it as if it was real," Sgt. Trice said.

In all, there were 14 adults between the ages of 20 and 49 years old, and a juvenile who worked at "various job sites in our county" and stayed "around the metro Richmond area," Sgt. Trice said.

After further questioning, the immigrants told police in broken English and through an interpreter that they were in the country illegally, Sgt. Trice said.

Police then contacted ICE officials, who arrived Tuesday night with detention papers.

Hanover police and ICE agents transported the group to the Pamunkey Regional Jail, a facility with a housing capacity of 400 inmates that serves Hanover and Caroline counties and the town of Ashland.

In April 2005, a dozen illegal aliens were detained after an Interstate 95 traffic stop in Spotsylvania County.

Virginia State Police found the illegals -- who came primarily from El Salvador, Guatemala and Mexico -- riding in a van south of Fredericksburg, where a trooper stopped the vehicle for a traffic violation.

DOJ_NMG_0030018

Nine of them eventually were deported to their home countries.

The Spotsylvania County arrests were made a few days after federal authorities released 11 illegals who Fairfax County police found in a van during a traffic stop in Annandale.

In that case, ICE officials ordered the 11 Mexican nationals, three of whom were children, to show up for further immigration processing at the ICE agency in Northern Virginia.

None of the aliens showed up for the proceedings. Officials later located one. Police charged the driver with traffic violations and child endangerment in the case.

Their People, Our Money (WSJ)

By Joel Kurtzman And Glenn Yago

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The problem with the debate on immigration is that it has so far looked at just one side -- ours. Somehow, for political or other reasons, Mexico has escaped scrutiny. And yet we are suffering for Mexico's myriad of economic sins. Our part in creating the immigration mess is that we built a society filled with opportunities but surrounded it with a porous border. Mexico's part is that it has failed to produce enough growth, despite massive wealth. The solution is to open the borders even wider -- but open up Mexico, too. If Mexicans can come here, let our capital and ingenuity invest there freely. President Fox, tear down that investment-restriction wall!

In order to keep its people from leaving for the U.S., Mexico needs to create a million jobs a year; currently, it creates half that. Similarly, its growth has been nonexistent since 2000, despite a 5.5% jump in the first quarter of the year due to oil prices and increased sales of auto parts to U.S. manufacturers. Put simply, Mexico has too little investment capital to start, expand or turn around businesses. And failing to attract that capital has an impact. Despite its proximity to the U.S. market and the special status of the maquiladora program, Mexico has seen its share of exports to the U.S. fall since 2000.

If Mexico is to make up that half-million job difference, it will require capital investment to expand its business sector and modernize the energy sector, which generates 38% of government tax revenue. Mexicans don't have access to capital because of the way Mexico is run. It has a big, bureaucratic government that is highly corrupt and controls too much of the economy. To conduct business requires bribes or "facilitation" payments in order to get the bureaucracy to move. Without these, papers don't get filed, permits don't get issued and cases don't get heard in court. Even the police take bribes. Americans can land in jail in the U.S. if they make these payments, due to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. As a result, Mexico only gets a fraction of the money it needs to grow.

In addition, Mexico is a highly opaque country, with woeful accounting standards and corporate governance. And then there are Mexico's own self-imposed restraints, many of which were aimed specifically at the U.S. Americans cannot invest in real estate within 30 miles of the coastline, cannot invest in the energy sector and are limited in their investments in the telecom and transportation sectors. And yet, with so many Americans reaching retirement age and looking for warmer, less expensive beachfront property, Mexico could become their top choice -- if it ended investment restrictions and bureaucratic complications. Mexico could be enjoying a real-estate-led boom big enough to lure back its best construction workers, many of whom are now working illegally in the U.S. but could be contractors in Mexico. Capital coming into the real-estate sector would stimulate many other sectors of the economy including banking, insurance, textiles, construction and services.

Then there is oil. Nothing better illustrates the country's problems than Pemex, a gigantic, inefficient, state-controlled jumble -- and the No. 1 foreign supplier of oil to the U.S. Because the Mexican constitution prohibits foreign and private investment in the energy sector, Pemex has a 100% monopoly on Mexico's vast reserves of oil and gas, the largest proved in North America.

Pemex, like much of Mexico, is opaque. It has weak internal accounting, budgeting and reporting practices. It has no independent board members and a dubious relationship with its union. These problems -- which don't even take into account corruption with suppliers, distributors, dealers and others in the supply and distribution chain -- have made it difficult for Mexico to derive as much benefit from its vast oil reserves as it should. Counterintuitively, Pemex has made Mexico one of the world's highest cost energy producers, even in its low-wage environment.

Of all oil producing companies, public and private, in any country, Pemex is the most indebted. As a result, whereas other oil companies have been investing to develop new proved oil reserves, Pemex's reserves have been falling with much of the Gulf of Mexico still unexplored. Even without changing its constitution, Mexico's energy sector could be opened up to U.S. investment by using future oil revenues as collateral to finance the modernization of Mexico's oil sector.

The only way for Mexico to reduce the number of workers it sends to the U.S. is to transform itself into a jobs-producing, high-opportunity economy. The way to begin would be to allow unfettered U.S. investment. As that happens, Mexico should reform its bureaucracy -- to make it more efficient and transparent -- and make a real effort to do away with corruption. President Fox took a first, tentative step with his national transparency commissions. The next step is to clean up the nation's police force.

Mexico is a rich country, exporting its troubles north while pretending to fix them. It must do better. By creating an environment conducive to investment and relaxing restrictions, jobs will be created, and immigration will slow. A rapidly developing Mexico would induce would-be immigrants to stop seeking opportunities far from their homes and families, and start seeking them at home.

A Debate Beyond The Fence (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

In our debate over immigration, we're talking past each other on issues of genuine concern to both sides, and we're using our confrontation over immigration to evade larger questions.

As the Senate moved to set up a clash with the House over how to deal with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, the country faced the prospect of a narrow and confusing discussion. On one side are those who just want to deal with border security and would like to deport a lot of those immigrants. On the other are those who also want to deal with security but would provide a path to citizenship for most, though not all, of those illegally in our country.

On the whole, senators -- such as John McCain and Ted Kennedy -- who want to deal with both security and legalization have the better of the argument. As President Bush has said, we're not about to round up and deport 12 million people, and we might as well face that fact. It is far better for our country, perhaps especially for the native-born, to transform members of an illegal subclass into taxpaying, rights-bearing citizens who can openly live up to their responsibilities as Americans.

But advocates of a more liberal policy toward illegal immigrants need to take seriously the discontent that the anti-immigration movement has tapped into. Immigration has been a blessing to the United States, but it is not an unmixed blessing, and the costs of our immigration policies are borne more heavily by some parts of our society than others. Rather than dismiss all immigration critics as xenophobes, supporters of immigrant rights need to deal with the legitimate gripes of their opponents.

The most basic (and perhaps the simplest to deal with) is that immigrants cost local governments money even as they fill federal coffers with income, especially from payroll taxes. "The tax costs are local, but the tax windfalls are national," says Cecilia Muñoz, vice president for policy at the National Council of La Raza. "There's a local-national imbalance. It becomes a potent political issue locally, and there is nothing local governments can do."

A National Academy of Sciences study found that the average immigrant puts a net lifetime fiscal cost of $25,000 on state and local governments. "Estimates are that states and localities are forced to pay tens of billions of dollars in health and education costs for noncitizens," says Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). The federal government should share its tax windfall with localities, yet Clinton's amendment to the immigration bill to do just that was defeated last week. This issue will come back.

Less straightforward but still important are the effects of illegal immigration on the wages and working conditions of our fellow citizens at the bottom of the income structure. There is much debate over this effect, but the evidence suggests at least a small downward push on wages.

Low-income native workers worried about their own wages and job opportunities cannot be dismissed as special pleaders. What to do? Clearly laws against hiring illegal workers need to be enforced more effectively. But former labor secretary Robert Reich has made a broader point: If our labor laws, for immigrants and the native-born, were enforced more vigorously and consistently, all workers at the bottom of the economy would benefit.

The core problem illegal workers pose for the native-born is that the illegally employed are less likely to demand their rights and to complain about unfair treatment. The problem would be much less severe if the federal government were doing its job.

This, by the way, is why it would be a great mistake to create a large new class of "guest workers" with no pathway to citizenship. Paradoxically, those most worried about the impact of immigration should be those most insistent upon full rights for immigrants. Establishing a separate and unequal population with limited civil, political and social rights is the surest way of undercutting the rights of those who were born here.

Of course, the immigration battle is not just about economics. It also entails sharp cultural confrontations, particularly in areas of heavy immigration. Our nation's long history of such fights suggests that cultural battles are more easily resolved when legitimate economic grievances on both sides of the immigration divide are taken seriously.

Paradoxically, those fighting to achieve justice for immigrants will reach their goal only if they are also seen as fighting for justice for the native-born. The native-born, in turn, will find their rights better protected if the rights of immigrants are guaranteed, too.

Our National Laboratory For Bad Government (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, May 26, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas -- Last week, President Bush visited Yuma, Ariz., to tour a portion of the U.S.-Mexico Border by Border Patrol buggy. Maybe Jorge was doing a little measuring for the $3.2 million-a-mile fence the Senate approved, which I guarantee will be really helpful. Are they insane? As Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano observes, "Show me a 50-foot wall, and I'll show you a 51-foot ladder."

Meanwhile, Republicans in the Senate have constructively declared English the national language. That'll fix everything. Every foreigner at our borders will stop and say: "Good thing to know. I'll begin speaking it immediately."

Yes sir, you want a solution, call a Republican.

Of course, I am enchanted to discover that the entire project will be turned over to Raytheon, General Dynamics and other military contractors--think Halliburton with non-competitive bids, anyone? Because this outsourcing stuff is just working like a charm. Another Republican solution.

Ted Koppel suggests in the New York Times that we outsource war: "Blackwater and other leading security companies are seriously proposing to officials at very high levels of the government that their private forces could relieve a number of the burdens now being shouldered [or not] by American troops. ... The Pentagon ... is nonetheless struggling to come to terms with what it now calls `the long war.' There is every expectation that the fight against global terrorism and the most extreme forms of Islamic fundamentalism will last for many years. This is a war that will not necessarily require aircraft carriers, strategic bombers, fighter jets or heavily armored tanks. It will certainly not enable the United States to exploit its advantages in nuclear weapons. It is a war, indeed, that favors the highly mobile and adaptive fighting skills of the former Special Forces soldiers and other ex-commandos ..."

"Will"? Hell! Did and does. This is a war that is being fought with the wrong tools--and, in Iraq, at the wrong time, in the wrong place and against the wrong enemy.

It never did call for tanks, jets or carriers--just a combination of good detectives and good intelligence. In other words, smart, clever people with language skills. All of which we have fully available to us because of ... immigration. Lebanese, Iraqis, Iranians, Syrians, Pakistanis and Indonesians have all become Americans, and in so many cases we got the bravest of the brave--those who saw their country torn apart by religious factions. These are Americans who know the culture and language of the Middle East and other Islamic countries and who care deeply about how it all comes out.

By all means, reform immigration with this deep obeisance to the Republican right-wing nut faction and their open contempt for "foreigners." But do not pretend for one minute that it is not a craven political bow to racism (Yes, racism--I am actually calling them racists, although they pretend it hurts their feelings. Try reading their Web sites and see for yourself), and to nativism, to xenophobia and to Know-Nothingism. Just don't forget what you are throwing away in the process.

TAX:

Feds Cut Off Phone Tax After 108 Years (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, May 26, 2006

A pesky, century-old tax on your phone bill is finally being put to rest.

The Treasury Department said Thursday that it will no longer collect a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls and would refund about $15 billion to taxpayers.

The tax was imposed in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War. It was designed as a tax on wealthy Americans, back when phone service was considered a luxury.

“It's not often you get to kill a tax, particularly one that goes back so far in history,” Treasury Secretary John Snow said.

Treasury said it was conceding its battle to uphold the tax after five appeals courts declared it illegal because of changes in the way long-distance calls are billed.

Phone companies and cellular carriers must stop billing for the tax Aug. 1. Individuals and businesses can file for refunds next year on their 2006 tax returns for excise taxes paid on long-distance calls since March 1, 2003.

Individuals who don't have phone bill records can seek a standard refund that has yet to be determined.

Elimination of the tax will cost Treasury about $46 billion in refunds, lost revenue and administrative expenses in the next five years. That should be offset by higher tax revenue from a strong economy, Snow said.

Phone companies hailed the move. “This is a good first step in alleviating consumers' telephone tax burden, which currently accounts for more than 18% of the average bill,” Verizon Vice President Tom Tauke said.

Callers will still pay a 3% excise tax on local phone calls. But that tax will no longer be levied on services that don't distinguish local calls, such as cellular, all-distance landline plans and Internet-based offerings. Consumers with those services can seek refunds on their full excise-tax payments.

Snow urged Congress to repeal the local-phone excise tax, as well.

Phone Tax Laid To Rest At Age 108 (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Bowing to changes in technology and pressure from taxpayers and phone companies, the Treasury Department said yesterday that it would scrap the 108-year-old federal excise tax on long-distance phone calls. The move will bring consumers and businesses about $15 billion in refunds on next year's tax returns.

The decision, which applies to cellphones and Internet phone services and some landlines, follows a series of court reversals for the government. Large businesses had successfully sued the Internal Revenue Service to recoup the taxes they paid. Phone companies also wanted the tax abolished to relieve them of having to collect it.

Originally a luxury tax to help pay for the Spanish-American War, the 3 percent surcharge was calculated based on the length of the call and the distance of the connection. But as unlimited long-distance calling plans became commonplace, and the tax was applied to a flat monthly fee, some taxpayers argued that the tax no longer applied to them because the duration and distance of a call were irrelevant.

Though the tax will still be imposed on local phone service, the government will reimburse three years' worth of taxes on long-distance calls, including any plans that combine local and long-distance calling. Consumers, who pay about 40 percent of the taxes collected, typically pay about $18 a year in excise taxes if they have a long-distance service and a cellphone.

They will be able to file for a refund on their 2006 federal income tax returns.

"It's time to disconnect this tax and put it on the permanent do-not-call list," Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said. Yesterday's decision, he added, "marks the beginning of the end of an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history."

The abolition of the tax, effective July 31, will cost the Treasury $5 billion annually in lost revenues in the next few years.

With budget deficits soaring, the Treasury had been slow to scrap the tax. But several federal courts ruled in recent years that it was no longer applicable to customers with unlimited long-distance plans. The Internal Revenue Service has refunded hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes to companies including OfficeMax and the American Bankers Insurance Group based on the court decisions.

While the courts said some businesses should get refunds, Congress had not repealed the tax, so the I.R.S. was compelled to continue collecting it. This created a peculiar dynamic in which taxpayers who won refunds still had to pay the tax in subsequent years and then reapply for another refund.

Companies in districts where courts had ruled against the tax could get refunds, while companies elsewhere still had to pay it.

Now, the hundreds of companies that applied for refunds before yesterday's decision will not have their claims processed, according to some tax lawyers. That means companies that could have won refunds through the courts might have to wait far longer for their refunds to arrive after they file their income tax returns.

"The Treasury wants to standardize the process, but it's grotesquely unfair to the people who got this started," said Hank Levine, a partner at Levine, Blaszak, Block & Boothby, a Washington law firm that has represented business plaintiffs in most of the successful cases to date. "The I.R.S. didn't want to give up the money, and now that they have been forced to, they are doing so grudgingly."

Congress was close to abolishing the tax in 2000, but it was attached to a larger tax bill that President Bill Clinton vetoed. Congressmen are again calling for its repeal.

Senators Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, and Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, asked the Senate Finance Committee yesterday to look also at eliminating the tax on local phone service.

For now, the Treasury said that consumers and businesses would get refunds, including interest, on their 2006 income tax returns filed in 2007. The I.R.S. has not decided the size of the standard refund for individuals. But taxpayers who use a lot of phone services will be able to apply for a larger refund if they can document how much they paid in excise taxes.

The average household spends $10 a month on long-distance calls and $41 a month on wireless service, or $612 a year, according to figures from the Federal Communications Commission. Since those services are taxed at 3 percent, the typical household pays $18.36 a year in federal excise taxes, or $55 over three years.

Consumers, of course, can still expect plenty of taxes and fees on their phone bills. Phone companies are obligated to collect an array of state and local taxes as well as fees that pay for emergency response groups and public services provided by the Universal Service Fund and others.

Phone companies have opposed some of these taxes because of the expense of collecting them, and because it drives up the cost of their services, making them less attractive to consumers.

" Wireless consumers can now turn their attention and efforts to repealing discriminatory wireless taxes on the state and local level," said Steve Largent, the president of CTIA, a trade group that represents cellular companies.

Mr. Largent said 17 percent of the typical monthly cellular bill was made up of taxes and fees.

Carriers, however, are partly to blame for that burden because they charge their customers a range of discretionary fees to recoup their business costs. For instance, some customers are charged "property tax allotment" fees that are meant to pay for a company's real estate taxes. Other companies charge "carrier cost recovery fees" to pay for the administrative costs of collecting taxes.

These fees generate billions of dollars in revenue for the companies.

That is a far cry from 1898, when the tax was first levied and there were 681,000 phone subscribers in the United States, according to James Katz, a telecommunications historian at Rutgers University. Though relatively small in numbers, those subscribers paid a considerable amount in taxes to help finance the government's battle against Spain.

The annual basic charge for a home phone in the 1890's was about $100, or more than $2,200 in today's dollars. A three-minute call from New York to Chicago in 1902 cost $5.45 — about $120 today.

U.S. To End Contentious Phone Tax (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Treasury is conceding defeat in its battle to collect a long-distance telephone tax enacted to pay for the Spanish-American War, paving the way for business and individual taxpayers to get refunds, plus interest, going back three years.

The "telephone tax," which will be terminated July 31, imposed a 3% surcharge on consumers based on distance of the call. But today telecommunication companies don't price long-distance calls based on distance. Businesses argued that the tax was illegal, and the Internal Revenue Service spent years fighting -- and losing -- court challenges to the tax.

Treasury Secretary John Snow said he expects the refunds will cost government coffers about $13 billion. In addition to paying out refunds, the government also now will lose out on an estimated $37 billion in revenue over the next five years.

The IRS will include a provision on tax returns for the 2006 year that will allow businesses and individuals to apply for refunds. The IRS will soon issue details on how to claim the refund.

Businesses will likely draw the lion's share of the refunds because they pay a larger portion of the tax and are likely to have better access to old documents showing payments, if needed. But IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said he is drafting a "simple" process for individual consumers to legally claim the refund.

Individuals who paid the tax for the past three years, usually denoted on each monthly bill, could likely have to show proof that they paid the tax.

Mr. Snow said the government will be able to shoulder the projected $13 billion hit because government collections from business and individual taxes have grown and are projected to rise steadily. "The revenue of the U.S. government is strong and can easily absorb this."

The levy has long been targeted for removal by conservatives. At the announcement, Mr. Snow was flanked by House Republicans who were among the most politically endangered incumbents of this midterm election year, including House Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce of Ohio, and Reps. Jeb Bradley of New Hampshire, Thelma Drake of Virginia, and Mike Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania.

Though courts have ruled the tax illegal, Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said he intends to have his panel consider legislation to abolish it all together.

As of now, consumers still have to pay the local portion of the telephone excise tax but that may change also. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.) said he is pursuing eliminating the local tax assessed on local calling plans.

While the origins of the telephone tax stem from an 1898 law -- in essence a luxury tax -- to fund the Spanish-American war, the current interpretation of the law was last modified in the 1960s.

Courts have ruled 10 times in recent years that the government is misapplying the tax and ordered refunds to companies that have sued over the charges. Several companies over the years have won refunds, including OfficeMax Inc. and Honeywell International Inc. Even so, the IRS continued to collect the tax and the Justice Department continued to litigate. All companies with pending cases can now apply for refunds.

"There is going to have to be a company-by-company settlement," said Jack Miles, tax partner at New York-based law firm Kelley, Drye & Warren who has successfully sued the IRS on behalf of clients fighting the payment of the telephone tax. He said that he is representing 30 more businesses with pending cases against the IRS. "IRS officials have advised me that it will be years to clear up the corporate backlog."

Telecommunications companies hailed the tax rollback. "This is a tax that discourages consumption," said Walter B. McCormick Jr., president and chief executive of USTelecom, a U.S. telecom trade group. "It is a positive thing for consumers and positive for our nation."

'Antique' Phone Tax Dropped (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Treasury to Refund $13 Billion Collected on Long-Distance Calls

The Treasury Department, conceding that it has no right to continue collecting a 108-year-old tax on long-distance telephone calls, announced yesterday that it will drop its legal battle for the tax and instead refund about $13 billion to callers who have paid the tax in the past three years.

The 3 percent tax, enacted in 1898 to help pay for the Spanish-American War and revised in 1965, has been declared illegal by five federal courts of appeal during the past year as the result of challenges brought by companies forced to pay it.

Long-distance carriers have been required to bill customers for the tax and remit it to the government.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow yesterday called it "an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history."

The tax, which was originally considered a luxury tax because only wealthy people had telephones at the time, will go out of existence July 31.

"It's a great day for consumers," said Gene Kimmelman, director of the Washington office of Consumers Union. "The last residue of the Spanish-American War is finally complete."

The Treasury Department had no figures on how much of a refund an individual might expect, but Kimmelman said, "People with the biggest phone bills will be the biggest winners." Those are principally businesses and high-income consumers who tend to make heavier use of phone services than do lower-income individuals, he said.

However, he cautioned that many, perhaps most, households will see only a modest refund -- possibly $10 or so. Over the past several years, traditional long-distance usage has fallen as cellphones and the Internet have gained in popularity.

Snow said the taxpayers will be able to claim three years' worth of the telephone tax, the legal limit on claiming tax overpayments, on their 2006 tax returns. The Internal Revenue Service, he said, is working on a simplified method by which taxpayers can claim their refunds.

It is expected that, as with sales-tax deductions, taxpayers will be allowed to claim either a standard amount or an exact amount based on their phone bills. Individuals who are not required to file tax returns will be offered a special form for the rebate.

"It was an antiquated tax that made no sense whatever," Kimmelman added. With advances in telephone technology, cellphones and the Internet, he said, it has become increasingly difficult to determine which party in a call the tax should be assigned to.

"You can't track it," he said. "That made the levy unsustainable."

The $13 billion in rebates will cost the government more than the estimated $10 billion that would have been handed out under Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) short-lived proposal to give taxpayers $100 apiece to offset high gasoline prices.

Snow noted that a similar levy on local calling remains in effect, and he called upon Congress "to terminate the remainder of this antique tax by repealing the excise tax on local service as well."

UPDATE: Treasury Concedes Fight Over Federal Telephone Tax (DOW)

Dow Jones, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Individual and corporate taxpayers will be eligible for an estimated $13 billion in tax refunds after the Treasury Department abandoned a legal fight over a federal long distance telephone tax.

DOJ_NMG_0030024

Treasury Secretary John Snow on Thursday announced the government's surrender in a long-running legal fight over the long-distance telephone tax, first imposed in 1898 to fund the Spanish-American War.

It came after the government lost an estimated 10 court cases, including five federal appellate court cases, challenging the legality of a 3% federal excise tax on long-distance services.

Millions of individuals and businesses that paid the tax will be eligible for refunds, plus interest, for taxes paid on long-distance service billed after Feb. 28, 2003. Tax experts said it may be the broadest case involving elimination of a tax through a legal challenge.

"I can't think of a tax situation where there was an issue that affected as many Americans," said George Clarke, an attorney for Baker & McKenzie LLP who represented Radio Shack in a telephone tax lawsuit.

Snow summed up the government's capitulation: "The American taxpayers have been right."

The tax has long been targeted by conservatives for elimination.

Speaking at a Capitol Hill press conference, Snow was visibly pleased to announce demise of the long distance telephone tax, long targeted for elimination by conservatives.

"It's not often you get to kill a tax," Snow said, surrounded by several Republican House members who oppose the tax.

Snow also called on Congress to repeal the remaining part of the telephone excise tax as it applies to local telecommunications services. Today's announcement "marks the beginning of the end of an outdated, antiquated tax that has survived a century beyond its original purpose, and by now should have been ancient history," Snow said.

The Internal Revenue Service has lost at least 10 cases that contend the telephone excise tax can't be collected on flat-rate long distance telecommunications services. The telephone tax is a 3% rate on the value of local, long distance and wireless phone services.

The issue involves companies such as Radio Shack, OfficeMax (OMX) and Honeywell International (HON) that have been challenging an outdated definition of telecommunications services in the tax law.

The current law, which originates from the 1960s, defines "taxable service" as the rate computed based on distance and time of each long-distance call.

The telecommunications companies argue that it is outdated since long-distance services are no longer based on distance and time but instead on flat, per- minute rates or a single rate for unlimited calls. Long distance service also is sold as part of a broader bundle of services.

The Justice Department will no longer pursue litigation concerning these cases.

Taxpayers will be eligible to file for refunds of all excise tax they have paid on long-distance service for the past three years. Taxpayers will claim this refund on their 2006 tax returns, to be filed in 2007. The IRS said it soon will announce a simplified method to seek the refunds.

Clarke, the Baker & McKenzie attorney, said taxpayers needs to carefully read the fine print of the refund procedures in order to get their money.

Snow said corporations, small businesses and individuals will qualify for an estimated $13 billion in refunded back taxes over three years.

Snow said he didn't know what portion of the tax is paid by corporations and individuals, and he couldn't estimate the size of individual refunds.

Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., told reporters in a separate conference call with Snow that he would pursue eliminating the local portion of the excise tax. With Thursday's announcement, Santorum said the telephone tax would remain on basic local telephone plans and the very inexpensive local plans which are overwhelmingly used by low income individuals.

"This tax becomes what was a regressive tax to an extremely regressive tax," Santorum said. He didn't estimate the cost of repealing the tax on local telephone services, but said it would be less than the long distance tax repeal.

Snow said rising federal revenues, associated with the growing economy, will more than offset cost of the long distance tax, which officially will terminate July 31, 2006.

"The revenue stream of the U.S. government is strong and can easily absorb this," Snow said.

Treasury Disconnects Tax On Long-distance Calls (MRKTWTCH)

By Jeffry Bartash, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, May 26, 2006

3% excise originally established a century ago to pay for short-lived war

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The brief Spanish-American War ended more than a century ago, but not the federal tax assessed to fund the conflict. Until now.

On Thursday, the U.S. Treasury said it would stop collecting the 3% federal excise tax on long-distance calls, a fee originally assessed in 1898. The government also said it will issue refunds requested by consumers and businesses that paid the fee over the past three years. Taxpayers will be able to request refunds when they file 2006 tax returns in early 2007.

The Treasury also said the Justice Department would cease litigation in support of the tax after a handful of federal appeals courts ruled the fee illegal in decisions rendered within the past year. The most recent loss in federal court occurred earlier this month.

"The Federal Appeals courts have spoken across the board," Treasury Secretary John Snow said in a statement. "It's time to 'disconnect' this tax and put it on the permanent 'do not call' list."

The tax, which generates more than $6 billion annually, has survived repeated efforts to eliminate it, most recently in 2000, when President Bill Clinton vetoed a larger bill that included a repeal of the excise fee.

Bills aimed at ending the tax have circulated every year since. Businesses call the tax unfair and outdated. Phone companies say it's costly and complex to administer. Consumer-advocacy groups say the flat-rate fee put an undue burden on poorer Americans. Virtually no one in Washington supported the tax.

Nonetheless, for decades long-distance companies such as AT&T Inc. (T: news, board) and Sprint Nextel Corp. (S: news, board) have been required to collect the excise fee from customers and pass it on to the federal government.

In recent years, however, some large corporations such as Hewlett Packard have successfully sued to get rid of the tax on claims that it was illegal. Others have won large refunds from the Internal Revenue Service.

What's more, rapid changes in telecommunications technology have rendered the tax obsolete, critics say. The Internet, for example, makes it more difficult to discern what sort of communication is taking place over long distance and customers are increasingly billed via flat-rate plans instead of per-minute charges, particularly in the relatively new wireless business.

The excise tax works out to $1.50 per every $50 in long-distance calls, not a particularly large sum for consumers. Yet for a business that spends, say, $10,000 a month on long-distance calls, the tax would equal $300 a month or $3,600 a year.

If the tax remained in place over the next decade, it would have generated about $67 billion for federal coffers, a congressional panel estimated. Altogether, the excise tax has raised more than $300 billion in its entire existence, the Congressional Research Service found.

The excise fee was originally established in 1898 on long distance because phones were considered a luxury and only the wealthiest Americans could afford service. These days, the tax affects all consumers directly or indirectly, no matter what their annual income.

At its highest point, the long-distance excise reached 25% during World War II and the Korean War and it remained as high as 10% during the Vietnam War. The excise later fell to as low as 1% in 1982 before being bumped up to 3%, a level made permanent in 1990.

In announcing his decision, Treasury Secretary Snow also called on Congress to eliminate the 3% federal excise tax on local phone calls. That tax is separate from the long-distance fee.

"Customers should see a noticeable difference in their phone bills within the next few months," said Herschel Abbott, vice president of governmental affairs at BellSouth." We hope this decision is a harbinger of removal of other discriminatory taxes on communications customers."

FBI And IRS Seek Documents In Land Deal Involving Palm Beach County Commissioner (FLSUNSEN)

By Jerome Burdi, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, May 26, 2006

The FBI and Internal Revenue Service on Thursday went after documents regarding a controversial land deal involving Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti and the South Florida Water Management District.

A subpoena for the documents was served on the water management district, Chairman Kevin McCarty confirmed.

McCarty said the water management district counsel called him to tell him the news.

"We didn't know that Commissioner Masilotti was involved" in the sale McCarty said. "There was a secret trust involved in it ... We thought we were buying it just from the Lee brothers."

In recent months, Masilotti and his ex-wife, Susan, have come under scrutiny for making more than $1.3 million through a series of complex transactions in Martin County, according to court and land records.

DOJ_NMG_0030026

The South Florida Water Management District was buying land in southern Martin County for preservation, and Susan Masilotti got into a deal in September 2002 with David and Jeffrey Lee, who sold their Black Diamond nursery in Masilotti's commission district to developers several years before.

Neither the FBI nor IRS would confirm or deny the papers were served.

McCarty said all copies of the sales documents were requested.

"It came as a complete surprise to us," McCarty said, emphasizing that the water district was not served with papers beyond the request for the sale documents. "I guess when you try to keep it a secret like that it raised the curiosity of the authorities."

The water management district will turn over all the documents, which could take up to 30 days, he said.

Masilotti, who could not be reached for comment, despite attempts by phone, has said he did nothing wrong by profiting from the deals. The deals were first revealed in court filings in the Masilottis' divorce case in January, when Susan Masilotti filed a financial disclosure form listing $1.3 million in 10 certificates of deposit she purchased in 2005. Her financial disclosure also referred to the Martin County land deals. The CDs were purchased beginning soon after Susan Masilotti sold a portion of the land she bought.

On May 16, Masilotti, a Republican, said he would not seek re-election this fall amid criticism over the land deal from his own political party.

The Lees bought huge swaths of land in southern Martin County, about 3,500 acres, for $7.9 million in January 2001, according to land records and an appraisal of the property done for the water management district.

They eventually sold most of the land to the water management district for $43 million, and they brought three partners into the deal before the payoff, according to the water district appraisal. The water management district made its final installment payment last month, McCarty said.

He said he hasn't been in touch with Masilotti and didn't know the federal government was conducting an investigation.

Susan Masilotti's name didn't appear in the public records relating to the land deals because she used a trustee to purchase the land and hold it, records show. The trustee bought 147 acres from the Lees for $367,500 in September 2002.

Then in March 2004, as the Lees prepared to sell their land and that of their partners to the water district, they recorded a series of documents in Martin County land records. They bought back Susan Masilotti's 140 acres for $2.1 million, and sold her another 150-acre parcel for the same price.

In that deal, the Lees agreed to purchase 110 of the 150 acres from Susan Masilotti by April 2005 so long as they sold their property to the water district.

On the day of the deadline, the Lees paid $1.7 million for the 110 acres. Susan Masilotti saw more than a $1.3 million profit, taking into consideration the original $367,500 she invested in the deals.

The trustee recently transferred the remaining 40 acres of land into Susan Masilotti's name, land records show.

In Susan Masilotti's divorce financial-disclosure forms, she listed her husband as the beneficiary of three of the $100,000 CDs. In his court filings, Tony Masilotti listed his "wife's cash" of $1.3 million as a marital asset.

The couple were headed for a divorce trial earlier this month when they reached a confidential settlement, just as their attorneys were about to take depositions concerning the land deals that could be made public.

Other water management board members also were surprised about the subpoena.

"It's an unfortunate situation," said board member Nicolás Gutiérrez Jr., who learned the news from a reporter. "But our hands are very clean on all this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Frist Still Hopeful For Hayden Debate (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, May 25, 2006

CIA director-nominee Michael Hayden awaited confirmation from the Senate Thursday evening in a vote that would install the four-star general and veteran of intelligence controversies atop the civilian spy agency.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he remained hopeful the Senate could take up Hayden's nomination before departing for the Memorial Day recess.

Hayden, 61, would be the first active-duty or retired military officer to run the CIA in 25 years.

DOJ_NMG_0030027

At his confirmation hearing, Hayden sought to assure senators that he would be independent from the Pentagon, but said he would consider how his uniform affects his relationship with CIA personnel. If it were to get in the way, he said, "I'll make the right decision."

Hayden became a lightening rod for the debate about the Bush administration's no-warrant surveillance program, which monitors domestic communications — without court approval — when one party is overseas and terrorism is suspected. Some Democrats and civil-liberties advocates argue the monitoring was illegal.

As head of the National Security Agency from 1999 to 2005, Hayden oversaw the groundbreaking operations, but his defenders have said repeatedly that he was relying on the advice of top government lawyers.

The White House tried to hurry Hayden's nomination through in under three weeks, in part by heeding Congress' five-month-old requests for more information on the classified operations.

But President Bush's selection of Hayden exposed fissures among Republicans who say the administration is making decisions without consulting Congress.

"That's the way they decided to do business," House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., said in an interview Thursday. "The problem is there are major changes going on in the intelligence community, and the executive branch is doing it on their own."

Hoekstra said a military official shouldn't be in charge of the CIA, but he planned to look ahead and learn more about Hayden's vision for the agency. Hoekstra also said he would use every tool available to Congress — including the power of the purse — to ensure he has a voice in the intelligence reforms.

Hoekstra is among Republicans close to outgoing CIA Director Porter Goss who are angry that the Bush administration dismissed him suddenly from the post. "It was a very ungracious exit for a very gracious man," Hoekstra said of Goss, the former House Intelligence Committee chairman who had a 40-year career in government.

The top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record) of California, said the White House has treated Congress disrespectfully for years. "It is not confined to the process on the NSA program," she said.

At his confirmation hearing, Hayden said he wants to encourage the CIA's clandestine service to take more risks, expand how the CIA shares information with allied intelligence services and encourage the CIA's analysts to make hard-edge assessments.

Hayden said he wants the CIA out of the news — "as source or subject" — but also wants to win back public confidence in America's best-known spy agency.

Senate Clears The Way For Kavanaugh Vote (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, May 25, 2006

The Senate cleared the way Thursday for the confirmation of White House aide Brett Kavanaugh to a federal appeals court judgeship, over Democratic complaints that he is unseasoned and partisan.

By 67-30, senators approved a confirmation vote, set for Friday.

Democrats, however, complained that Kavanaugh has a long record of loyalty to President Bush and too short a record in the courtroom. They highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from "highly qualified" to qualified.

"It's clear that he is a political pick being pushed for political reasons," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "This is not a court that needs another rubber stamp for this president's exertion of executive power."

The White House and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter say Kavanaugh's Ivy League education, Supreme Court clerkship and other work had prepared him well for a federal judgeship. Specter's panel approved the nomination along party lines.

"It is hardly a surprise that Brett Kavanaugh would be close to the president, because the president selects people in whom he has confidence," said Specter, R-Pa. "Brett M. Kavanaugh must be confirmed."

Democrats initially threatened to filibuster Kavanaugh, but the bluster softened after Specter granted their request for a new hearing at which the nominee appeared.

There, Kavanaugh told Democrats he played no role in the White House formulation of policies on detainees, domestic wiretapping or any relationship with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Avoiding Clash, Senate Sends Judicial Nomination To Floor (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — The Senate cleared the way on Thursday for a top aide to President Bush, Brett M. Kavanaugh, to be confirmed for the federal appeals court, avoiding a partisan showdown over a nomination that had been stalled for three years.

Senators voted, 67 to 30, for a floor vote on the nomination, expected on Friday.

Democrats said Mr. Kavanaugh, who was on the staff of Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel who investigated President Bill Clinton, was too partisan and lacked the experience for the appellate bench.

But the senators were unwilling to block the nomination using a filibuster. That tactic could have prompted Republicans to respond with the so-called nuclear option, a rules change permanently barring judicial filibusters.

"I don't believe he's filibuster-able," said Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee who voted to bring the nomination to the floor.

Ms. Feinstein said she would vote against confirmation, saying that she would vote for Mr. Kavanaugh as a district judge, but saying, "the circuit, I think, requires more seasoning."

Mr. Kavanaugh has been nominated to a seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the court that produced Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

Mr. Kavanaugh's candidacy revived the fight over Mr. Bush's judicial nominees. For a time, Democrats hinted that they might use the filibuster against him.

They are promising to block the nomination of another nominee for an appeals court, Judge Terrence W. Boyle, a longtime federal judge in North Carolina, if Republicans try to bring it up for a vote.

Mr. Kavanaugh, 41, is Mr. Bush's staff secretary, a position in the president's inner circle. At his confirmation hearing, Democrats pressed him about whether he had a role in White House deliberations over domestic telephone surveillance; had met Jack Abramoff, the center of a lobbying scandal; or had involvement in writing legal memorandums used to justify coercive questioning of people who have been detained on suspicion of terrorism.

"No, Senator," he replied each time.

Democrats also pointed to an American Bar Association downgrading of its rating of Mr. Kavanaugh to "qualified" from "well qualified."

Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, senior Democrat on the judiciary panel, said Thursday that he could not recall any nominee's being confirmed after such a development.

Mr. Leahy said Mr. Kavanaugh had "failed miserably" to demonstrate "that he has the capacity to be independent of the president, to be an independent check on his political patron."

Republicans praised Mr. Kavanaugh as eminently qualified. Senator John Cornyn of Texas called him an "outstanding nominee," adding, "His nomination has been needlessly protracted and contentious."

Artful Dodging (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, May 25, 2006

May 24, 2006 - How different is the shiny new White House Press Secretary Tony Snow compared to his jaded predecessor Scott McClellan?

After more than two weeks inside the West Wing, Snow has pulled off the unusual coup of improving relations with the press corps while offering, at times, less information than McClellan. He has also managed to win widespread forgiveness for a series of foreign-policy fumbles that would have landed McClellan in deep trouble.

How has Snow won over the press corps? Take a look at the toughest of his customers: Helen Thomas, one of the longest-serving reporters at the White House, and--in the opinion of administration officials--one of the most hostile.

During Tuesday afternoon's press briefing, Thomas was grilling Snow on what role, if any, the United States was playing in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians over a two-state peace deal. Snow told Thomas that Washington was operating "the same as it's always been" and was working with Israel and "when possible" with the Palestinians.

"Then why is it bankrupting the Palestinians?" Thomas shot back.

Snow clutched the side of the podium. "The Palestinians are not being bankrupted, Helen," Snow said, smiling. "Hamas is a terrorist organization. We do not give money to terrorist organizations."

"They were democratically elected," Thomas insisted.

"They were democratically elected, and they're still a terrorist organization," Snow replied.

"By your designation," Thomas snapped.

DOJ_NMG_0030029

"Yes, thank you very much, Helen," Snow shot back.

That could have been a scene straight out of one of Scott McClellan's combative press briefings, if it weren't for what happened next. From the podium, Snow looked down at Thomas sitting in her front-row seat and noticed the veteran reporter was clutching a shiny red apple.

"By the way, that's a nice apple," Snow grinned.

"Here," Thomas instantly replied, offering the new press secretary her apple.

As the press room erupted in laughter, Snow dramatically leapt from the podium and grabbed the apple, placing it front and center on the lectern. "Whoever thought that Helen Thomas would kiss up to me," Snow said, laughing. "An apple for the teacher."

"Hardly!" Thomas shouted from the front row. But she was smiling--and so was every other reporter in the room.

Indeed, there's been a lot of smiling and plenty of jokes and laughter during the first two weeks of Snow's tenure as Bush's new press guy. The atmosphere in the briefing room, which only weeks ago seemed poisonous beyond repair, now seems relaxed and different enough to compensate for the fact that reporters don't seem to be getting any more straightforward answers than before.

Snow has openly dodged questions on everything from the NSA wiretaps to immigration reform--all the while admitting to reporters that he's doing so. Perhaps the most artful dodge has been Snow's tendency to say "I don't know"--a phrase that has been cited dozens of times in the last several briefings.

It's not unreasonable to think that Snow can and should only stick to the facts that he knows. But it's interesting to see how Snow has offered noncomments on issues where he should be fully up to speed. In some cases, Snow has been even less forthcoming than McClellan about what Bush and his advisers are doing.

Last week, Snow repeatedly declined to comment on even the most basic information that used to be easily confirmed with the White House. When border-state governors, including Arnold Schwarzenegger, complained that Bush had not consulted with them about his plan to deploy National Guard troops along the border, Snow at first declined to comment on whether the president had phoned the governors at all. "I'm not going to engage in on deliberations," Snow told reporters. When asked if Bush spoke to any members of Congress about his plan, Snow echoed his earlier remarks. "I'm not going to get into what the president did or did not do," he said. The new press secretary later admitted that he just didn't know if Bush consulted with the governors or not--but still declined to comment, though he said he knew "for a fact" there had been "staff contact."

During McClellan's reign at the White House, it was typical for the administration to put out information about the president's daily schedule, including meetings with members of Congress or phone calls between the president and lawmakers. No doubt part of that strategy was to stamp out accusations that relations between Bush and Congress are shaky, but it was also being practical. When lawmakers come to see Bush at the White House, they drive up the West Driveway--past so-called pebble beach, where TV reporters do their stand-ups and right outside the press briefing room. In other words, it was no secret.

But for the past two weeks, Snow hasn't put out such information and has declined to comment on such events--even though the meetings have obviously continued. On Tuesday, a group of congressional Republicans, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, met at the White House with Bush. The subject: immigration reform--a fact confirmed only when lawmakers who attended the meeting told reporters about it after the fact. Asked about the president's message during the meeting, House Majority Leader John Boehner told reporters, "It wasn't any different than everybody's heard before."

More startling is Snow's readiness to plunge into the realm of foreign policy when he seems unfamiliar with some basic details, including some of the most frequently repeated positions of the White House itself.

When asked about a possible military strike on Iran, Snow stumbled over one of the president's most common statements on the subject. Snow was lobbed a softball question suggesting that "nothing is off the table" in terms of military action.

His reply: "We've always said that." But then he continued, "Let me put it this way: The use of force is off the table. All right? Let me be specific. That is what the president has said. Is that not correct?"

Er, not quite. As reporters and White House staff started to shake their heads, Snow plunged back in. "I'm sorry," he said. "Is not off the table. Thank you. Yes, it's on the table."

That wasn't the only problem for Snow. With Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the White House, Snow managed to mangle the names of the main players on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

At his morning off-camera briefing, Snow repeatedly called the Palestinian president "Prime Minister Abbas." In fact, the prime minister, Hamas leader Ismail Haniya, is the sworn enemy of Israel and the United States. Later Snow mangled Abbas's nickname, Abu Mazen, when asked about the administration's assessment of his power. "I'm not going to get into whether the president is going to talk about … Abu Mazen, Abu Abbas, whatever you want to call him," Snow said. For good measure, Snow promoted the Israeli prime minister's position to "President Olmert."

DOJ_NMG_0030030

Snow started out with good intentions. At his first off-camera briefing earlier this month, he said he wasn't going to deal with questions on foreign affairs or currency, because of one simple reason. "I do not want to set off global tempests," he said, "because I frankly just don't know enough on those." It sounds like he was right first time.

Treasury Secretary To Step Down (WP)

By Peter Baker And Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, who has presided during a period of strong economic growth but at times seemed out of sync with President Bush, has informed the White House that he will resign in the coming days after three years as the nation's chief economic officer, a source close to Snow said yesterday.

Snow asked the White House to announce his resignation in early June and said he plans to stay in the job no later than July 3 while a replacement is sought, the source said. The secretary's decision was intended to bring finality to a process that has played out awkwardly in public over months as Snow's job security has been a regular source of Washington speculation.

Republican insiders said possible candidates to succeed Snow include former commerce secretary Donald L. Evans, a longtime Bush friend; Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, a former Kellogg Co. chief executive; Ambassador David C. Mulford, a former treasury undersecretary who represents the United States in India; and Stephen Friedman, the president's former chief economic adviser and a former Goldman Sachs chief executive.

Two Republicans said Evans and his wife will accompany the Bushes to Camp David today, although they cautioned against reading too much into that because the two couples often spend holidays together. One of the Republicans said Evans would be willing to take the job if Bush indicates he needs him.

"There is a lean toward a person who's on the inside and would have the opportunity to come into the position very easily," said a former administration official, who like others insisted on anonymity to discuss a resignation that has not been formally announced.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, a former trade representative, had hoped to be named the next treasury secretary but does not appear likely to get the job, and has indicated to associates that he plans to resign soon to return to the private sector.

Robert M. Kimmitt, Snow's deputy, is another possible candidate. But his prospects may have been damaged by the controversy over a Dubai company's proposed takeover of terminal operations at U.S. ports; he was Treasury's point man on the process that initially approved the takeover.

Snow's impending departure has been expected for months, but word of his decision began leaking out yesterday and was first reported by the Dow Jones news service.

Bush, when asked about the Treasury secretary at his news conference last night, indicated only that he had not spoken directly with Snow and quickly changed the subject to positive economic indicators. "He has not talked to me about resignation," Bush said. "I think he's doing a fine job. I mean, after all, our economy is strong."

Snow first told then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. around Christmas last year that he was ready to go but said he would stay through the State of the Union address in January until a successor could be found, according to the source close to Snow. But the White House had trouble finding a person of stature from Wall Street to take over a job that, under Bush, has become more about selling policy than making it, which is why his team has turned to current and former government officials, according to several sources.

Snow grew frustrated as news reports in recent weeks suggested that the White House wanted him out, the source close to him said. Rather than be left hanging any longer, he decided to set a firm July 3 departure date even if a replacement is not named. "He just didn't want it to drag on later than that," the source said. "He's anxious to get back to the private sector."

"With the economy in good shape," the source added, "it feels like a good time to leave on a high note." Snow, the source said, "is leaving on very good terms with the president."

A genial former railroad executive, Snow, 66, has hewed steadfastly to the White House line, in contrast with his feisty predecessor Paul H. O'Neill, who often irritated Bush aides by differing with the president on issues such as tax cuts and steel tariffs. Although Snow's loyalty is appreciated at the White House, he has followed his assigned script so closely that even some boosters concede he has sometimes come across as an ineffective salesman for the administration's policies.

In recent weeks, even amid reports about his impending departure, Snow has continued traveling around the country, delivering speeches touting the economy's strength and the recent surge of tax revenue as evidence that the president's policies are working.

At times, though, he has appeared disengaged. When questioned a few days ago at a congressional hearing on how high inflation has been over the past year, for example, he replied about 5 percent, when the correct answer was 3.5 percent.

But Snow could cite other numbers to bolster his legacy. The government announced yesterday that the gross domestic product grew a brisk 5.3 percent in the first quarter, and in a statement Snow noted that it has averaged 4 percent growth over the last three years. The news, he said, "further demonstrates the strength of the American economy."

Snow Plans To Leave Treasury Post Next Month (WSJ)

By John Harwood And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary John Snow plans to announce his departure from the Bush administration by mid-June, according to people familiar with the matter.

After months of criticism and speculation about his future, Mr. Snow has told the White House he wants to leave, a senior administration official said. He has withheld any announcement until President Bush settles on a successor, a process that is nearly concluded, the people familiar with the matter said.

Mr. Snow is scheduled to attend a meeting of G-8 finance ministers in Russia June 9 and 10, but that is expected to be his last major public event as secretary. The senior administration official said Mr. Snow's departure would be announced "within days."

At a news conference last night, President Bush said Mr. Snow "has not talked to me about resignation," but didn't address how long the secretary would remain on the job. He praised Mr. Snow for "doing a fine job" helping manage the U.S. economy.

White House officials declined to identify leading candidates to succeed him. Among those most often mentioned in Republican circles are David Mulford, currently the U.S. ambassador to India and a former undersecretary of the Treasury under President George H.W. Bush; Steve Friedman, the former head of Mr. Bush's National Economic Council; Don Evans, the former commerce secretary and Carlos M. Gutierrez, the current commerce secretary and former chief executive of Kellogg Co.

Others believed to be potential choices include Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick, though he has discussed leaving the administration in recent days; Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt, who was tarnished by involvement in overseeing the review of potential U.S. ports management by a firm based in the United Arab Emirates; and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, a former deputy Treasury secretary.

One reason Mr. Snow is believed to have stayed as long as he has is that the White House has had trouble identifying desired replacements. Some prominent Wall Street executives, such as Goldman Sachs CEO Henry Paulson, have rebuffed overtures.

A former chairman and CEO of CSX Corp., Mr. Snow succeeded Paul O'Neill as Treasury Secretary in 2003. He hasn't committed major gaffes or repeated Mr. O'Neill's penchant for blunt-spoken independence. Yet he has been faulted for ineffectiveness in communicating the administration's message on the economy, which despite continued growth hasn't stopped the slide in Mr. Bush's poll ratings. As a result, Mr. Snow has endured nearly two years of speculation about when he would be replaced.

While the economy is relatively strong, the next Treasury secretary will face challenges, in part because many Americans don't seem to feel that their economic situation is improving. A recent Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found that 77% of respondents call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data shows strong economic growth. Rising gas prices and concerns about Iraq continue to overshadow strong economic gains.

New Reports Of Change At Treasury (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — John W. Snow has signaled his readiness to step down as Treasury secretary, possibly by the end of June, or as soon as the White House has a candidate to succeed him, say Republicans with ties to the administration.

Mr. Snow, a congenial former railroad executive who took over the Treasury Department three years ago, has made it clear he did not expect to stay in the job beyond the midterm elections in November.

President Bush said Thursday at a news conference that he had not spoken to Mr. Snow about his plans.

Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, refused to comment, saying, "We don't comment or speculate on personnel issues."

But one Republican said Mr. Snow was prepared to leave soon after the Group of Eight meetings on June 8 and 9 in St. Petersburg, Russia.

It was not clear whom Mr. Bush might nominate as a successor. Speculation includes David Mulford, a Treasury official under President Ronald Reagan and the first President Bush who is currently the American ambassador to India; Donald Evans, who was secretary of commerce in Mr. Bush's first term; Carlos Gutierrez, the current commerce secretary; and Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council.

Competition for Mr. Snow's job had already heated up within the administration. Robert Zoellick, currently the deputy secretary of state and previously the United States trade representative, is believed to have wanted the top Treasury post but was ruled out. He is now expected to step down and has been said to be talking to firms on Wall Street.

Administration officials have also been reported to have contacted Wall Street executives like Henry Paulsen, the chairman of Goldman Sachs.

Speculation about Mr. Snow's departure has been almost constant since Mr. Bush's re-election in 2004. But the speculation, including some fueled by White House officials, repeatedly turned out to be wrong.

Mr. Snow remained outwardly impervious to all the speculation, including published reports in which anonymous White House officials were quoted as predicting his ouster.

But even before Mr. Bush's re-election, officials suggested they wanted to shake up his economic team to better pursue an ambitious agenda — now stalled — of overhauling both Social Security and the tax code.

Veteran Data Was Removed Routinely, Official Says (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 25 — Officials of the Veterans Affairs Department told angry lawmakers on Thursday that an agency employee had been taking home sensitive data for three years before some of the material was stolen from his residence, compromising the records of 26.5 million veterans.

"He said that he routinely took such data home to work on it, and had been doing so since 2003," George J. Opfer, the department's inspector general, told senators, some of whom expressed amazement at how the department has handled the theft.

Because the data included Social Security numbers and birth dates as well as names, there has been widespread concern that the information could be used by computer-handy criminals for credit card fraud and other forms of identity theft.

Secretary Jim Nicholson said 105,753 calls had been logged from Monday, when his agency set up a special toll-free information line, to Wednesday night.

Mr. Nicholson said he believed computer security had lagged at the agency, which he has headed for just over a year, because of past "embedded cultural resistance" to change.

That inertia is beginning to dissolve, he told a joint hearing of the Veterans' Affairs and Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committees.

"But I'm not going to tell you it's what it should be," he replied to a question from Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who heads the homeland security panel.

Mr. Nicholson said that just sending letters to veterans whose data was compromised — those discharged since 1975, plus some veterans getting disability compensation — would cost $11 million to $12 million. He did not specify how much the agency expected to spend on telephone banks, Web sites and other measures, but Senator Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington, said she expected him to have to ask for more money.

"This responsibility rests on me," Mr. Nicholson told the senators, who greeted him warmly and seemed angry not at him but at the bureaucracy of the 235,000-employee veterans agency, which has been criticized by its own inspector general's office several years in a row for inadequate data security.

It seemed possible from exchanges between Mr. Nicholson and members of the committees that the full dimension of the current data breach, which came about because an agency employee's suburban house was burglarized after he took the data home without authorization, might not yet be known.

Ms. Murray, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, posed this question: Suppose letters are sent to veterans who have already died and then returned unopened; could spouses or other relatives be vulnerable?

"That's a good question," Mr. Nicholson replied. "We'll have to look at that."

Moreover, he said that the data on some veterans included "numerical disability ratings and the diagnostic codes which identify the disabilities being compensated," enough knowledge for some unauthorized people to compute compensation payments.

Mr. Nicholson said the employee who took the data home had broken no law "as near as I can tell," even though he had violated department policy. He said the employee, a data analyst, had been cooperating with the Montgomery County police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0030033

Mr. Nicholson said he continued to be outraged over the delay between the burglary, on May 3, and the date he learned about it, May 16. Senators Collins and Larry E. Craig, the Idaho Republican who heads the Veterans' Affairs Committee, described the time lag as "baffling," "mind-boggling" and "just unbelievable."

Veterans' Data Theft Went Unreported (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, May 25, 2006

The Veterans Affairs data analyst who lost the personal data of 26.5 million veterans improperly took the information home for three years before the data was stolen, government investigators told Congress Thursday.

In a pair of hearings, VA Inspector General George Opfer detailed a series of missteps leading to one of the nation's largest information security breaches. He noted that his office only became aware of the May 3 burglary through office gossip.

"We were never notified," Opfer told Senate and House panels investigating the breach, explaining that one of his employees first heard about a burglary — and that VA electronic records may have been stolen — while attending a routine meeting on May 10.

"It wasn't until we interviewed the employee on the 15th that we knew we had a significant problem" involving a vast cache of Social Security numbers, birthdates and disability ratings, Opfer said. Only then did the VA bring in local and federal law enforcement to investigate.

The disclosure comes as the VA is under attack for a three-week delay in publicizing the burglary. During the hearing, VA Secretary Jim Nicholson said he was "mad as hell" that employees did not tell him about the breach until May 16.

He acknowledged that Deputy Secretary of Veterans Affairs Gordon Mansfield knew immediately about the incident. But he declined to say whether Mansfield would be fired or how the theft could have happened, citing the need to await results of a full investigation.

"As a veteran, I am outraged. Frankly I'm mad as hell," Nicholson said. "I can't explain the lapses of judgment on the behalf of my people. We will stay focused on these problems until we get them fixed."

Lawmakers were skeptical.

"The testimony you gave us is absolutely baffling," said Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), R-Maine, who chairs the Homeland Security Committee. "You seem to be saying it was just one employee. But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk vulnerable system that has been identified time and again as vulnerable."

At the House hearing, Rep. Bob Filner (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. was even more blunt.

"Your own people don't tell you about the theft involving 26 million veterans. You say you take responsibility but then you tell veterans to go call your creditors," he said.

"You're not taking responsibility for this mismanagement debacle," Filner said. "The most dramatic thing to take responsibility is to resign."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that wasn't going to happen.

"He'll have his opportunity to testify on Capitol Hill today," Snow said of Nicholson. "I'm sure they will have sharp questions for him. But he's not tendering his resignation."

Congress is trying to determine whether the VA had adequate security measures in place to guard against the unauthorized disclosure of veterans' Social Security numbers and birthdates. It is one of the nation's largest security breaches.

Also at issue is why the department waited so long before acknowledging that a government-owned laptop and disks were stolen in what appeared to be a routine burglary at an agency analyst's home in Maryland.

During the hearing, Rep. Steve Buyer (news, bio, voting record), R-Ind., chairman of the House veterans panel, pressed Nicholson to give the nation's veterans assurances that their information will not be used for identity theft, or that they would be "made whole" if the information is misused.

Nicholson said he could not, saying that the VA would have to get more funding to compensate veterans. Nicholson has previously downplayed the potential danger, explaining that the May 3 theft appeared to be a random burglary.

"Before I can give you that assurance, I have to work with Congress ... if they suffer a loss," Nicholson said, who added that it would take about $25 million alone to improve security procedures at his agency. "It will give piece of mind to veterans if they suffer a loss to have a system to compensate."

Nicholson got an endorsement from President Bush even as lawmakers pressed for greater accountability and awaited answers in the hearings and a subsequent joint meeting of the Senate Veterans' Affairs and the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs committees.

Snow said Wednesday said Bush had "full faith and confidence" in Nicholson. Snow originally had declined to issue a statement of support in the president's name, but then said he wanted to clarify his remarks.

Nicholson is a Vietnam War veteran and former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Worker Often Took Data Home (WP)

By Christopher Lee
The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Department of Veterans Affairs data analyst who lost 26.5 million veterans' personal information when his home was burglarized had routinely taken such data home since 2003, VA Inspector General George J. Opfer said yesterday.

"It wasn't like all of a sudden one night he took home all this data," Opfer said during a break in House and Senate hearings on the massive information security breach.

Authorities announced a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the laptop computer and external hard drive stolen May 3 from the employee's Aspen Hill home. The VA inspector general and the FBI are offering the reward. Montgomery County police asked anyone with information to call 866-411-8477.

Federal investigators have removed other sensitive VA data the worker was not authorized to have at home, Opfer testified. He said his staff will identify all the data the employee had at home and determine which supervisors knew about it.

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said the stolen information was not encrypted or "scrambled." He reiterated that there has been no indication that thieves are using the data to open credit card accounts, take out bank loans or engage in other forms of identity theft.

The electronic file contained names and dates of birth for as many as 26.5 million veterans who have been discharged since 1975, or who were discharged in any year and are collecting disability compensation from the department, Nicholson said. The file also included the Social Security numbers of 19.6 million of those veterans, he said. He said fewer than 100 spouses are believed to be included in the file.

Opfer said his office did not learn of the lost data until May 10, and then only through an offhand remark by a VA employee at a routine meeting. Nicholson was even further out of the loop; he testified yesterday that his subordinates failed to inform him until May 16 -- nearly two weeks after the theft put millions of veterans at risk of identity theft. The FBI was not told until May 17, and Nicholson did not make a public announcement until Monday.

"I'm so damn mad at the loss of veterans' data and the fact that one person can put all of us at risk," said Nicholson, an Army veteran who served in Vietnam. "I can't explain these lapses in judgment on the part of my people. . . . After the inspector general finishes his investigation and finds exactly what happened, I plan to take decisive actions. "

Nicholson said several VA officials have offered their resignations but he will not decide whether to accept them until the investigation is complete. "I am the person ultimately responsible to our veterans, and therefore I am the person responsible for this situation," the secretary said.

He repeated his plan to have all VA employees take a cybersecurity training course by June 30 and to increase background checks of employees with access to sensitive information. He said the employee who took the data home last had a background check 32 years ago.

Lawmakers, besieged by calls from outraged veterans, lambasted Nicholson both for the security breakdown and for the department's sluggish response.

Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, called the entire episode "absolutely baffling."

"If the employee had chosen not to report the theft immediately, VA and the public could possibly still be in the dark," said Hawaii Sen. Daniel K. Akaka, the top Democrat on the Veterans Affairs Committee.

"Something like this should never go unknown by the boss," said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

Several lawmakers noted that the department's information security measures have repeatedly been identified as vulnerable in recent years.

"The system is so poorly designed that one employee can compromise the whole thing," said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), chairman of the veterans panel, said he believes that the VA data analyst was "a dedicated federal employee who took work home with the hope of improving VA operations."

He said the department, and not veterans themselves, should cover the cost of the increased credit monitoring made necessary by the loss of the personal data. "There were many lapses in judgment for which many people are going to have to answer," Craig said. "This was not an error that a veteran made. This was an error that the system that provides services to them made."

Cost To Inform Vets Of Data Theft Starts At $10M (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — It will cost at least $10 million to inform veterans that their personal information may be in the hands of criminals, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told Congress on Thursday. He warned that the ultimate price tag of the government's response could be tens of millions more.

Letters will be sent to the 26.5 million veterans whose names, birth dates and, in most cases, Social Security numbers were stolen from the Maryland home of a department analyst May 3, Nicholson said at back-to-back hearings. Postage and paper will make up the bulk of the cost.

The department also is considering providing veterans with a credit monitoring or counseling service at a free or reduced charge.

Taxpayers could be hit for much more. When asked for an estimate, Nicholson tossed out the figure of $100 million — or more.

There's no indication the data are being used for criminal purposes, and Nicholson and George Opfer, the agency's inspector general, say they believe the theft was random.

Still, Nicholson told lawmakers, he's “mad as hell” at the employee,

Several lawmakers responded by scolding Nicholson for what they called systemic problems. They pointed to reports from the agency's inspector general that they said identified weaknesses in the information technology system.

“You seem to be saying it's just one employee,” said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. “But it's not just one employee. You have a high-risk, vulnerable system.”

According to the Montgomery County Police Department in Maryland, a laptop computer and an external hard drive with the veterans' information were stolen. The analyst, who has been placed on leave, was not authorized to take the data home, Nicholson said. Nonetheless, he had been doing so since 2003, Opfer said.

The data include the information on 26.5 million veterans and fewer than 100 spouses of veterans, Nicholson said. Social Security numbers for 19.6 million of those veterans also were included.

Even though the employee promptly informed his supervisor and local police about the theft, Nicholson said he wasn't informed until May 16.

On Thursday, the agency and FBI announced a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the stolen data.

Veterans Chief Is Grilled Over Stolen Data (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The theft of a disk containing names, birth dates and Social Security numbers for as many as 26.5 million veterans and their spouses stirred fury in Congress on Thursday, as Republicans and Democrats pounced on Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson, demanding to know why the agency's notorious computer security issues had not been fixed.

With millions in danger of identity theft because a VA data analyst took home a computer disk that was later stolen during a burglary, more than 100,000 aggrieved veterans sought answers from 14 call centers set up by the Department of Veterans Affairs. They also took their complaints to the airwaves and the Internet, where one Vietnam vet set up an online petition urging Nicholson to quit.

Amid calls for Nicholson's resignation, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said President Bush had "full faith and confidence" in the Veterans Affairs secretary.

Nicholson, a 67-year-old former Army Ranger who fought in Vietnam, said in testimony before House and Senate committees that he was "mad as hell" that the employee had taken the disk home, and that his deputy secretary, Gordon Mansfield, had not informed him of the security breach for two weeks.

"As a veteran, I am outraged," Nicholson said. "I'm outraged that this employee would do this so recklessly, and I'm outraged that I wasn't notified sooner."

He added: "Other people are also in my sights as a result of this."

But neither Congress nor veterans' groups was appeased. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, the nation's largest group of combat veterans, issued a sharp response to the VA's advice to individuals to check their own credit reports.

DOJ_NMG_0030036

"Telling 26.5 million veterans to deal with this as individuals is a totally unacceptable response," the VFW's national commander, James R. Mueller, said in an e-mailed statement. "We strongly suggest that the federal government start figuring out a way to deal with this problem computer-to-computer between the VA, national credit bureaus and other national institutions."

During the hearings on Capitol Hill, the VA's inspector general, George Opfer, said the agency had been unable to formally notify the affected veterans because "we don't have 26 million envelopes."

Opfer estimated the costs of buying, addressing and mailing the envelopes at $10 million to $11 million.

Asked the cost for preventing and covering potential losses from identity theft, Nicholson estimated "way north of $100 million" and did not rule out a total as high as $500 million.

He told the House committee that the stolen records were those of veterans who have been discharged since 1975 or who are receiving compensation for disabilities.

The missing data include the names and birth dates of about 26.5 million veterans and some of their spouses, along with 19.6 million Social Security numbers.

Officials at the White House and Veterans Affairs stressed that so far the records have not been compromised and that the FBI is trying to recover them.

In the meantime, veterans were being advised to notify banks and credit card companies, and lawmakers were talking about earmarking funds to pay for veterans to get regular credit reports.

"I'm absolutely furious," said Stewart Resmer, a Vietnam veteran from Santa Monica who started the anti-Nicholson petition at http://www.petitionspot.com .

Noting that the VA had lost thousands of records in a 1973 fire at its National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis, Resmer said:

"Now they make us prove that we were shot or where we were, and we have to get two buddy statements. We've had our tails shot off and lived to tell it. They never sent me a letter about Agent Orange; I don't need them to get me a free credit report check. They should be looking to replace all of our Social Security numbers."

The breach dramatically underscores the risks inherent in information collection in a high-tech age. In Washington, where many government officials take work home or on the road, the advent of powerful, lightweight laptop computers has turned routine home burglaries into major security threats. In 2000, a State Department employee was fired and five others were disciplined over a missing laptop that contained top-secret information.

"The VA is not alone in the potential to suffer a data breach of this magnitude," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), calling the security failure "a wake-up call to the rest of the federal government."

Still, the VA has been famously lagging in computer security — having earned an "F" on an annual federal computer security report card compiled by the House Government Reform Committee in four of the last five years.

Several lawmakers expressed concern that the security lapse was the tip of the iceberg.

"Just unbelievable," said Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), chairman of the Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs. "How is it that VA's computer system permits one person to download the records of 26 million individuals and no one is alerted?"

Others called for Nicholson to leave.

"I don't think the secretary is really up to this job," said Rep. Ted Strickland (D-Ohio), a member of the House Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Added Rep. Bob Filner (D-Chula Vista), another panel member: "You say you take responsibility, but then you tell veterans to 'go call your creditors.' … The most dramatic thing to take responsibility is to resign."

The midlevel data analyst who took home the veterans' information — officials said he was trying to figure out how to reduce the file — has been placed on administrative leave pending an investigation.

Opfer said the employee told investigators that he had been taking data work to his suburban Maryland home regularly since 2003.

The theft involved 5 gigabytes of material, Nicholson said, adding that the employee could easily have accessed the information over a secure connection from his home computer.

He said he has ordered immediate training for all computer employees in security and privacy but suggested Congress might want to consider enacting laws making it unlawful to take records home.

At day's end, veterans were not reassured.

"I really don't know what to do. I've only got one bank and one credit union. I guess I'll kind of watch them," said Don Tetschlag, a 31-year Navy veteran now retired in San Diego.

Referring to the employee who took home the disk with such sensitive information, he added, "If I'd done that, I would be in jail."

Harkin, Kerry Call For Free Credit Watch For Vets After Data Theft (DMR)

By Jane Norman

Des Moines Register, May 25, 2006

Washington, D.C. - Two senators are pushing to give free credit monitoring to those affected by the loss of highly personal data on 26.5 million U.S. veterans that was stolen in a home burglary.

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Ia., said today that he and Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., are sponsoring legislation that would provide one year of free credit monitoring as well as one free credit report annually for two years after the end of monitoring.

"We owe this to our veterans," Harkin told reporters. "Doing right by our veterans is a continuing cost of our national defense." He said the estimated cost of the credit protection is $1.25 billion though "we don't think it will cost that much." He said the bill could be approved by the Senate yet this week.

A Department of Veterans Affairs staff member took the data on a disk drive to his suburban Maryland home to work on a project, without authorization.

The data had identifying information such as names, Social Security numbers and dates of birth for veterans, although not financial information, VA officials say.

The disk drive was stolen on May 3, and VA Secretary Jim Nicholson, an Iowa native, told a congressional committee today he is "mad as hell" he was not informed until May 16. There is no indication that the data is being used yet for identity theft.

"There has to be some accountability," said Harkin, though he said he was not ready to call for Nicholson's resignation. "I don't want to hang someone before the trial," he said.

In Iowa, Patrick Palmersheim, executive director of the Iowa Department of Veterans Affairs, said about 75 veterans have called with questions about the theft. But he said that it's difficult to know the extent of the problem among Iowa's 276,000 veterans. "We as state directors can't get all the answers," he said.

John Derner, department adjutant for the American Legion of Iowa, said just three veterans have contacted his organization. "Actually, I am a little surprised we haven't had many phone calls," he said.

Veterans are being advised to keep a close eye on their credit card bills and bank accounts, he said.

The VA has set up a manned call center for veterans to obtain information at 1-800-333-4636, operating Mondays through Saturdays from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Central time.

Edwards: Investigate Records Theft (AP)

The Associated Press, May 25, 2006

DES MOINES, IA - Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Thursday that a full congressional investigation into the theft of millions of veterans records is necessary and that Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson should be held responsible.

Nicholson's role in the lost records should be investigated because his future "depends on the degree of his involvement," Edwards said.

"Those (records) are more important now than they have ever been," Edwards told The Associated Press before a series of Democratic fundraising events in western Iowa. "They can be used to deny people health coverage, they can be used to deny people treatment."

The issue surfaced when VA officials reported that a worker at the agency took home a laptop computer and disk containing the medical records of 26.5 million veterans. The computer and disk were stolen in a burglary.

Many lawmakers were angered to learn that it took more than two weeks for the VA to make the theft public.

Edwards said a full congressional investigation is needed because it's unclear what actually happened.

During the 2002 midterm election, Edwards spent considerable time raising money and donating computers to campaign organizers. That grassroots involvement paid off with a surprising second-place showing in the 2004 Iowa caucuses, and Edwards went on to become the running mate of Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry.

Edwards has not ruled out making another run for the Democratic nomination, and he is seeking to repeat the grassroots campaign of the last cycle with repeated visits to Iowa.

He was attending fundraisers for state Rep. Paul Shomshor, and for the Democratic Party in Woobdury County.

Edwards also met privately with people living in poverty. Since losing the last election, Edwards has established a center for studying poverty issues at the University of North Carolina, and he travels the country talking about the issue.

With War On, Americans Have Troops In Mind (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030038

Americans will still fire up their barbecues, watch parades, and go camping this weekend. But for the first time in a generation, Memorial Days are coming during prolonged armed conflict. That has strengthened ties between civilians and soldiers, bringing a marked change in the way people will observe the holiday this year.

Politicians of all persuasions are pushing for better veterans' services, including healthcare for the living and survivors' benefits for those who've lost loved ones. Many states are now providing free tuition at public colleges and universities for the children of those killed in war zones.

Since terrorists attacked the United States in 2001, communities around the country have begun to bring back traditional Memorial Day ceremonies - many of them featuring Iraq war vets.

It's part of growing public interest in military affairs, historians say. And this time, unlike in the Vietnam era, declining support for the war has not eroded backing for the troops, say many of those taking part in Memorial Day cer- emonies.

Gainesville, Ga., started having parades again in 2003. On Monday, about 700 veterans, police officers, firefighters, marching bands, baton twirlers, and Boy Scouts will march up Green Street, a shady lane bordered by antebellum homes. Charlie Company of the local National Guard unit, recently returned from Iraq, will serve as honorary grand marshal.

"We just decided that it was time to bring it back with the main thing being just to honor our veterans," says organizer Cheryl Vandiver, whose son is an Iraq war veteran.

In Chattanooga, Tenn., the Command Post Military Museum, which was started to commemorate World War II, now includes the current conflict in Iraq and Afghanistan. While "reenacters" will dress as soldiers from earlier wars this weekend, recently returned Iraq war GI's will bring real-life immediacy to the displays of uniform and military gear.

"What we try to impress upon students, especially with the current conflict going on, is that we're not here to glorify war," says museum curator and former middle-school history teacher Louis Varnell. "We don't want to lose sight of the fact that war itself is terrible."

Many of those involved with Memorial Day ceremonies see a marked difference with the last era of sustained US military combat abroad.

Despite mounting criticism of the war in Iraq, American support of troops serving there has not waned, says Jerry Rivers, director of veterans' services in Montgomery County, Tenn., which is near Fort Campbell, home to the US Army's 101st Airborne Division. "We wanted to make sure at least in our community that they weren't treated as poorly as those guys that served in Vietnam."

Part of this post-Vietnam urge to separate the warrior from the war has to do with the portrait of the typical soldier today. Unlike his or her father, who probably would have gone to Vietnam right out of school, today's GI is more likely to be older, to be married, and to have children. Especially among those in National Guard or Reserve units, he or she is likely to have strong work and community connections. Taking care of soldiers' families

More family men and women in the war zone also means more dependents to care for in the wake of combat casualties. The 2,404 men and 55 women killed in Iraq have left an estimated 1,700 children without their parent.

In concluding his second presidential inaugural speech in 1865, Abraham Lincoln spoke of the need "to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan."

In that same spirit, Congress this year voted to increase the "death gratuity" for service member survivors from $12,000 to $100,000 and to increase group life insurance payments from $250,000 to $400,000.

Last week, members of Congress heard testimony on the estimated 200,000 homeless veterans. "In the battlefield of life, they are wounded, and we cannot leave them behind," said Rep. Bob Filner (D) of Calif., who convened the forum.

Like other programs in at least three dozen states, the University of Minnesota this fall will begin waiving tuition costs for children of war casualties. "It's our responsibility to watch over the families of those soldiers who have watched over us and paid the ultimate price," said state Rep. Lloyd Cybart (R), an Air Force veteran.

Communities and local businesses around the country are finding ways to bring a bit of home to service members halfway around the world. Earlier this month, Vermonters sent 825 gallons of maple syrup to Iraq, Kuwait, and Afghanistan.

"Memorial Day is about thanking those who are there and honoring those who didn't come back," says Rick Marsh, president of the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association. "So we're sending them a little bit of Vermont, a little thank-you." Soldiers' heartfelt letters

Meanwhile, some Memorial Day services this weekend will bring the war closer to home. At Shiloh National Cemetery in rural Tennessee, a children's choir will sing the National Anthem and military hymns. High school thespians will read last letters sent home by American soldiers.

Among these is one that Marine Cpl. Blake Mounce meant for his wife after his death. Killed last July when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb, he was buried on his 23rd birthday.

"To read that over and to know that he was aware of the danger that might possibly happen and wanted to send that last message to her, that's especially poignant," says Woody Harrell, superintendent of Shiloh National Military Park.

In addition to the parades and speeches, many Americans will observe the official National Moment of Remembrance (one minute at 3 p.m. local time).

Rita Payne, who runs Roman Catholic programs at Fort Campbell, sees a growing reverence for Memorial Day.

"There is a more deepening of faith, of spirituality and just prayerfulness," she says. "People take it upon themselves to do something positive, and prayer seems to be our greatest weapon right now."

1 War. 2 Deaths. 1 Year Later. (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, May 26, 2006

Memorial Day 2005: America is at the park, in the water, around the grill. At a walleye fishing tournament in Dubuque, Iowa, a lawn mower race in Hillsborough, N.J., a techno-music festival in Detroit. Dania Jai-Alai near Miami offers free U.S. flag magnets, while supplies last.

There are countless sack races, eating contests and tugs of war, endless sales on everything from RVs to bikinis. All patriotic T-shirts are $5 at eight Sears stores in greater Phoenix, while supplies last.

This is how most of us spend Memorial Day, an occasion for remembrance that morphed, through years of peace, into beer, ball, boats and barbecue.

But three years of war have revived the holiday's original meaning. Today, for the families of two young Air Force officers, the gateway to summer will become a portal to grief.

In Iraq, Derek Argel and Jeremy Fresques — both Air Force Academy class of 2001, both commandos, both promoted this day to captain — prepare to fly off on a classified mission.

In Fort Walton Beach, Fla., Capt. Argel's wife, Wendy, sits down at the computer as their 10-month-old son, Logan, plays on the floor. She wants Derek to have an e-mail from her when he gets back.

The television shows scenes of parades and cemetery services. In the e-mail's subject field, she types, “Memorial Day.”

In nearby Destin, Fla., Capt. Fresques' wife, Lindsey, also an Air Force captain, joins the annual “Gate to Gate” road race at Eglin Air Force Base. She and other runners drop carnations at the base Veterans Memorial as they jog past.

In Yuma, Ariz., Fresques' father, Nick, has gotten a call from his wife, Sherry, asking him to come home early from work. After all, it's Memorial Day. In Santa Barbara, Calif., Argel's mother, Debbie, enjoys a poolside martini in her father-in-law's backyard.

All are patriotic Americans who have relatives at war. Still, for them as for almost everyone else, Memorial Day is 90% recreation and 10% recollection. Before the day is over, that will change forever.

More than a dozen communities claim to be the birthplace of Memorial Day, including Waterloo, N.Y., (designated as such by Congress in 1966); Columbus, Miss. (recognized by the Library of Congress in 1958); and Boalsburg, Pa., where in 1864 three women started a tradition of decorating Civil War soldiers' graves with flowers.

On May 30, 1868, Union veterans first officially observed Decoration Day. Over the next century, a succession of wars swelled the importance of what became known as Memorial Day.

In 1971, Congress divorced Memorial Day from May 30, making it the last Monday in May. By 2000, the day's original meaning had become so subsumed in the festive three-day weekend that Congress passed the national Moment of Remembrance Act, asking for a moment of silence at 3 p.m.

Years of peace also took their toll. For many, Memorial Day was old men walking around in funny hats and outfits wearing obscure ribbons and medals — forgotten heroes of forgotten wars.

In Farmington, N.M., where Jeremy Fresques grew up, his mother mostly recalls the kids' baseball games and soccer tournaments. His father sums it up: “Memorial Day was a picnic.”

In Lompoc, Calif., where Derek Argel grew up near Vandenberg Air Force Base, Memorial Day was different. The main street was lined with flags. Hundreds of people gathered at the cemetery. A clergyman read the names of the war dead, Scouts placed a flag on every veteran's grave and a bugler played taps.

Derek's grandfather was a career Marine who fought in World War II.

In the sixth grade, Derek wrote that on Memorial Day, “We should put the flag out at our homes, and go to the service at the cemetery. On this day we show respect to the veterans who risked their lives or were killed protecting our freedom and flag. I am happy to see them put a little flag on my grandfather's grave.”

In Iraq on Memorial Day 2005, Fresques, 26, and Argel, 28, have made captain. However, there's no time for a promotion ceremony. Because they're on a mission, they're not even wearing their new silver bars. A promotion "would have been the last thing on their minds," says Col. Kenneth Rodriquez, their group commander. "These guys were very mission-focused."

Only a few cadets from each Air Force Academy class are selected to wear the red beret of the Air Force's Special Tactics unit. They're called combat controllers, a dry term for shock troops trained to land in hostile territory, set up and protect landing fields, and direct aircraft into them.

Argel: water polo star, 6-5, 210, 4% body fat. Wanted to go to the Air Force Academy so badly he attended two prep schools after high school to get in. On a whim, entered academy boxing tournament, having never boxed before, and made the finals, losing a split decision. Set so many records in commando training he had to lug a hunk of driftwood as handicap.

Fresques: hard worker, deep thinker. Considered military academies because he didn't want to get a loan to attend University of Arizona. Joked that he chose Colorado Springs over West Point because female cadets were better looking; said the Air Force treated officers better. Found Jesus in his senior year at the academy. Upon seeing copy of Maxim, the men's magazine, on the desk of a superior officer, he said, "Sir, you aren't going to read that, are you?" Disqualified by eyesight for flight school, he became a communications officer. Applied for elite special ops unit after deciding that he'd "go crazy sitting at a desk."

Argel, a rising star in Special Tactics, has decided to make a career of it. Fresques plans to leave the Air Force in 2006 and possibly go into real estate. Both will finish their tour in a month and go home.

"I'm definitely ready," Fresques e-mails his parents on May 26. Three days later he writes in his journal that he's not afraid of dying, only "the process of dying." He says his fondest desire is to be "raptured with Lindsey" into heaven to be with Jesus.

On Memorial Day, the two captains board the surveillance plane to scout potential emergency landing sites. Winds are calm, visibility unrestricted.

In the early afternoon, a holiday rooted in wars past is transformed by news from war today:

Four U.S. airmen and an Iraqi Air Force pilot were killed when their light plane crashed and exploded into flames 80 miles northeast of Baghdad. The plane went down about an hour after takeoff from Kirkuk. The cause of the crash was under investigation.

Wendy Argel is on an errand when she gets a call from her mother at home with little Logan. There are soldiers there to see her.

Wendy's father was an Air Force pilot. She knows what that means.

While she was writing that e-mail, her husband was dead.

A few miles away, Lindsey Fresques is bustling around her town house getting ready for a barbecue when there's a knock on the door. Four soldiers are standing there.

One is a major who attended her wedding, and the look on his face says this will be the worst day of her life. The carnation she'd dropped at the memorial had been for her own husband.

The young widows spread the sad news. Wendy reaches her mother-in-law in Santa Barbara. Debbie sinks to her knees. Her husband thinks she's having a stroke.

Lindsey calls Sherry Fresques, who again calls Nick at work. "Jeremy won't be coming back," she explains.

In Iraq, where an investigation will later rule out hostile fire and mechanical failure, only a few personal items are recovered from the wreckage. They include a silver cross Jeremy had bought in Jerusalem and wore around his neck, and Derek's gold wedding ring.

Some of the human remains are burned too badly for identification. Later, these intermingled ashes will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery. The pilot will become the first Iraqi interred there.

Four days after the crash, a ceremony is held in a hangar at Hurlburt Field in Florida, where the four airmen were based. Each is awarded the Bronze Star. Each soldier is represented by combat boots, a rifle, a helmet and, of course, a red beret.

This year, for the friends and relatives of Jeremy and Derek, Memorial Day will be no picnic.

Nick Fresques: "It always meant something to me, but it wasn't a real important day. I didn't know anyone real close that even served in a war. Now that my son … Now it's completely different. Until something like this happens, unfortunately, it's hard to realize the true meaning of Memorial Day."

Sherry Fresques: "It's a new experience for me, picking out what to put on your son's grave. I've selected two white roses, symbolizing purity, as well as a spray of red, white and blue stars that kind of reminds me of fireworks — Jeremy loved fireworks. And I'll probably put up this little flagpole. The flag's one of those sparkly ones."

Wendy Argel: "Memorial Day is a big deal down here, but I know in some other places it's not. But we're living in wartime. I hope people remember that. It's not just numbers. One of those numbers happens to be my husband."

Lindsey Fresques: “It reminds you that there really are people who make sacrifices. Jeremy and I used to think, ‘You go in and do your time, and then you get out.' So what happened makes the meaning and honor of military service a lot more real.”

Debbie Argel Bastian: “Memorial Day will always be difficult for me now, but it will also have so much more honor attached to it.”

For tough guys, Derek and Jeremy were never very aggressive around women.

Wendy basically picked up Derek, making eyes at him in a bar on St. Patrick's Day. Lindsey and Jeremy met when she was his superior officer and instructor in air traffic training school. Taking a cue from Top Gun, she passed him a note inviting him to dinner.

Now there's an overwhelming sense of what might have been. Derek was away for about half of his two-year marriage. Jeremy was overseas on his only wedding anniversary. Wendy wears Derek's ring around her neck. Lindsey wears Jeremy's cross around hers.

Last month, Wendy and Lindsey went sky diving, each for the first time, doing something their guys enjoyed doing.

On Memorial Day, they'll be at Walt Disney World, where Wendy's looking forward to the roller coasters. “It's the adrenaline,” she says. “You can't help but smile.”

Disney — “the happiest place on earth,” Lindsey says, reciting Walt's famous claim. But there's a touch of irony in her voice, suggesting that there are days when there are no happy places on earth, and that this Memorial Day could be one of them.

Remember The Guys In The Foxholes (USAT)

By Capt. James Key

USA Today, May 26, 2006

One evening, a casualty officer and I drove down the road on our way to inform a soldier's spouse that her husband had died in Iraq. As an Army chaplain, I thought about how difficult it would be for this young mother and how empty the two children's' lives would be without their dad.

On our way to the house, the casualty officer had assured me that he would be able to deliver the sad news. But when we got to our destination, his confidence disappeared. "Chaplain," he asked, "will you pray for me?" I placed my hand on his shoulder and began to pray. I asked God to give us the strength to perform our duty. I asked God to control our thoughts and actions and comfort the household we were about to enter. When I finished, we got out of the car and with great pain did the job that we were both called to do.

Memorial Day reminds us of the soldiers who gave their lives for our country. But often we forget to also honor the families they left behind.

Military chaplains guide soldiers and their families through the "Circle of Life" from births, baptisms, confirmations, marriage, illness to death. Our role is broader than a typical civilian minister's because we have to connect soldiers to God on a daily basis.

There was a time when I considered leaving the ministry. Then a friend asked me to join the military chaplaincy. It changed my life. The past year, I served as chaplain for a 600-soldier logistics battalion in Baghdad. Whoever said that "there are no atheists in the foxhole" was absolutely right. These soldiers had to deliver supplies along the most dangerous routes in Iraq. When bombs exploded, reality of war forced many to do some serious soul searching.

Countless soldiers came to talk to me about war, death and faith. They presented me with many perplexing theological questions: Is God on our side, and will he protect me from death? Will God forgive me if I kill an innocent person by mistake? Will God be angry with me for participating in this war? Exactly where do we really go when we die?

I am back home in the states now, a safe distance away from the death and war that challenge many servicemen and women in ways most people in our country will never fully understand.

This year, as we celebrate Memorial Day, we should pause as a nation from talk about high gas prices, what language our national anthem should be sung in and the latest celebrity gossip, and instead think about the men and women who continue to fight and die in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan. It is true: War is hell, freedom is expensive, death is painful and faith still matters — especially to those in the foxhole.

Honoring Soldiers, Not Pitying Them (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Here's a Memorial Day quiz:

1. Who is Jessica Lynch?

DOJ_NMG_0030042

Correct. She's the Army private captured, and later rescued, in the early days of the war.

2. Who is Leigh Ann Hester?

Come on. The Kentucky National Guard vehicle commander was awarded a Silver Star last year for fighting off an insurgent attack on a convoy in Iraq. The first woman to receive a Silver Star since World War II, and the first woman ever to receive one for close combat.

If you don't recognize Sergeant Hester's name, that's not surprising. While Private Lynch's ordeal appears in some 12,992 newspaper and broadcast reports on the Factiva news service, Sergeant Hester and her decoration for extraordinary valor show up in only 162.

One difference: Sergeant Hester is a victor, while Private Lynch can be seen as a victim. And when it comes to media reports about the military these days, victimology is all the rage. For every story about someone who served out of conviction and resolutely went on with his civilian life, there are many more articles about a soldier's failure or a veteran's floundering.

It's a sign of some progress that the men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan are not spit upon and shunned as Vietnam vets were. Yet there may be something more pernicious about mouthing "Support Our Troops" while also asserting that many of them are poor, uneducated dupes who were cannon fodder overseas and have come home as basket cases, plagued by a range of mental, emotional and financial problems.

The vast majority of vets don't fit that description. Many, like one returned Army guardsman we talked to, chalk up this portrayal to the media's fascination with bad news in general. As for his combat in Iraq, both "going to war and coming home is very overwhelming," he says. "But you make choices in life . . . and through inner strength and support, I am making a choice that I want to be healthy."

In some cases, the depiction of military personnel as damaged goods serves the antiwar agenda. Yet retired Marine Lieutenant Colonel Tom Linn sees more basic impulses at work. "I honestly believe it is guilt" and even resentment, he says. The military type as misfit "is a stereotype that a lot of people from the Vietnam era have held on to." Then, as now, "they saw men and women who did more than they did . . . and they'd compensate by casting those folks in an inferior status."

This Memorial Day, most of us will remember the Americans who have served their country since the Revolutionary War not with pity but with admiration. For those who want to show their gratitude, Major John Morris has some recommendations. He's deputy chaplain for Minnesota's Army National Guard and a founder of a state program called Reintegration: Beyond Reunion. Its broad goal, he explains, is to help returning guardsmen and reservists frame their "experience, to draw from it everything that they can to grow into productive citizens."

How can we help? For one thing, he says, don't assume that all struggling vets are sick, since what looks like abnormal behavior may be culture shock. But do give vets and their families the tools to adjust. Major Morris explains: "Schools, look out for these military kids. Neighbors, cut their grass and shovel their snow, babysit and do chores around the house. Employers, make sure those jobs are still there." It's the least we can do, he says: "Since there are so few of us fighting the war, it's easy for the rest of us to try."

GAO Review Finds Flaws In Hiring By Federal Agencies (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

An investigation of hiring practices by federal agencies during the first four years of the Bush administration has turned up 18 cases where political appointees apparently schemed to obtain career jobs in the civil service and stay on the public payroll for the long haul.

The practice is popularly known as "burrowing in" and happens in almost every administration. A similar investigation during the Clinton administration found 17 cases where political appointees benefited from cronyism or were given an inside track for a career job.

In a government of about 2 million employees, the job finagling is rather small. Still, allegations of favoritism trumping expertise are being taken more seriously these days on Capitol Hill because of renewed attention to the government's ability to respond to terrorist threats and to natural disasters, such as Hurricane Katrina.

One case turned up by the investigation found that a Bush administration political appointee at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, working as a staff assistant, had been selected as a program specialist despite "limited qualifications and experience."

There were 39 applicants for the job, including a career FEMA employee with more than 10 years of experience as an emergency management specialist. The experienced employee and the appointee were deemed the "best qualified," although investigators said "it is unclear" why they were given the same rating.

The appointee had worked four years in the private sector for a former FEMA director before coming to the government. The career job paid $71,357, slightly more than the staff assistant position, the investigators said.

In addition to political appointees landing jobs over more qualified applicants, investigators said some agencies created jobs for appointees and some agencies allowed appointees to jump ahead of military veterans by ignoring laws that give a hiring preference to veterans.

The investigation was conducted by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional watchdog agency, between May 2001 and April 2005 at the request of two House Democrats, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Danny K. Davis (Ill.).

They released the GAO's report on the probe yesterday. The report, which covered 41 agencies, does not name the appointees or the bosses who made the conversions possible, and it does not show whether the converted employees remain on the federal payroll.

The GAO recommended that the Office of Personnel Management undertake an executive branch review, which the OPM has agreed to do.

The GAO review found that 23 agencies converted 144 individuals from non-career to career positions during the time period studied. They ranged in salary from about $31,000 to $146,000 annually. (In the similar review of the Clinton administration, which ran from October 1998 through April 2001, the GAO found 100 appointees who had been converted to career status.)

For the Bush administration years, the GAO examined 130 conversions at the General Schedule 12 or higher pay levels, finding that 37 did not follow normal hiring practices. The GAO determined that 18 were improper, and could not find enough information about the rest to render any judgment.

In a letter to the OPM calling for corrective action, Waxman and Davis said improper conversions "are a threat to the civil service both because they implant less qualified personnel into the government and because they tarnish the integrity of the federal merit-based hiring system."

Civil service law calls for fair and open competition for federal jobs, based on what an applicant knows, not who they know. But the GAO probe found instances where agencies did not adhere to the highest hiring standards.

The Justice Department, for example, converted an appointee with less than six months of immigration law experience into an immigration judge, raising questions of fairness, the GAO said.

In one case, Waxman and Davis said, a longtime aide to a former secretary of Health and Human Services was given a career job that had been created to match the appointee's work experience. The employee received about the same in salary after the conversion, $57,550 annually.Talk Shows

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

Get the message?

Top Democrats crowded into the Sulgrave Club on Massachusetts Avenue on Wednesday evening to celebrate the first political tome of Ben Barnes, the powerhouse lobbyist and one-time Texas lieutenant governor who former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle once dubbed the "51st Democratic senator."

It was Mr. Barnes who came forward to say that in 1968 he pulled strings to get young George W. Bush into the National Guard and out of possible harm's way.

Picking up personal copies of "Barn Burning Barn Building: Tales of a Political Life, From LBJ to George W. Bush and Beyond," were Mr. Daschle, former White House Chief of Staff Mac McLarty, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, former Democratic Party leader Terry McAuliffe, former Virginia Sen. Chuck Robb and one-time Democratic Party Chairman and Ambassador to the Soviet Union Robert S. Strauss, whose wife, Helen, died a few weeks ago.

"To have Bob Strauss there saying kind words about me made for a sentimental evening," Mr. Barnes told Inside the Beltway afterward. As for the future of the Democratic Party?

"I am optimistic ... if the party message is reasons to vote for Democrats as opposed to reasons to vote against Republicans," he told us. "If they come up with that message, then there is a good chance we can win back the House, and win Senate seats, and retake the White House."

Show me the money

Want a high-paying government job? Become an air traffic controller.

While the average union-backed controller compensation already totals $166,000 per year, Congress has until June 5 to decide whether salaries will rise to the $187,000 level the Federal Aviation Administration has offered to pay, or perhaps as much as the $200,000-plus the controllers have been demanding.

All of which has led to an impasse in negotiations that began eight months ago and shifted the matter to Congress to decide, as law requires.

"Taxpayers will save $600 million if Congress allows the FAA's contract to take effect," according to Heritage Foundation fellow Ronald D. Utt. "Incredibly, a bipartisan majority in the House ... is siding with the controllers in their effort to force the taxpayers to provide them with one of the most generous pay and benefit packages available to any group of American workers."

That effort is being led by Reps. Steven C. LaTourette, Ohio Republican, and Jerry F. Costello, Illinois Democrat.

The FAA, at the same time, points out that the base pay for the estimated 14,500 controllers already has soared 75 percent over seven years, rising from $64,877 in 1998 to $113,615 last year. But when benefits are included, total compensation averaged $166,000 last year, according to Mr. Utt.

In addition, about 1,300 senior-level controllers made more than $200,000 last year with overtime and other benefits included.

One source close to the negotiations tells Inside the Beltway the controllers "cannot reasonably expect to replicate the lavish deal they were given [in 1998] by the Clinton administration — these are very different times for the aviation industry and the federal budget."

"That 1998 contract has proven to cost the U.S. taxpayer billions of dollars more than the administration had estimated at that time. This new proposal will cost taxpayers a $2.6 billion in additional costs."

Almighty power

Democrats had better not mess with Pat Robertson. One kick in the you-know-where, and who knows how far they'd travel.

The Christian Broadcasting Network is touting the fact that through "rigorous" training, its founder, a former Republican presidential candidate, recently leg-pressed a whopping 2,000 pounds — an entire ton, ladies and gentlemen, or about the weight of a compact car.

"Pat Robertson worked out at the gym on an incline leg press machine with weights up to 570 pounds," according to the CBN Web site (www.cbn.com). "Working with his physician, who was an amazing strength trainer, he worked up to 800 pounds, then 1,000 pounds.

"Then one day he was able to leg press 1,500 pounds one time. Then over the succeeding months, he trained with multiple reps of 1,200 pounds, 1,300 pounds and 1,400 pounds. One Saturday morning, his physician said, 'I'll get you bragging rights. Let's go to 2,000 pounds.'

"When 2,000 pounds was put on the machine, two men got on either side and helped push the load up, and then let it down on Mr. Robertson, who pushed it up one rep and let it go back down again."

The TV preacher says one of his secrets is consuming a high-protein shake with energy-producing nutrients.

We'll be the first to report when Mr. Robertson walks on water.

Smithsonian Hands Over TV Contract (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

The Smithsonian Institution is locked into its semi-exclusive television contract with Showtime Networks Inc. for 30 years, Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small told a House oversight committee yesterday.

Filmmakers, historians and members of Congress have criticized the contract, which has never been made public.

Small disclosed several other details about the deal:

· The Smithsonian is guaranteed $500,000 a year, and can earn additional money if Smithsonian on Demand, Showtime programming based on Smithsonian holdings, is popular with cable subscribers.

· Showtime invested "tens of millions of dollars upfront" to start Smithsonian on Demand.

· The Smithsonian can do six television programs a year with other filmmakers outside the Showtime contract.

Summoned by the House Administration Committee, chaired by Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R-Mich.), Smithsonian officials explained how the deal originated and what the new partnership means to scholars and historians seeking access to the Smithsonian's voluminous collections and its experts.

The committee was given a copy of the 170-page contract, Ehlers announced as he opened the hearing, but he said he would keep it confidential. He added that the first copy he had received was incomplete. "Large portions of the contract were redacted in the version that was submitted, making it difficult to gain a complete picture of its substance," he said. He thanked Small for providing a full text, but some committee members said they hadn't had time to read the entire document.

Some members of Congress have strenuously objected to the secrecy around the contract. They also complained that it wasn't shared with them before it was announced in March. As a sign of its displeasure the House Appropriations Committee reduced the proposed Smithsonian budget by $20 million.

Yesterday's hearing was the first time Small and Gary M. Beer, chief executive of Smithsonian Business Ventures, the brokers of the Showtime contract, have spoken publicly about the contract. Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) said the unusual aspects of the contract should have prompted the Smithsonian officials to consult Congress.

"We apologize for the hullabaloo this has caused for Congress," Small said.

With the deal, the Smithsonian said, researchers and scholars would continue to have access to the archives and other Smithsonian resources. But commercial filmmakers could make only "incidental" use of the materials unless they were working with Showtime or got special approval. Smithsonian officials have said only a very small number of filmmakers would be affected. Small said that of the 900 media contracts signed between 2000 and 2005, only 17 had more than an incidental use of Smithsonian resources.

The objections were loud and were repeated yesterday at the hearing.

"What we do know is that the resources of the Smithsonian should not be made exclusive to anyone," said Margaret Drain, vice president for national programming at Boston station WGBH, one of public television's leading producers.

Several committee members said they were deeply troubled over the length of the contract, especially if access continues to be an issue. "I'm worried about stifling people for 30 years, and Showtime doesn't want the competition," said Rep. Robert A. Brady (D-Pa.). Small said it took time to build a cable company, and establish a brand.

Small explained that the Showtime project was one way that Smithsonian was trying to bring in extra revenue. It receives 75 percent of its money from Congress. Its other funds come from a private account that includes an $800 million endowment. Small said yesterday the Smithsonian had raised $1 billion from private sources since 2000. But he also reminded the panel that the Smithsonian has a backlog of repairs that would cost billions of dollars.

The contract also gives the Smithsonian a 10 percent ownership in the Smithsonian on Demand venture. "Since the Smithsonian is not investing any money, the percentage is unusually good," Small said.

The Showtime agreement, Beer said, was reached after discussions with 10 other media companies. The conversations with Showtime started in March 2005 and were announced a year later.

Besides Drain, the committee heard from two other critics of the deal. Emily Sheketoff, executive director of the American Library Association's Washington office, suggested that the Showtime contract be annulled and that the terms of another deal with HarperCollins Publishers be disclosed. Carl Malamud, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Washington think tank, said in a rapidly changing media age, a 30-year contract was impractical. "In this Internet era, even three-year distribution contracts can be considered long," Malamud said.

Whatever the future of Smithsonian businesses, the panel emphasized that Congress needs to be keep informed.

"If we have even an idea we will come to you," Beer said.

GDP Growth Rate Revised Upward, But Housing Slowdown Looms (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

It is official: The U.S. was one of the world's fastest-growing advanced economies in the first quarter of 2006. Downbeat data on home sales, however, support economists' expectations that the distinction won't last.

The Commerce Department yesterday revised its estimate to an annualized rate of 5.3% of first-quarter growth in real gross domestic product -- a measure of the nation's output, adjusted for inflation -- from an initial estimate of 4.8%. The upward revision was smaller than expected, but still made the U.S. the second-fastest-growing economy among advanced members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development that have reported first-quarter data. Greece is in first place, with an annualized growth rate of 8.2%, according to the OECD.

Economists see the first-quarter number more as a one-time payback for an unusually slow fourth quarter -- which took the hit for Hurricane Katrina -- than an indication of how fast the economy will grow this year.

"It was a hot quarter, but it was a bit of a fluke and overstated the underlying strength of the U.S.," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consultancy Global Insight. Combined, the two quarters yielded average annualized growth of 3.5%, about the rate at which the economy has tended to expand in the long term.

The first-quarter spurt contributed to another strong quarter for business. After-tax corporate profits rose 8.8% in the first quarter to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.115 trillion. That was less than the 13.8% rise in the fourth quarter. But profits in the latest period were up 24.8% from a year earlier, the largest year-on-year increase since 2002. At 8.9%, after-tax corporate profits' share of the entire economy reached the highest level in at least 60 years.

New data on home sales, however, supported economists' predictions that the economy is likely cooling. The National Association of Realtors reported yesterday that sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 2% in April to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.76 million units.

Housing has been a major pillar of the economy in recent years as low mortgage rates fueled a home-buying boom that created lots of new jobs in everything from construction to mortgage finance. As home values rose, consumers were able to tap the equity in their homes to finance spending. A cooling housing market is expected to damp consumers' desire to spend.

Most home prices still are rising, but a growing backlog of unsold properties is putting more pressure on prices to fall. The median single-family home price in April was $222,700, up 4.3% from a year earlier, while the median price of condominiums and cooperatives was $222,000, down 0.2% from a year ago. At April's rate of sales, it would take six months to sell all the homes on the market, up from 5.6 months in March. The inventory of single-family homes, at 5.9 months, was up 40.5% from a year earlier -- the largest year-on-year rise since 1982, when the Realtors' association began collecting the data.

"What's interesting is the unbelievable speed with which people are dumping houses on the market," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at consultancy High Frequency Economics. "I don't think the market can absorb this much supply this quickly."

The factors that led to the bump up in GDP also point to slower growth ahead. A smaller-than-expected trade deficit reflected some strength in U.S. exports, but was driven mostly by a drop in oil imports that economists expect will reverse in coming months. Businesses produced more to rebuild inventories depleted by robust first-quarter sales, but that means they won't need to restock as much in the current quarter or later.

"The upward revisions leave a little less growth on the table for the remainder of 2006," said Steve Wieting, senior economist at Citigroup in New York.

Separately, a report on jobless claims suggested companies might be slowing their hiring. The Labor Department reported that 329,000 people filed for unemployment benefits in the week ended May 20. The seasonally adjusted number was down 40,000 from the previous week, but higher than economists had expected.

5.3% Growth May Be 'last Hurrah' (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy expanded at a rapid clip in the first quarter of 2006, though more recent data — including April's existing home sales — suggest the pace of growth is slowing, according to reports Thursday.

The Commerce Department said gross domestic product, the broadest measure of goods and services produced in the country, expanded at a brisk 5.3% pace in the first three months of 2006, well above a previous 4.8% estimate.

The new numbers reflect stronger exports and inventory replenishing by U.S. firms. But economists said business activity is not likely to sustain that robust pace.

"The strong first-quarter data may well be the last hurrah of this phase of the current expansion," says Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight, who expects growth to slow to a 3% to 3.5% pace in the second quarter, and 3% in the second half of the year.

Behravesh says the report contained some cautionary signs for the Federal Reserve as it debates whether to continue raising its target for short-term interest rates, now at 5%. A measure of core inflation, a gauge of prices that excludes food and energy, rose at a 2% rate. That's at the top of the Fed's comfort level.

In other economic news:

·The National Association of Realtors said existing home sales, the bulk of the housing market, fell 2% in April from the previous month and were nearly 6% below year-ago levels. Home prices rose, but at a much more moderate pace than the frenzied increases of recent years. The national median home price was $223,000 in April, up 4.2% from a year ago.

"Higher interest rates are slowing home sales, but we see this as another sign of a soft landing in the housing sector," says David Lereah, chief economist for the National Association of Realtors.

·Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said the central bank needs to track stock and housing prices when setting interest-rate policy but emphasized that it is not the Fed's job to try to influence asset prices or pop bubbles.

"A central bank cannot ignore movements in stock prices, home values and other asset prices but should respond to them only to the extent that they have implications for future output and inflation," Bernanke said in a letter in response to questions from Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J.

·The American Trucking Association's index of trucking volume rose a seasonally adjusted 2% in April, the biggest increase since January 2005. The increase followed two months of declines and suggests a strengthening economy. Nearly three-quarters of the goods shipped around the country are transported on trucks, so the ATA's gauge can be considered a barometer for the overall economy.

"April was a good sign that truck volumes are improving from the challenging first quarter," says ATA chief economist Bob Costello.

Dow Industrials Climb 93.73 Points As Economic Data Come In Just Right (WSJ)

By Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

Emboldened by just-right readings on the economy, investors gave the Dow Jones Industrial Average a two-day winning streak for its 110th birthday.

Jittery traders cheered a Commerce Department report showing ample economic growth in the first quarter, but not enough to stoke the inflation and interest-rate-increase fears that rattled the markets for two weeks.

The Dow industrials gained 93.73 points, or 0.84%, to 11211.05 amid a flurry of late-afternoon buying. It was the industrial average's biggest gain in almost three weeks. The Dow average, which made its debut on May 26, 1896, is up 4.6% on the year and is back within 4% of its all-time high of 11722.98 that it neared on May 10.

"After a difficult couple of weeks, stocks were oversold," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at money-management group T. Rowe Price. "The economic figures made people comfortable."

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 14.31, or 1.14%, to 1272.88, while the tech-laden Nasdaq Composite Index gained 29.07 or 1.34% to 2198.24. Small stocks posted the biggest gains with the Russell 2000 adding 14.31 points, or 2.01%, to 725.58.

Commodities recovered from declines posted Wednesday. Crude oil gained $1.46, or 2.09%, to $71.32 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold advanced $11.40, or 1.79%, to $648.40 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex. Crude and gold are up 17% and 25%, respectively, so far this year.

Bond prices and the dollar slipped.

Traders' spirits were buoyed before the market opened when the Commerce Department raised its estimate of the economy's first-quarter growth, but left inflation measures mostly unchanged. Investors also digested unsurprising tallies of jobless claims and existing-home sales.

A deal between two behemoths helped pushed technology shares higher. Online giants Yahoo and eBay unveiled a partnership to better compete with search-engine giant Google Inc. Shares of Yahoo and eBay rose 3.6% and 12%, respectively, on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Markets didn't seem to react when a federal jury in Houston found former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling guilty of conspiracy and fraud charges stemming from that company's 2001 collapse.

Still, yesterday's gains may be a brief respite, with investors scrutinizing each economic data point. "This is the fox-trot economy," says Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James. "One figure is fast and the next is slow."

Shares of General Electric, the only initial Dow component included in the current industrial average, rose 16 cents or 0.5%, to $34.42 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.58, or 0.75%, to 212.95.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.46 billion shares, as 2,541 issues rose and 745 fell.

Bonds fell2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 9/32, or $2.81 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.076%. The 30-year Treasury fell 1/2 to yield 5.173%.

The dollar fell3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 111.78 yen, down from 112.66 yen. The euro rose against the U.S. currency to $1.2795 from $1.2778.

Home Economics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

The political left insists that the current economy, however strong, is leaving minorities behind, and that the gains of some have come at the expense of others. But a new study on homeownership by the National Association of Realtors suggests that the benefits of recent economic growth have been more widespread than critics want to admit.

We already knew that U.S. homeownership overall is at an all-time high of nearly 70%. The minority homeownership rate of 52% is also unprecedented. Now comes news that minorities are also increasing their share of second-home purchases. According to the Realtor report, minorities accounted "for 11% of vacation home purchases between 2003 and 2005 in contrast with 6% of purchases in 2002 or earlier. In the investment property segment, minorities accounted for 17% of transactions between 2003 and 2005 compared with 11 percent in 2002 or earlier."

Among minorities, black and Latino gains were most impressive. In 2002, Latinos comprised 2% of vacation homeowners. That number jumped to 7% last year. The percentage of black investment property owners increased to 8% from 3% over the same period.

Homeownership, a traditional measure of economic well-being, does more than just help families build equity. The children of homeowners tend to perform better in school and have fewer behavioral problems. And home equity is a major source of collateral for people seeking bank loans to start new businesses.

The media prefer to focus on economic disparity rather than minority progress, especially when a Republican happens to be occupying the White House. But these homeownership figures indicate than an increasing number of racial and ethnic minorities are doing a whole lot better than just getting by. Many are thriving. More surely will.

Diocese To Sell Headquarters To Help Settle Abuse Claims (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Spokane, Wash., is selling its headquarters and other property valued at about $11 million as part of its effort to settle claims by victims of sexual abuse by members of the clergy.

The diocese is one of three in the country that have filed for bankruptcy; the others are those in Portland, Ore., and Tucson.

Although the Spokane diocese announced its intention to sell diocesan assets when it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2004, the fact that those assets are now going on the market underscores the financial strain many dioceses face as they address hundreds of millions of dollars in claims by victims of sexual abuse.

"I think it is symbolically significant," said the Rev. John J. Coughlin, a Franciscan priest and a law professor at the University of Notre Dame, specializing in civil and canon law. "The diocese doesn't need the physical building to exist. But the sale shows that the effects of the sex abuse crisis are serious, for this and other dioceses as well."

In a report issued in March, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said that in 2005, dioceses in the United States paid $399 million in settlements with victims of sexual abuse and $68 million in legal fees and support programs for victims, a sharp increase from the year before.

The church's total payments resulting from the sexual abuse scandal have surpassed $1 billion, and many dioceses have yet to reach settlements with victims.

The number of victims has exceeded 12,000. Nearly 5,000 priests have been implicated in abuse dating from as long ago as 1950. Most of the abuse occurred from the mid-1960's to the mid-1980's.

Each diocese has tried to find a way to address the many claims against it, including filing for bankruptcy. Barbara Dorris, victims' outreach director for a group called Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said bankruptcy was a way to avoid answering charges in court that officials might have covered up sexual abuse by their clergy.

But the experience of the Spokane diocese exposes some of the perils of bankruptcy, Father Coughlin said. The diocese faces 185 claims totaling more than $200 million, said Shaun Cross, a lawyer for the diocese with the Paine Hamblin firm of Spokane.

Recently, a federal bankruptcy judge ruled that the parishes and schools in the diocese belonged to the bishop's office and could be sold to settle abuse claims, Mr. Cross said. The diocese, which argues that the bishop holds those properties in trust, is appealing the ruling to avoid selling the properties.

Those properties are valued at about $80 million, and the judge has yet to rule on seminaries, retreats and charities in the diocese.

The diocesan headquarters, called the chancery, has an asking price of $1.5 million, Mr. Cross said. Once it is sold, the diocesan staff could stay there until the end of 2007.

Spokane's bishop, William S. Skylstad, president of the bishops conference, himself faces an accusation of sexual abuse brought by a woman that dates to the early 1960's. Bishop Skylstad has denied wrongdoing.

By filing for bankruptcy, the Spokane diocese may have thought it would be limiting its financial liability, Father Coughlin said, though that has not been the case so far.

"One of the things that a bishop has to consider is once a diocese files for bankruptcy protection and goes under receivership, then the federal bankruptcy judge has control of all the assets," Father Coughlin said. "Many bishops rightly are reluctant to hand that kind of authority to a federal judge."

Support Weak For Harris In Senate Poll (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

The Associated Press, May 25, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris had weak support in a poll released Thursday that includes the three little-known entries in the Republican U.S. Senate primary.

Only 37 percent of respondents said they favored Harris, compared to 13 percent for Will McBride, 4 percent for LeRoy Collins Jr. and 2 percent for Peter Monroe. Her three opponents all entered the race May 12, which was the last day to get on the Sept. 5 primary ballot.

More respondents - 43 percent - didn't choose a candidate. In a head-to-head with Democratic incumbent Bill Nelson, Harris trailed Nelson 58-25.

The poll was conducted by Quinnipiac University May 12-22. It surveyed 1,086 registered voters and had an overall margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points. The poll surveyed 424 Republican voters about the primary, with a margin of error of plus or minus 4.8 percentage points.

"Given how well known Congresswoman Harris is among Republicans and how well thought of she has been by them, it is somewhat surprising that she would only get 37 percent support," said Peter Brown, assistant director of the school's polling institute. "The fact that 63 percent of Republicans say they prefer either the other three or are undecided is remarkable."

Harris spokesman Chris Ingram said, "We don't comment on polls."

Harris's campaign has been troubled nearly from the start with poor fundraising, an effort by GOP leaders to find another candidate, a complete turnover in core campaign staff, her association with a corrupt defense contractor who gave her $32,000 in illegal campaign contributions and her decision to spend $10 million of her own money on the race.

Collins, who's father served as a Democratic governor from 1955 to 1961, is a businessman who retired from the U.S. Navy Reserve as a rear admiral. Monroe is a developer who has worked with the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development and helped manage the government's savings and loan bailout in the early 1990s. McBride is an Orlando lawyer.

Collins and Monroe said they expected the low numbers, considering that the survey was taken so soon after they got in the race.

"I've got to establish identity, I know that. No surprise, nothing disheartening," Monroe said. "That poll in a month will look very different."

Added Collins: "There's no reason for me to expect as much as I'm showing now, simply because I'm not that well known. Probably what's there is a little name recognition from my dad."

McBride's campaign didn't return phone calls and an e-mail seeking comment. McBride earlier this week said he would not discuss his candidacy until later this month.

Monroe, though, suggested that the 13 percent McBride received was probably boosted by voters recognizing the name from the governor's race four years ago, when Tampa lawyer Bill McBride won the Democratic nomination to challenge Gov. Jeb Bush. Bill and Will McBride aren't related.

"A lot of people are going to think 'McBride, Hmmm. I think I recognize that name,'" Monroe said.

Nelson increased his lead over Harris even though Harris ran a statewide television ad since an April 20 Quinnipiac poll, which had Nelson ahead 56-27.

Still, the Nelson campaign refused to gloat about the numbers.

"We're not paying attention to the polls," said Nelson campaign manager Chad Clanton. "We're expecting it's going to be a tough, competitive race in the end and we're doing everything we can every day to be prepared and we take nothing for granted."

A Test Of Our Character (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0030050

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

In his new movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," Al Gore suggests that there are three reasons it's hard to get action on global warming. The first is boiled-frog syndrome: because the effects of greenhouse gases build up gradually, at any given moment it's easier to do nothing. The second is the perception, nurtured by a careful disinformation campaign, that there's still a lot of uncertainty about whether man-made global warming is a serious problem. The third is the belief, again fostered by disinformation, that trying to curb global warming would have devastating economic effects.

I'd add a fourth reason, which I'll talk about in a minute. But first, let's notice that Mr. Gore couldn't have asked for a better illustration of disinformation campaigns than the reaction of energy-industry lobbyists and right-wing media organizations to his film.

The cover story in the current issue of National Review is titled "Scare of the Century." As evidence that global warming isn't really happening, it offers the fact that some Antarctic ice sheets are getting thicker — a point also emphasized in a TV ad by the Competitive Enterprise Institute, which is partly financed by large oil companies, whose interests it reliably represents.

Curt Davis, a scientist whose work is cited both by the institute and by National Review, has already protested. "These television ads," he declared in a press release, "are a deliberate effort to confuse and mislead the public about the global warming debate." He points out that an initial increase in the thickness of Antarctica's interior ice sheets is a predicted consequence of a warming planet, so that his results actually support global warming rather than refuting it.

Even as the usual suspects describe well-founded concerns about global warming as hysteria, they issue hysterical warnings about the economic consequences of environmentalism. "Al Gore's global warming movie: could it destroy the economy?" Fox News asked.

Well, no, it couldn't. There's some dispute among economists over how forcefully we should act to curb greenhouse gases, but there's broad consensus that even a very strong program to reduce emissions would have only modest effects on economic growth. At worst, G.D.P. growth might be, say, one-tenth or two-tenths of a percentage point lower over the next 20 years. And while some industries would lose jobs, others would gain.

Actually, the right's panicky response to Mr. Gore's film is probably a good thing, because it reveals for all to see the dishonesty and fear-mongering on which the opposition to doing something about climate change rests.

But "An Inconvenient Truth" isn't just about global warming, of course. It's also about Mr. Gore. And it is, implicitly, a cautionary tale about what's been wrong with our politics.

Why, after all, was Mr. Gore's popular-vote margin in the 2000 election narrow enough that he could be denied the White House? Any account that neglects the determination of some journalists to make him a figure of ridicule misses a key part of the story. Why were those journalists so determined to jeer Mr. Gore? Because of the very qualities that allowed him to realize the importance of global warming, many years before any other major political figure: his earnestness, and his genuine interest in facts, numbers and serious analysis.

And so the 2000 campaign ended up being about the candidates' clothing, their mannerisms, anything but the issues, on which Mr. Gore had a clear advantage (and about which his opponent was clearly both ill informed and dishonest).

I won't join the sudden surge of speculation about whether "An Inconvenient Truth" will make Mr. Gore a presidential contender. But the film does make a powerful case that Mr. Gore is the sort of person who ought to be running the country.

Since 2000, we've seen what happens when people who aren't interested in the facts, who believe what they want to believe, sit in the White House. Osama bin Laden is still at large, Iraq is a mess, New Orleans is a wreck. And, of course, we've done nothing about global warming.

But can the sort of person who would act on global warming get elected? Are we — by which I mean both the public and the press — ready for political leaders who don't pander, who are willing to talk about complicated issues and call for responsible policies? That's a test of national character. I wonder whether we'll pass.

U.S. Aide Doubts Tehran Will Bend (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

The top American diplomat at the U.N. nuclear watchdog held out little hope yesterday that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will give up programs that could lead to the development of a nuclear weapon.

"We shouldn't fool ourselves. The president of Iran is not someone who is swayed by normal diplomatic demarches," said Ambassador Greg Schulte, U.S. representative to the Vienna, Austria-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

But Mr. Schulte, speaking to reporters and analysts during a Washington visit, said that there also were divisions within Iran's ruling Islamic regime over Tehran's nuclear confrontation, and that the United States and its allies must give Iran a clear path to back down.

Although the hard-line Iranian president "wants a crisis," the U.S. government and its negotiating partners "have to make clear to him and to the leadership that there is a better path to take," Mr. Schulte said.

Diplomats from Germany and the five U.N. Security Council permanent powers -- the United States, France, Britain, Russia and China -- are expected to gather again next week in Europe to try to agree on a package of carrots and sticks designed to induce Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday.

Envoys from Canada, Italy and Japan are expected to join the negotiations.

U.S. officials said that a meeting Wednesday in London produced progress on the outlines of an offer to Tehran, but that more talks were needed. The package of incentives and sanctions is designed to get Tehran to halt uranium enrichment, which can lead to the production of either electrical power or a nuclear bomb.

Last night, President Bush said he would consider providing incentives to Iran if it agreed to resume a suspension on nuclear-enrichment activities that the United States thinks is aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

Mr. Bush, at a White House press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, said the two leaders spent a lot of time discussing strategy on how to resolve the Iranian nuclear crisis.

Iran insists its programs are solely for peaceful civilian energy needs, but the IAEA's 35-nation board has found that Tehran has refused to cooperate on inspection and verification programs needed to validate those claims.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei, who briefed top Bush administration officials this week, will update IAEA board members at a June 12 meeting in Vienna on Iran's cooperation, Mr. Schulte said.

"At this point, I don't think [Mr. ElBaradei] will have much to report," he said.

On other issues, Mr. Schulte:

· Denied that a proposed U.S. civilian nuclear deal with India -- which never signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty -- had undermined Washington's campaign against Iran. "I hear that argument a lot more in Washington than I do in Vienna," he said.

He said members of the 30-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group, which must approve parts of the special deal for India, expressed growing support for the deal in their most recent meeting.

·Said the United States and its allies hope to present a plan at the June IAEA board meeting that would guarantee nuclear fuel supplies for countries that agree not to enrich uranium on their own soil, with a final deal possible by the end of the year.

·Said IAEA inspectors have found Iran's nuclear scientists to be "technically competent" and "motivated," but he added that there was no hard and fast estimate on when Iran might be able to produce a nuclear weapon.

"Anybody who gives an exact time frame on that probably doesn't know what he is talking about," he said.

US Debates Carrots, Sticks For Iran's Nuclear Program (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY - Amid a din of uncompromising rhetoric from and about Iran, the UN's permanent five powers and Germany this week worked to hammer out a package of incentives and threats they hope will ensure the Islamic Republic's nuclear program is limited to peaceful purposes.

On the table: giving Iran nuclear reactors and providing fuel for energy production, as well as economic and security incentives. In exchange, Iran would have to give up uranium enrichment - a step that can lead to weapons production - or face UN sanctions or even an arms embargo.

Cutting through layers of mistrust to determine any US role - as well as Iran's ultimate goals - will not be easy, given a relationship calcified by more than 25 years of hostile rhetoric and official silence. But increasingly, analysts say that any deal ultimately depends on direct talks between the US and Iran - and possibly a US "security guarantee" that it will not attack Iran.

"If you are going to solve the problem permanently, US participation is a must," says Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University who was recently at Columbia University in New York. "It's like the ... elephant in the room. Everybody knows [the US] is there, but not talking about it is not going to solve the problem."

Britain, France, and Germany are spearheading the diplomatic effort on the UN Security Council. But Russia and China are loath to back sanctions that they believe could lead to an arms embargo or military action. Senior diplomats from those nations and the US reported "progress" during talks in London on Wednesday, but no agreement.

Foreign ministers of all six countries are expected to meet shortly, and Russia's National Security Council chief Igor Ivanov has been invited to meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani in coming days in Tehran.

Analysts say that "red lines" on both sides have been shifting, but that no deal is likely to stand unless the US and Iran engage in direct talks. An American "security guarantee" for Iran may be required, experts say, but so far US officials dismiss any deal that would ensure the survival of Iran's current government.

"When the US avoids giving a security guarantee [to Iran], it means they surely want to collapse and destroy the regime," says Saeed Laylaz, a political and security analyst in Tehran. "It is very good for the hard-liners in Iran. They like a critical situation in which they can say to the people: 'The United States of America is why we have trouble in the world.'"

Mr. Laylaz says that Iran would be willing to "stop" uranium enrichment completely with the right deal: a security guarantee, then getting the US directly involved in nuclear negotiations. US sanctions should be removed, he adds, and Iran integrated more fully into the global economy.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow did not rule out the possibility of talks on Wednesday, but said that Iran would have to halt enrichment first. "When that happens, all right, then there may be some opportunities," said Mr. Snow.

The result is a dilemma for Iran. "If you know the US wants to destroy you, and the four borders of your country are occupied by the US military, you know that you should accelerate your uranium enrichment, not suspend it," says Laylaz. "But at the same time, [Iranian officials] are asking the US: 'Please come to the table and start negotiating.' Because they realize there is no country in the world ... that can stop the US if it wants to militarily attack Iran."

Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), indicated during talks on Wednesday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Iran might delay enrichment plans for five or six years and accept the intrusive inspections of the "additional protocol" of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

"The default position in Iranian foreign policy is hard-line, and you have to work hard to bring it the other way," says Shahram Chubin, director of studies at the Geneva Centre for Security Policy.

"The hard-line conservatives in Iran believe that dealing with the Americans and the West is a contaminating thing, that you are going to give up all your values, and end up being ... a nothing," says Mr. Chubin. "And the whole essence of the revolution is as an example, a model in the Islamic world. They have a vanguard reputation, and they're not going to give it up - there is a lot there."

Still, Iran has been signaling that it wants to talk. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a letter to Mr. Bush on May 8, the first such high-level public contact since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution. Though it was full of tough and critical talk, experts suggest that a Bush response - ruled out for now - could be first steps toward dialogue.

One day later, another letter from Iran's former top nuclear negotiator, Hassan Rohani, who remains the influential representative of Iran's top religious leader on the Supreme National Security Council, was published in Time magazine, taking a "good cop" tone to Mr. Ahmadinejad's "bad cop."

"Iran is intent on producing nuclear fuel domestically for reasons both historic and long-term economic," he wrote, laying out an eight-point plan for a negotiated solution.

Past failures to declare aspects of nuclear programs "are not uncommon among NPT members," and "an Iranian secret weapon program is only hype," Mr. Rohani wrote. "A solution imposed on Iran by the Security Council is unlikely to provide assurances the US seeks about the Iranian nuclear program."

Iran has enriched small quantities of uranium to levels needed for nuclear fuel in recent weeks, using a cascade of 164 centrifuges. Iran wants to start two more such pilot projects in coming months - before beginning production with tens of thousands of centrifuges to fuel a Russian-made reactor at Bushehr. That reactor should be completed later this year. .

Ahmadinejad on Wednesday claimed that Iran had mastered "the entire nuclear fuel cycle from start to finish," and that it would never give it up.

"The minimum [acceptable to Iran] would be at least to have this 164-centrifuge cascade running - this is a red line," says Mr. Hadian-Jazy. The US holds that all enrichment must stop; some Europeans and IAEA diplomats say that is unrealistic.

"Is it worth - and I'm talking about both parties--to go to war for one cascade?" asks Hadian-Jazy. "[Iran] is ready to give a more intrusive inspection regime, real-time monitoring, ratifying the Additional Protocol, accepting some transparency measures..."

The picture in Iran is further clouded by local politics. "When you ask, 'What do the Iranians want?' the answer is: 'Which Iranians?' " says Chubin at the Geneva Centre. "It's certainly true that Rohani and [former president and head of the powerful Expediency Council Ali Akbar] Rafsanjani believe Iran should use the leverage of their ... program to cut an overall deal with the West.

"The other view, of Ahmadinejad and Larijani, is that: 'We've got the power; we don't need anyone's help with our own security,' " says Chubin. "They want nuclear weapons to be the leading power in the region, in order to be in opposition to the West, and they have no interest in a global grand bargain."

DOJ_NMG_0030053

And there is another player, whose vote in Iran counts above all others: Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. "They don't want a military attack," says analyst Laylaz. "It's not the hard-liners' [red line], but the Leader's red line."

"I'm not sure about US policy toward Iran," adds Leylaz. "If they test a potential negotiated way, and ask strongly to suspend any uranium enrichment, we can avoid a catastrophe. Otherwise, I'm not sure about the future."

Hizbullah Factor In Iran Fray (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

SHEIKH ABBAD HILL, LEBANON - In the spring sunshine, the 70-mile Lebanon-Israel frontier of olive groves and fields of bright green tobacco appears a picture of rural calm. But the looming confrontation between the West and Tehran ensures that tensions linger here, with Iran-backed Hizbullah fortifying its frontline observation posts and Israel recently increasing its aerial reconnaissance patrols over Lebanon.

One alarming scenario gaining attention is if Iran's nuclear facilities come under attack by the US or Israel, it could inadvertently trigger a violent confrontation between Lebanon's Hizbullah and the Israeli military.

Hizbullah this week aired fresh warnings on the extent of its massive rocket arsenal, reinforcing concerns in Israel that it will be targeted as part of Tehran's retaliation to a strike against its nuclear sites.

"We have the power to destroy important and sensitive targets in northern occupied Palestine," Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbullah's secretary-general said in a speech marking the sixth anniversary this week of Israel's troop withdrawal from south Lebanon.

"The resistance now has over 13,000 rockets. All of north occupied Palestine is within our firing range. This is the minimum range. As for the range beyond the north ... it is best to be silent," he added, hinting at the existence of long-range rockets in Hizbullah's armory.

Earlier this month, Major General Amos Gilad, a senior Israeli defense ministry official, said that while Iran's main strategic arm was its long-range Shihab-3 missiles, "their second arm is Hizbullah, which has 13,000 to 14,000 rockets that threaten Israel."

Still, there are compelling reasons why Hizbullah would refrain from military action, analysts say.

Although Hizbullah looks to Iran for guidance and much of its logistical and financial support, the Shiite organization has spent the past decade and a half shedding its image as a tool of Iranian foreign policy. The party has the overwhelming support of Lebanon's Shiite community, the largest sect within the country, and it is represented by 14 politicians in Lebanon's parliament and entered the government for the first time last summer.

That assimilation into mainstream politics has helped bolster the party at a time when it faces intense pressure to disband its military wing. Last week, the UN Security Council adopted a French-proposed resolution that in part repeated a call for Hizbullah's disarmament. Hizbullah refuses to disarm, saying it is a vital component of Lebanon's defense strategy and that yielding its weapons would only benefit Israel, an argument that resonates with most Lebanese Shiites, if not other Lebanese.

"The irony is that without a US/French campaign against Hizbullah's arms, the party would have been in a much more difficult position to defend the rationale of continuing resistance," says Reinoud Leenders, assistant professor of politics at the University of Amsterdam and former Beirut-based analyst with the International Crisis Group.

Many non-Shiite Lebanese are uncomfortable with a political party possessing weapons, saying it risks Lebanon becoming embroiled in external conflicts.

Hizbullah officials, however, say that its weapons are for the defense of Lebanon, not Iran. "Iran is capable of launching its own retaliation," says Ahmad Malli, a member of Hizbullah's political council. "It's not logical for Iran as a regional power to ask a small organization to attack Israel."

The domestic constraints on Hizbullah convince many analysts, including some critics, that the party is unlikely to attack Israel in a knee-jerk reaction to a military strike against its Iranian backer.

"Any act that is perceived internationally and domestically as serving Iran would call Hizbullah's Lebanese credentials into serious doubt and confirm the widely circulated hypothesis that Hizbullah is Iran's proxy in Lebanon," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, assistant professor of politics at the Lebanese-American University and author of "Hizbullah: Politics and Religion."

However, Mr. Malli offered another scenario in which Israel launches a preemptive strike against Hizbullah to degrade Tehran's retaliatory options in the event of an attack.

"If Israel attacks Iran, it may well attack other targets at the same time, including Hizbullah in Lebanon," he says. "In that case, Hizbullah has the right to defend itself and Lebanon with all possible means."

Far from a theoretical concept, Malli's scenario is one that is under serious consideration by Israel, says Gerald Steinberg, professor of politics at Israel's Bar Ilan University.

DOJ_NMG_0030054

"Hizbullah is seen as the main force of the Iranian response, and IDF [Israel Defense Force] planners could be expected to be prepared for such a strike [against Hizbullah] in the context of a military move against Iran," he says. "Some Israelis would argue that since a Hizbullah response in the event of an attack on Iran is inevitable, not striking against Hizbullah would be irrational."

The uncomfortable proximity in which these bitter foes find themselves is best illustrated on this wind-swept hilltop 2,400 feet above northern Galilee.

Nestled against the Israeli side of the fence is a massive structure bristling with antennae, cameras, and rotating radar dishes. Yards away on the Lebanese side is Hizbullah's bunker of bulldozed earth ramparts surmounted by two metal turrets that Hizbullah has had fitted with bulletproof glass windows. Closer to the fence, Hizbullah has erected surveillance cameras pointing at the Israeli position.

UN officials believe Hizbullah's construction work is probably defensive in nature, to improve the monitoring of Israeli troop movements, rather than preparations for an attack. But in this volatile corner of the Middle East, misreading the intentions of the enemy can have dangerous consequences.

"Hizbullah ultimately benefits from the West's inflated assessment of its capabilities and intentions," says Mr. Leenders, the Dutch academic. "It effectively presents them as a source of deterrence without them having to lift a finger."

Say No To Tehran's Gambit (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

All of a sudden, revolutionary Iran has offered direct talks with the United States. All of a sudden, the usual suspects -- European commentators, American liberals, dissident CIA analysts, Madeleine Albright -- are urging the administration to take the bait.

It is not rare to see a regime such as Iran's -- despotic, internally weak, feeling the world closing in -- attempt so transparent a ploy to relieve pressure on itself. What is rare is to see the craven alacrity with which such a ploy is taken up by others.

Mark my words. The momentum for U.S.-Iran negotiations has only begun. The focus of the entire Iranian crisis will begin to shift from the question of whether Tehran will stop its nuclear program to whether Washington will sit down alone at the table with Tehran.

To this cynical bait-and-switch, there can be no American response other than No. Absolutely not.

Just yesterday the world was excoriating the Bush administration for its unilateralism -- on Kyoto, the ABM Treaty and, most especially, Iraq -- and demanding that Washington act in concert with the "international community." Just yesterday the Democratic nominee for president attacked President Bush's foreign policy precisely for refusing to consult with, listen to and work with "the allies."

Another day, another principle. Bush is now being pressured to abandon multilateralism and go it alone with Iran. Remember: In September 2003, after Iran was discovered cheating on its nuclear program, the United States wanted immediate U.N. action. The allies argued for a softer approach. Britain, France and Germany wanted to negotiate with Tehran and offer diplomatic and economic carrots in return for Iran's giving up its nuclear weapons program. The United States acquiesced.

After 2 1/2 years of utter futility, the E.U. Three had to admit failure and acknowledge the obvious: Iran had no intention of giving up its nuclear ambitions. Iran made the point irrefutable when it broke International Atomic Energy Agency seals and brazenly resumed uranium enrichment.

The full understanding we had with our allies was that if the E.U. Three process failed, we would go to the Security Council together and get sanctions imposed on Iran. Yes, Russia and China might still stand in the way. But even so, concerted sanctions by America, Europe and other economic powers could have devastating effects on Iran and its shaky clerical dictatorship.

Which is why the mullahs launched this recent initiative. They know, and fear, that if the West persists on its present and agreed course, they face sanctions so serious that their rule, already unpopular, might be in jeopardy. The very fact that Iran is desperately trying to change the subject, change the venue and shift the burden onto the United States shows how close the mullahs believe we are to achieving major international pressure on them.

Pushing Washington to abandon the multilateral process and enter negotiations alone is more than rank hypocrisy. It is a pernicious folly. It would short-circuit the process that, after years of dithering, is about to yield its first fruits: sanctions that Tehran fears. It would undo the allied consensus, produce endless new delays and give Iran more time to reach the point of no return, after which its nuclear status would be a fait accompli .

Entering negotiations carries with it the responsibility to do something if they fail. The E.U. Three understood that when they took on the mullahs a couple of years ago. Bilateral U.S.-Iran talks are the perfect way to get Europe off the hook. They would preempt all the current discussions about sanctions, place all responsibility for success on the negotiations and set America up to take the blame for their inevitable failure.

It is an obvious trap. We should resolutely say no.

Except on one condition. If the allies, rather than shift responsibility for this entire process back to Washington, will reassert their responsibility by pledging support for U.S. and/or coalition military action against Iran in the event that the bilateral talks fail, then we might achieve something.

You want us to talk? Fine. We will go there, but only if you arm us with the largest stick of all: your public support for military action if the talks fail. The mullahs already fear economic sanctions; they will fear European-backed U.S. military action infinitely more. Such negotiations might actually accomplish something.

That's our condition. Otherwise, the entire suggestion of bilateral talks is a ploy that should be rejected with the same contempt with which it was proposed.

It's Time To Engage With Iran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

"Only connect." That was the trademark line of E.M. Forster's great novel "Howards End." And it's a useful injunction in thinking about U.S. strategy toward Iran and the wider conflicts between the West and the Muslim world.

We are in the early stages of what the Centcom commander, Gen. John Abizaid, calls "the first war of globalization, between openness and closed societies." One key to winning that war, Abizaid told a small group of reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, is to expand openness and connection. He called al-Qaeda "the military arm of the closed order." The same could be said of the extremist mullahs in Tehran who are pushing for nuclear weapons.

America's best strategy is to play to its strengths -- which are the open exchange of ideas, backed up by unmatched military power. The need for connection is especially clear in the case of Iran, which in isolation has remained frozen in revolutionary zealotry like an exotic fruit in aspic. Yet some in the Bush administration cling to the idea that isolation is a good thing and that connectivity will somehow weaken the West's position. That ignores the obvious lesson of the past 40 years, which is that isolation has usually failed (as in the cases of Cuba and North Korea), while connectivity has usually succeeded (as in the cases of the Soviet Union and China).

A telling example was the decision to engage the Soviet Union in 1973 through the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe. At the time, some conservatives argued that it was a dangerous concession that the Soviets might interpret as a symbol of weakness. But the CSCE provided a crucial forum for dissidents in Russia and Eastern Europe, and with astonishing speed the mighty edifice of Soviet power began to crumble. Similar warnings about showing weakness in the face of an aggressive adversary were voiced when President Richard Nixon went to China in February 1972.

I cite this Cold War history because the moment has come for America to attempt to engage revolutionary Iran. The invitation for such a dialogue came this month in a letter to President Bush from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad -- a man whose rabble-rousing, Israel-baiting career gave him the credentials, if that's the right word, to break a 27-year Iranian taboo on contacts with the Great Satan.

Ahmadinejad's letter clearly had the backing of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. In the American context, that's like having the support of Vice President Cheney for a peace feeler. My own Iranian sources say there is broad consensus in Tehran that it is time for talks with the United States. "Iran wants to start discussions the same way the Chinese wanted discussions" with Nixon, an Iranian businessman named Ali Ettefagh told me in an e-mail this week. "Great Satan doesn't sell anymore. More than half the population was not born 27 years ago, and the broken record does not play well." The Iranian offer of dialogue, he says, "ought to be taken as an opportunity, if only to air out grievances and amplify differences."

I suspect Iran wants dialogue now partly because it perceives America's position in Iraq as weak and its own as strong. That may be true, but so what? Washington should still take yes for an answer. The United States and its European allies this week are crafting a package that, one hopes, will include everything the Iranian people could want -- except nuclear weapons. The bundle of goodies should stress connectivity -- more air travel to Iran, more scholarships for students, more exchanges, Iranian membership in the World Trade Organization. The mullahs may well reject these incentives as threatening, but that's the point. Their retrograde theocracy can't last long in an open world. This very week, about 40 police officers were injured in a clash with demonstrators at two Tehran universities. One of the hand-lettered protest signs captured in an Iranian photo said: "This is not a seminary, it is a university."

Karim Sadjadpour, an Iranian analyst with the International Crisis Group, noted in Senate testimony last week that opinion polls show 75 percent of Iranians favor relations with the United States. "Embarking on a comprehensive dialogue with Iran would provide the U.S. with the opportunity to match its rhetorical commitment to Iranian democracy and human rights with action," Sadjadpour said. He's right.

There's no guarantee that a policy of engagement will work. The Iranian regime's desire to acquire nuclear weapons may be so unyielding that Tehran and Washington will remain on a collision course. But America and its allies will be in a stronger position for responding to Iranian calls for dialogue. Openness isn't a concession by America, it's a strategic weapon.

Abbas Threatens Hamas With Measure Implicitly Recognizing Israel (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, May 25, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank - Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued a surprise ultimatum to his Hamas rivals on Thursday: Break the political stalemate imperiling the Palestinian government within 10 days or he'll ask voters to approve a measure that would implicitly recognize Israel.

Hamas officials appeared caught off-guard by Abbas' threat to hold a referendum in July. Some leaders voiced optimism that they would be able to work out their differences, while others criticized Abbas for trying to bully them.

A referendum accepting the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel would put the issue directly before Palestinian voters for the first time - and the outcome would be uncertain. While polls have shown broad support among Palestinians for a two-state solution, voters also dumped Abbas' long-dominant Fatah party in favor of the Muslim fundamentalist Hamas in part because of frustration over compromises that Fatah had made in peace talks with Israel.

Speaking at the start of a unity conference, Abbas put Hamas leaders on notice that he's running out of patience with a power struggle that in recent weeks has broken out into confrontations between rival gunmen in Gaza streets.

"Our cause is at stake," Abbas said, in demanding a quick response from Hamas. "We cannot afford the luxury of time."

"There is no need for such threats from the president," said Hamas lawmaker Abdel Jaber Fuqaha. "Let the dialogue take its normal course."

The Palestinian Authority has faced a number of challenges ever since January, when voters catapulted Hamas, a movement formally committed to Israel's destruction, into power over Fatah, which accepts Israel's right to exist.

The United States and Europe have cut off aid, and Israel has been withholding tax receipts it collects on the Palestinians' behalf, creating a financial crisis.

In recent weeks, the factional feud has erupted into near-daily clashes in the Gaza Strip between Hamas militants and Abbas loyalists that have left at least 10 people dead. The latest battle, which left one Palestinian security officer dead, broke out shortly after the unity conference began.

This week's conference was partly a response to a joint political statement issued earlier this month by a group of Palestinian leaders in an Israeli prison. Top Hamas and Fatah members signed the letter, along with leaders of smaller political factions.

The 18-point document calls for the creation of a Palestinian state, with East Jerusalem as its capital, on all the land captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War. It also suggests that Palestinians stop attacking targets in Israel and restrict their actions to targets in the West Bank.

But Hamas' embrace of the document might not go very far toward easing the international pressure on the Palestinian Authority.

The proposal falls short of meeting two critical demands: Explicitly recognizing Israel's right to exist and abandoning violence as a political weapon. And Israel has made it clear that it intends to hold onto major Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

But formal acceptance by Hamas of a Palestinian state in the West Bank could put more pressure on Israel to seek a negotiated settlement instead of pressing ahead with a new plan to ignore the Palestinian leadership and dictate its own borders.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's unilateral proposal got a boost this week during his first official visit to Washington when President Bush praised the idea as a "bold" concept that could lead to peace.

But Bush encouraged Olmert not to move forward with the idea until he tries to reach an agreement with Abbas. But the Israeli prime minister is dubious of working out any deal with Abbas when the government is dominated by Hamas leaders.

Before Abbas issued his vow to put the issue before voters, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh urged the conference to work together to end the internal violence.

"The space of consensus between us is much closer than we imagine," said Haniyeh, who spoke via video link from a simultaneous gathering held in Gaza City for Hamas members who, like the prime minister, are barred by Israel from traveling to the West Bank.

Abbas Urges Hamas To Back 2-State Plan (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, May 25 -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called on Hamas on Thursday to endorse the creation of a Palestinian state on territory occupied by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war. If the radical Islamic movement refuses, he said, he will put the proposal to a referendum within two months.

Abbas gave leaders of Hamas, the principal political rival of his Fatah movement, 10 days to accept a two-state solution to the conflict with Israel, something the group has rejected since its founding nearly two decades ago. Hamas envisions the creation of a Palestinian state across territory that now includes Israel.

If Hamas does not change its position, Abbas said, he will measure public support for a two-state solution within 40 days through a popular referendum. Although it would not be binding, the result would help clarify for recalcitrant Hamas leaders, the Israeli government and the world what course Palestinians favor to resolve the conflict with Israel.

"We must stop with the slogans and start dealing with reality," said Abbas, Fatah's leader. "We must stop dreaming and accept what we can take now. Let us not speak of dreams. Let us take the Palestinian state on the '67 borders. There is a national consensus for this."

Abbas delivered his ultimatum during a meeting of Fatah and Hamas leaders in the West Bank city of Ramallah that was intended to reduce mounting tensions. His comments reflect frustration over Hamas's refusal to soften its views at a time of deepening economic hardship in the Palestinian territories and sporadic armed conflict between the two movements.

Hamas and Fatah gunmen exchanged fire Thursday in Gaza City following the funeral of a senior Fatah security official killed this week in a car bombing. The gunfire killed a member of the Fatah-dominated Palestinian security services and wounded several others.

When Abbas asked Hamas to form the Palestinian cabinet after its January election victory, he urged its leaders to accept agreements backed by Fatah that call for the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem. Israel has occupied those territories since the 1967 war, although it evacuated Jewish settlements in Gaza last year.

Since Hamas took control of the Palestinian government ministries, international donors have frozen foreign aid to the Palestinian Authority, and Israel has suspended the transfer of tax revenue it collects on the government's behalf. The Palestinian Authority has not paid its more than 150,000 employees for nearly three months.

Advisers and allies of Abbas said his comments Thursday were calculated to force Hamas to moderate its position, which international donors have demanded in return for a renewal of aid, or else face a vote that he expects will endorse the two-state solution. The referendum would be based on an 18-point document drafted this month by Fatah and Hamas leaders in Israeli prisons. The Hamas prison leadership is an important element of the movement's decision-making body, along with Hamas members in exile and those in the territories.

"We're escalating the tension a little bit to try to corner them and show them as rejectionists," said a political adviser to Abbas who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly. "The idea is to bring Hamas back inside the national dialogue or to go to the people for a reminder of what the national consensus is."

As president, Abbas has the authority to fire Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a member of Hamas, and disband the cabinet. He has chosen instead to give Hamas an opportunity to govern the poor and often lawless occupied territories, betting that his rivals will suffer politically in the attempt.

But the economic sanctions imposed on the Palestinian Authority have given Hamas something to blame for any perceived political shortcomings. Israel's top general warned this week that the economic squeeze would not topple the Hamas government, citing opinion polls that show its support has not declined.

"We do not fear conducting a referendum, as we know that the Palestinian people support us and support our program," said Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator from Gaza.

The prisoners' plan, as the document has come to be known, endorses a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. Among other items, it also calls for the release of all Palestinian political prisoners in Israeli jails, the right of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to return to Israel and reforms of the Palestinian security services and political institutions.

The more radical Hamas leaders in exile immediately rejected the document when it was made public this month. But Haniyeh and other party figures in the territories -- including Masri, who called the document "positive" -- said it could serve as a starting point for further discussion. Polls conducted since show that roughly 80 percent of Palestinians support it.

"If Hamas says democracy, democracy, democracy -- okay. The president is going back to the people," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah member of parliament and the chief Palestinian negotiator with Israel. "He could not continue to have the government defy the guidelines he gave it, and he didn't want to sack it."

Abbas's gambit could also strengthen his hand with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who told President Bush in Washington this week that he would explore the possibility of reviving peace talks before taking any unilateral steps to define the Jewish state's final borders.

Abbas, who as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization manages peace policy, has asked Olmert to restart negotiations under the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map." Formal negotiations between the two sides have been moribund since January 2001.

Olmert told a joint meeting of Congress, "If there is to be a just, fair and lasting peace, we need a partner who rejects violence and who values life more than death." Some Israeli politicians said Thursday that a Palestinian vote in favor of a two-state solution along the 1967 border would increase pressure on Olmert to pursue a peace process with Abbas.

Abbas Stuns Hamas With Talk Of Referendum (AP-Y2)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP2, May 25, 2006

In a bold initiative, the Palestinian president gave Hamas 10 days to accept the idea of a Palestinian state alongside Israel, saying Thursday he'll submit the plan to a referendum by mid-July if the Islamic militants refuse.

Mahmoud Abbas' surprise announcement is a political gamble that could either help resolve the Palestinians' internal deadlock or lead the Hamas-led government and Fatah into a deeper crisis.

Abbas asked Hamas to endorse a document drawn up by senior Palestinian militants imprisoned in Israel. It accepts statehood in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem — territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Middle East War.

Approving the document would imply recognition of Israel — one of the three conditions imposed by Israel and the West for doing business with the Hamas-led government. The document falls short of meeting the other two conditions — renouncing violence and accepting past peace accords — so it was unclear if the international boycott would be called off even if Hamas acquiesced.

However, a referendum, which Palestinian pollsters expect to pass, could provide cover for the militants to become more moderate without appearing to succumb to Western pressure. Such a vote could also renew pressure on Israel to return to the negotiating table rather than impose borders on the Palestinians.

As Abbas outline his proposal, violence again erupted in Gaza.

A group of policemen on their way back from the funeral of a top security commander in Gaza City clashed with a newly formed Hamas militia, and one of the officers was wounded, security officials said.

At nightfall, three officers in the presidential guard were shot and wounded on patrol in Gaza City, officials said. They said the gunfire came from the direction of a Hamas militia unit. In the past week, 10 people have been killed in clashes between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah Party.

Fatah and Hamas leaders held talks in Ramallah and Gaza to defuse the crisis, and Abbas used the opportunity to challenge Hamas to adopt a program that implies recognition of Israel or to let the people decide.

Hamas, which is facing a crippling international boycott because of its refusal to moderate its position, appeared to be divided over the idea. The Islamic militants won parliamentary elections in January, and took over the Palestinian Authority on Feb. 18. Abbas was elected separately a year earlier.

The plan was conceived in a wing for 120 Palestinian security prisoners at Hadarim prison, with many sessions taking place in the prison yard, said Khader Shkirat, a lawyer for a key signer, Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti. An inmate from Hamas also signed the document.

Hamas ideology does not accept a Jewish state in the Middle East, and Hamas does not accept interim peace accords with a state it does not recognize. Hamas suicide bombers have killed hundreds of Israelis over the past decade.

Abbas has been seeking to counter Hamas' power, removing authority over security forces from the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry and asserting he has the authority to conduct peace negotiations with Israel.

Hamas fielded a 3,000-strong militia in Gaza in defiance of Abbas' ban, setting off clashes with Fatah-dominated security forces.

Abbas brought things to a head Thursday, giving Hamas 10 days to achieve a political accord with him or face a referendum within 40 days.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas was noncommittal, saying: "We will study how the call for a referendum is compatible with the law, the constitution and politics."

DOJ_NMG_0030059

Other Hamas figures were divided over the idea.

Parliament Speaker Abdel Aziz Duaik of Hamas said the prisoners' document was a good basis for dialogue, adding: "Returning to the people is one of the most important principles in democracy."

But Hamas legislator Mushir al-Masri called the proposal a "coup against the democratic choice" of the Palestinians.

The Islamic Jihad group, which also rejects the existence of Israel, opposed the plan.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev called the issue an "internal Palestinian matter," and reiterated that Israel insists on fulfillment of all three international conditions.

Israeli Cabinet minister Haim Ramon, who is close to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the referendum was "worthy of examination." But another Israeli minister, Ronnie Bar-On, said that as long as Hamas does not accept international conditions, Abbas' idea "is like playing checkers with himself."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said: "The only way you can test the proposition is for the Palestinians to go through that process, whether it's a referendum or whether it's through national dialogue or through some other peaceful means, to talk about what the future of the Palestinian people will be."

Olmert returned Thursday from talks in Washington with President Bush, where he explained his plan to draw Israel's borders unilaterally if efforts to resume peace talks fail. Israel refuses to negotiate with Hamas, which it considers a terror group, and is hesitant to talk peace with Abbas because Hamas controls the government.

However, if Palestinians approve a plan that accepts Israel, Israel might be forced back to the negotiating table.

The Palestinians reject Olmert's unilateral plan, and Abbas' announcement Thursday appeared part of a hurried effort to show the world there is a willing Palestinian partner for negotiations with Israel.

Israeli analyst Yossi Alpher said if a referendum is held and the program is approved, Israel would have to consider it.

"The burden of proof will still be on Abbas to prove that he is a viable negotiating partner," Alpher said.

Abbas Challenges Hamas To Endorse Document On A Palestinian State (USAT/AP)

Abbas Says He'd Put Peace Plan To A Vote (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, May 25 — The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, said Thursday that he would call a referendum on a proposal for a Palestinian state that would recognize Israel, if the governing Hamas party failed to accept the plan within 10 days.

In laying down his challenge, Mr. Abbas seems to be gambling that he can force his Fatah party, Hamas and some smaller factions to agree on a broad framework for dealing with Israel, which Hamas now refuses to recognize. But he runs the risk of provoking a political showdown at a moment when the Palestinians are already plagued by infighting and a worsening financial crisis.

"We differ, it is true," Mr. Abbas said in Ramallah at a conference intended to put an end to internal Palestinian quarreling. "We see things differently, but we need to find middle-of-the-road solutions."

Several Hamas figures said Thursday that they did not object to a referendum, at least in principle.

"We are not afraid of a referendum," said a Hamas legislator, Salah Bardawil. "The election was a referendum, and the majority of the people chose us." He was referring to the vote in January in which Fatah, which previously dominated Palestinian politics, lost its parliamentary majority and Hamas, a radical Islamic group, came to power.

Like the Palestinians, Israel appeared caught off guard by Mr. Abbas's announcement and had little to say about it. Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, described it as an internal Palestinian matter.

In the past Israel has strongly rejected two of the plan's provisions: returning to pre-1967 borders and giving Palestinian refugees the right to return to lands they left in 1948.

The proposal, based on a plan drafted earlier this month by prominent Palestinian prisoners from Hamas and Fatah, calls for a Palestinian state and a negotiated peace settlement with Israel, if it withdraws to the borders that existed before the Arab-Israeli war of 1967. The Palestinian state would include all of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, with its capital in East Jerusalem.

Marwan Barghouti, a leading Fatah figure serving five life terms in Israel's Hadarim Prison, is credited as the driving force behind the prisoners' document, though imprisoned members of Hamas also endorsed it.

"We must rise to the level of responsibility," said Mr. Abbas, whose Fatah movement has supported plans along those lines for years. "If within 10 days you don't reach results through dialogue, I will take the prisoners' document to a popular referendum" within 40 days.

The referendum can be authorized either by a decree from Mr. Abbas or by Parliament, Amar Dwik, the head of the Palestinian election commission, told The Associated Press.

In recent years Palestinian polls have generally shown strong public support for a Palestinian state with the 1967 borders. But Hamas has refused to moderate its hard-line policies despite a cutoff in Western assistance that has left the Palestinian government financially crippled.

The Palestinian conference was held simultaneously in Ramallah and Gaza City and connected by video because Israel does not permit Hamas members to travel between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Until Mr. Abbas spoke, the talks were expected to focus on the almost daily clashes in Gaza between Hamas and Fatah.

"Our meeting today aims to cement our national unity," said Ismail Haniya, the Palestinian prime minister and a Hamas leader, who spoke in Gaza City before Mr. Abbas's remarks in Ramallah. "Our difference is with the Israeli occupation."

Abbas Delivers Talks Ultimatum To Hamas (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

DOJ_NMG_0030061

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas issued an ultimatum to Hamas yesterday, calling on it to accept the principle of a state alongside Israel in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or submit to a national referendum on the issue.

Speaking in the West Bank city of Ramallah at a public forum aimed at reducing tensions between his Fatah party and Hamas, Mr. Abbas challenged the Islamic militants to reach an understanding within 10 days on negotiations with Israel or face a plebiscite within 40 days.

"Are slogans enough to feed the hungry? You need to stop with these slogans and deal with reality," Mr. Abbas said in an uncharacteristically lively speech delivered off the cuff. "You need to stop with dreaming and get what is possible to get now. Let's not talk about dreams. Let's get a Palestinian state within the '67 borders."

The surprise declaration, in which the embattled Palestinian leader gambled his little remaining political capital, comes amid escalating violence between the rival political parties that has stoked worries of a civil war.

Clashes between Fatah and Hamas gunmen have killed about 10 people in the last few weeks.

Hamas politicians went on the defensive after Mr. Abbas' challenge. Some predicted a Fatah-Hamas agreement that would make a referendum unnecessary; others said the Islamic militants don't oppose the idea of a national referendum as long as the two sides reach agreement on the ground rules.

"It needs some procedures," said Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas spokesman. "It needs to be inside and outside of Palestine," meaning that the several million Palestinian refugees abroad should be permitted to vote.

Palestinian refugees in countries like Jordan and Lebanon are generally more radical than those living in the West Bank and Gaza.

Mr. Abbas wants the vote specifically to approve or disapprove a joint declaration signed recently by Hamas and Fatah prisoners in Israeli jails that backs a two-state solution.

The Palestinian president was weakened when a surprise electoral landslide put Hamas in control of the Palestinian parliament and government. Since the militants took power, Mr. Abbas has been embroiled in an escalating battle of words and bullets with Hamas.

At the same time, he has struggled to earn the respect of Israeli leaders, who called him "irrelevant" and "helpless" after the Palestinian Authority elections.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert gave Mr. Abbas a boost this week by inviting him to hold talks. And Israel's Channel 2 television reported yesterday that Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz had agreed to supply Mr. Abbas' presidential guard with badly needed weapons.

Aides to Mr. Abbas said the Palestinian president is fully aware of the risks of setting a referendum in motion. The vote could become a referendum on Mr. Abbas, who has a reputation as a wooden and aloof politician.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat warned that the Palestinian Authority is following two different policies even though it is supposed to function as one group. He hinted that the Palestinian president might even resign if he doesn't win the vote.

"We know the risks, we know the difficulties," said Mr. Erekat. "He knows the consequences of losing. If we lose, we go home."

Mr. Erekat insisted that the Palestinian president had the authority to call a referendum, and said talks were planned with the Central Election Commission today.

The proposal of a national vote could make the Palestinians the first in the Middle East to hold a referendum.

An Israeli commentator said the Israeli government's contention that "there is no one to talk to" on the Palestinian side came crashing down yesterday.

"Abbas proved that he is the address and there are no excuses," said Ali Vaked, a columnist for the Israeli Web site ynet.co.il. "Abbas said to Olmert that he is the address and there are no excuses."

Israel's 'Realignment' (WP)

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

THOUGH THEY paid lip service to continued Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, President Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in effect inaugurated an entirely different process at their White House meeting Tuesday -- one in which Israel will parley with the United States about the new borders it intends to draw for itself. Despite his promise to pursue talks with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Mr. Olmert has made clear that he doesn't believe Israel will be able to work with the Palestinian Authority anytime soon. Even if a credible partner appeared, Mr. Olmert might prove reluctant. Like his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, he opposes some of the compromises Israel would have to make to achieve a peace settlement.

Mr. Olmert has now won Mr. Bush's de facto consent to pursue a unilateral "realignment," in which Israel would draw a border of its own choosing in the West Bank, dismantle some of the settlements that lie beyond it and thereby "guarantee Israel's security as a Jewish state with the borders it desires," as the prime minister put it. Mr. Bush called these ideas "bold," adding that they "could lead to a two-state solution." But as Mr. Olmert acknowledged, there is one crucial condition: Israel cannot successfully impose its plan on the Palestinians unless it has "the comprehensive support of the United States and the international community."

That means that in the remainder of his term, Mr. Bush will have the opportunity to encourage an Israeli redeployment that would open the way toward the Palestinian state he called for four years ago. But he could also cripple the prospects for that settlement if he provides a U.S. imprimatur for a realignment that disregards essential Palestinian interests. Left to his own calculations, Mr. Olmert probably would settle on such a strategy. According to reports in the Israeli press, he is thinking of dismantling only a small fraction of the West Bank settlements that lie beyond the boundary fence Israel is constructing, which means that settlers and the army would remain in the Palestinian territory indefinitely. He also intends to annex all of Jerusalem's Old City and most of its Arab neighborhoods, even though a previous Israeli government recognized that a peace settlement will require divided sovereignty in the city.

Mr. Bush has already accepted the idea that large settlement blocks near the present border will be incorporated into Israel. But U.S. officials in the past have expressed skepticism about parts of the emerging Israeli plan, including the extent of West Bank territory to be taken. Those points should be pressed: The closer Mr. Olmert comes to adopting the territorial map that was negotiated by Israelis and Palestinians after the Camp David talks of 2000, the better will be the chances that the realignment will lead to a real peace. Mr. Bush said Tuesday that an Israeli-Palestinian peace "will only be achieved on the basis of mutually agreed changes, and no party should prejudice the outcome of negotiations." As his administration plunges into what will probably be months of detailed discussions with Israel about the realignment plan, it will be imperative to defend those principles.

Harper To Meet Bush July 6, Canadian Ambassador Wilson Says (BLOOM)

By Theophilos Argitis

Bloomberg, May 26, 2006

May 25 (Bloomberg) -- Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper will meet with U.S. President George W. Bush on July 6 in a bid to cement improving relations between the two countries, said Michael Wilson, Canada's ambassador to the U.S.

``The two of them will be getting together in another meeting in early July, July 6, where they will build on their first meeting in Cancun," Wilson told a hearing of the House International Relations Subcommittee on the Western Hemisphere, broadcast today on CBC television.

Harper has sought to repair relations with the U.S., soured under the previous Liberal Party government over a dispute on softwood lumber tariffs and the country's decision not to participate in the U.S. missile-defense system. Harper and Bush negotiated an agreement on softwood duties in April.

This would be Harper's first meeting with Bush since March, when he met with the U.S. president and Mexican President Vicente Fox at a trilateral meeting in Cancun.

Canada's Leader Won't Talk To National Media (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

TORONTO — Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has declared he won't talk to the national media because they are biased against him, his latest move in a spat with the Parliament's press corps.

After reporters walked out of a news conference this week when he refused to answer any questions, Harper said no Liberal prime minister had faced such effrontery, and he had decided to deal only with more friendly local press.

"Unfortunately, the press gallery has taken the view they are going to be the opposition to the government," the recently elected Conservative leader told a Canadian television network Wednesday.

"We'll just take the message out on the road. There's lots of media who do want to ask questions and hear what the government is doing for Canadians, or to Canadians. So we'll get our message out however we can," Harper said.

Since Harper's minority government took office after the Jan. 23 elections, his relations with the national media have become more and more strained. Determined to impose order on the traditionally chaotic press scrum in which reporters shout out questions, Harper said he would choose questioners from a pre-screened list.

The parliamentary media corps, which includes broadcast and print reporters from all over the country, worried that the new protocol would freeze out journalists perceived to be tough on the prime minister. After journalists refused to sign on to the list, Harper refused to take any questions.

DOJ_NMG_0030063

On Tuesday, when Harper's press secretary announced there would be no questions after his announcement of aid to the Darfur region of Sudan, nearly two dozen reporters walked out, leaving the prime minister to make his statement in front of a single camera in a nearly empty room.

"We are responsible for asking questions, and he is responsible for answering them," said Yves Malo, the president of the Parliament's press gallery.

Malo acknowledged that the media culture in Ottawa was less decorous than other places, such as the White House, where reporters stand up when the president enters the room and don't interrupt while he is speaking.

He said that the once-unruly press corps had tried to compromise by forming a line behind a microphone, but even then Harper refused to recognize some questioners.

"Since the election, certain reporters have never gotten a question. No one is well served. We are not, the public is not, and the government is not," Malo said.

Harper, the first Conservative prime minister after 12 years of Liberal Party rule, has moved toward dismantling many of his predecessors' policies, including gun control, support for medical marijuana and backing of the Kyoto Protocol on global warming. He thinks that the press corps simply doesn't like his politics.

"I have trouble believing that, frankly, a Liberal prime minister would have this problem," he said. "The press gallery at the leadership level has taken an anti-Conservative view."

But across the country, his popularity is growing. Recent polls have placed the party's approval ratings above 40%, which could help it win a majority in Parliament if a new election was held.

Putin Objects To Cheney's Remarks (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Associoated Press, May 25, 2006

President Vladimir Putin said Thursday that Russia wants good relations with the United States but he objected vigorously to Vice President Dick Cheney's recent criticism of democratic backtracking by the Kremlin.

"We see how the United States defends its interests, we see what methods and means they use for this," Putin said at a news conference following a summit meeting of Russia and the European Union in his most direct criticism of Cheney's remarks.

In a speech earlier this month in Lithuania, Cheney accused the Kremlin of rolling back democracy and strong-arming its ex-Soviet neighbors.

"When we fight for our interests, we also look for the most acceptable methods to accomplish our national tasks, and I find it strange that this seems inexplicable to someone," Putin said, replying to a reporter's request for his reaction to the vice president's remarks.

Even before Cheney's speech, Russian-U.S. relations had been on a steady downward slide. Last month, Putin claimed the United States had put up artificial obstacles to slow Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, and the Pentagon accused Moscow of giving intelligence on U.S. troop movements in Iraq to Saddam Hussein in 2003.

The crisis around Iran's nuclear program has seen the two countries, which proclaimed themselves "strategic partners" just a few years ago, firmly in opposing camps.

Putin said that despite the friction, the United States remains "one of our major partners."

But he suggested no nation had the right to interfere in Russia's relations with third countries.

"As far as the view of our relations with other countries, we will discuss our relations with them directly," Putin said icily.

The growing rift with Washington threatens to mar the summit of the Group of Eight leading industrialized nations in St. Petersburg in July.

Speaking of U.S. criticism of a hard-fought Russian-Ukrainian gas deal, which many Ukrainian politicians and the U.S. government have objected to as putting the two sides on unequal terms, Putin asked: "How can leaders of other states say it is bad for the Ukrainians?"

"I don't understand if this criticism is addressed to us or the Ukrainian leadership. But you should ask those who make these comments."

Putin and European Union leaders agreed their countries had common interests in easing their dispute over energy supplies and markets, but acknowledged differences.

"We are aware of our common interests," European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said at the final press conference. "What we want is a relationship based on ... the principle of interdependence."

The energy disputes have hung over the relationship since January, when a brief disruption in Russian gas supplies to Western Europe amid a price dispute with Ukraine tarnished Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier and encouraged the EU to intensify a search for alternative supply routes.

DOJ_NMG_0030064

"We are as interested as Russia to avoid further misunderstandings," said Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel, whose country currently holds the EU presidency.

But Barroso said there were still "sensitivities" that needed to be addressed.

"This is not at all, I want to underline this on our side, a problem of lack of trust in Russia as a credible supplier, as Russia has always been," he said. "But there are some sensitivities, it is true."

He said the sensitivities included the way public opinion in the EU reacted to the problems between Russia and Ukraine earlier this year.

Putin tried to assure his EU partners that China was no substitute for Europe as a market for Russia's oil and gas although Russia was developing markets for its energy resources.

"China is not an alternative to Europe for energy supplies," Putin told a news conference following the Russia-EU summit.

The New Year's shutdown, which was followed by gas shortages amid a harsh winter, came as Russia declared energy security to be a top priority of its leadership this year of the G-8.

European fears of excessive energy reliance on Russia, which supplies a quarter of Europe's gas and is its second-biggest supplier of oil, increased further amid talk that Russia's state-controlled natural gas giant, Gazprom, was considering acquiring Britain's largest gas distributor and negotiating similar deals in other EU nations.

EU leaders on Thursday spared Russia from any criticism similar to Cheney's, but they emphasized the need for Moscow to adhere to democratic values.

"Russia has now very important chairmanships, it's not only the chairman of the G-8, it's also chairman now of the Council of Europe, and therefore we do think that Russia has a special responsibility also to take forward questions like human rights, rule of law, good governance — all these basic values we in the European Union hold up," EU External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner told reporters.

Putin Group Races Past Soviet Party (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, May 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Just four years after its founding, President Vladimir Putin's United Russia party is growing twice as quickly as the Communist Party under the Bolsheviks. And like the Communist Party of the past century, it has become the surest path to success in Russian society.

The party formed by the Kremlin to support Mr. Putin registered its 1 millionth member earlier this year, reaching a milestone that took the Bolsheviks eight years after the Russian Revolution.

More than two-thirds of the country's federal and regional parliamentarians, and 70 of 89 regional governors are members of United Russia. Thousands of civil servants, celebrities and leading business people have joined in recent years as the party has grown into a dominant force in national and local politics.

Party officials have begun an ambitious program to sign up another million members in time for the 2007 parliamentary elections and 2008 presidential vote, when a successor to Mr. Putin will be chosen.

Supporters say United Russia's success is proof of democracy in action in Russia.

"United Russia is so popular because the people know that it is promoting the best interests of Russian citizens," said Oleg Morozov, the deputy leader of the party's faction in the State Duma, the lower house of parliament.

But critics say that United Russia is little more than a Kremlin fan club and that through it Mr. Putin is essentially re-creating the Soviet Communist Party system. At its height, the Communist Party had 22 million members, and joining was considered essential for anyone to advance his or her career.

"United Russia is not a real political party and is not even truly popular," said Sergei Mitrokhin, the deputy leader of the liberal Yabloko opposition party. "It is only successful because it has the full resources of the state behind it and because people are forced to join the party."

Political parties were slow to develop in Russia after the 1991 collapse of the Soviet Union. Throughout the 1990s, Russian parliaments were a chaotic mix of communists, liberals and nationalists, with none able to win over a significant portion of the voters.

That changed under Mr. Putin, who created United Russia by merging the Unity and Fatherland-All Russia parties. With the full backing of the Kremlin, United Russia swept to power in the 2003 elections to the State Duma, winning more than two-thirds of the seats. In regional elections earlier this year, United Russia won majorities in all eight local legislatures up for grabs.

At the same time, membership in the party has surpassed all other political parties combined.

DOJ_NMG_0030065

United Russia's nearest rival, the Communist Party, has about 180,000 members, many of them pensioners pining for the days of the Soviet Union. The nationalist Rodina (Motherland) party has 105,000 members, while the Yabloko and the Union of Right Forces parties barely have 50,000 members, the minimum required under a law on political parties passed last year.

United Russia's platform is ostensibly based on a philosophy its leaders call "social conservatism" -- an improbable mix calling for both a strong, centralized state and free-market reforms.

But even party members acknowledge that most of United Russia's support stems from its close connection to Mr. Putin, who is widely popular, and its reputation as the "party of power."

"United Russia has had brilliant successes in elections, and a lot of that is because President Putin is so popular," Mr. Morozov said. "And we don't hide the fact that the party puts its members forward to be in the leading positions in all spheres of society, including in business."

Financial newspaper Kommersant reported earlier this year that joining United Russia is becoming essential for anyone dealing with the government.

"Like membership in the Communist Party once was, membership in United Russia is now a way of making it easier to solve all sorts of problems, from getting promotions for state officials to settling conflicts with the police and tax structures for businessmen," the newspaper reported.

Russia Calls To Review Foreign Oil Deals (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, May 26, 2006

Russia's natural resources ministry called on Thursday for a review of the two largest foreign oil projects in the country, even as senior Russian officials sought to assure EU leaders that Russia was a reliable energy partner.

The ministry said the legal agreements underpinning oil and gas developments on Sakhalin island, on Russia's eastern flank, were ineffective and should be reviewed.

It said it planned to ask the Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, to review production-sharing agreements signed in the 1990s, saying they were damaging Russia's national interests.

Any review of PSAs would threaten the two largest foreign investments in Russia: the Sakhalin-1 project, on which ExxonMobil and its partners have already spent nearly $5bn; and the Sakhalin-2 project, in which Royal Dutch Shell and its partners are investing $20bn.

However, two Russian ministers insisted separately that all Moscow's agreements with foreign energy companies would be honoured, suggesting a rift had opened within the government.

Speaking on the margins of a European Union-Russia summit in Sochi, Viktor Khristenko, energy minister, told the Financial Times that there were elements of the agreements Russia was no longer happy with.

"If I was signing them again today, I would do it differently," he said. "But they are legal obligations for us. We are fulfilling them and we expect our partners to fulfil them."

German Gref, Russia's economy minister, added: "We can only work in the framework of the existing agreements."

Chris Finlayson, the head of Shell's Russia operation, said the company had been recently told by the energy ministry that existing PSAs would be honoured. "I have no reason to doubt this," he said.

Nevertheless, the statement by Russia's resources ministry comes as the Kremlin moves to reassert control over energy resources, helping state-controlled companies such as Rosneft and Gazprom gain influence.

Affiliates in Rosneft hold a 20 per cent stake in Sakhalin-1. Under the terms of an asset swap agreed last year, Gazprom is also set to acquire a 25 per cent state in Sakhalin-2.

Russia's natural resources ministry also said it would start legal proceedings against Total, the French oil company, for allegedly violating its licensing conditions for the development of the Kharyaga oil field in the north of Russia.

Rinat Gizatulin, the spokesman for Yuri Trutnev, the minister for natural resources, yesterday told the FT: "We have all the evidence that Total's use of the oil field is not effective."

He said Total was unlikely to win a tender to participate in the development of a massive Shtokman gas field in the Barents Sea.

Total declined to comment.

Australian Forces Intervene To Halt Fighting In East Timor (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030066

SINGAPORE, May 25 — Several hundred Australian commandos landed Thursday in the tiny Indian Ocean nation of East Timor to try to quell escalating fighting in an ethnic dispute involving the country's armed forces and police.

Explosions, apparently from grenades, and widespread small-arms fighting were heard across Dili, the capital. Nine people were killed and 27 others were wounded, including two United Nations police advisers, during an attack on the national police headquarters, the United Nations said.

By midnight, gunshots could still be heard, said an Indonesian diplomat, Budi, who spoke by telephone from his embassy. "There is danger for everyone in Dili," said Mr. Budi, who uses only one name. "We are protecting about 50 people in the embassy. They are afraid."

East Timor's foreign minister, José Ramos-Horta, appealed for the outside help to disarm "renegade troops and police rebelling against the state." Mr. Ramos-Horta, who shared the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize, said his government could not counter a breakdown of law and order, with about 800 loyal members of the army fighting a group of about 600 rebellious soldiers.

An additional 1,300 Australian soldiers, as well as forces from Malaysia and Portugal, the country's former colonial power, are expected in the next several days.

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, dispatched a special envoy, Ian Martin, to East Timor on Thursday. Mr. Martin, the United Nations' human rights envoy to Nepal, was Mr. Annan's special representative in East Timor in 1999.

The violence was the worst since East Timor, an extremely poor country of 800,000 people, gained independence from Indonesia four years ago after a United Nations-sponsored referendum. About 1,000 people died after the referendum as a result of violence by pro-Indonesian militias.

The current unrest has been simmering since earlier this year. About 600 members of the army, known as Loromonu, from the western part of the country, went on strike to protest what they contend is ethnic discrimination and a lack of promotions at the hands of the military leadership.

In April, the strikers were fired, and they formed a dissident group that has battled the remaining army, made up mostly of Lorosae, from the east.

The fighting between the groups intensified this week after many policemen of the same ethnic background as the rebellious soldiers defected to the rebel side, officials said.

Because of the fighting, roughly half of a contingent of about 200 Americans, mostly contractors for the United States Agency for International Development, left in the last few weeks, said a Western official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for attribution. All 47 Peace Corps volunteers, many of whom were stationed in remote areas, were evacuated at the beginning of May, he said.

The shootings outside the police headquarters on Thursday were the worst bloodshed of the conflict, the Western official said.

Stéphane Dujarric, the United Nations spokesman, said in New York, based on information from staff members in Dili, that after an hourlong attack at the Dili police headquarters, United Nations police and military advisers had negotiated a cease-fire that was agreed to on condition that police officers surrender their weapons and leave the headquarters unarmed. As they were being escorted out, he said, soldiers opened fire on them, killing 9 police officers and wounding 27 other people, including the 2 United Nations police advisers.

In the Australian Parliament, Prime Minister John Howard described the situation as "exceptionally dangerous." He said Australian troops, who have helped train the East Timor armed forces, would try to separate the warring factions and disarm them. The Australians will try to create a secure enough environment to conduct a dialogue that would end the conflict, he said.

In a hopeful sign, the Australian commandos were warmly welcomed at the airport by women and children holding signs reading, "Viva Australia."

Since gaining independence, East Timor has been almost totally dependent on foreign aid, and that is likely to continue for a long time, experts say. The United Nations Development Program estimates that the life expectancy in East Timor is 57 years.

The country, depleted of the coffee and sandalwood that once made it a small trading center, has valuable offshore reserves of natural gas. East Timor recently completed an agreement with Australia to exploit those reserves, but it is not expected to reap the benefits for years.

Extreme poverty, especially among young unemployed men, has encouraged the formation of gangs that have taken part in the violence.

Troops Land In Restive East Timor (WP)

By Alan Sipress And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030067

JAKARTA, Indonesia, May 25 -- Soldiers in East Timor opened fire on unarmed police officers Thursday, killing nine people and injuring 27, as Australian commandos arrived in an effort to quell surging violence on the tiny island nation.

The soldiers launched an hour-long attack on a police headquarters in Dili, the capital, in the deadliest clash since violence flared in East Timor several weeks ago. The unrest has been fueled by veterans angry over their dismissal from the army.

The violence jeopardized attempts by the government to assert control and represented a major setback for the United Nations, which had cited East Timor's independence in 2002 as one of the organization's greatest achievements of the past decade.

On Thursday, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said he would dispatch a senior adviser to East Timor, and the Security Council met in an emergency session. Meanwhile, an initial planeload of Australian forces secured Dili's airport ahead of the full deployment of about 1,300 international troops requested by East Timor's government.

Before the attack on the police headquarters, in which two U.N. police advisers were wounded, five people had been killed in violence this week. Fierce gun battles forced residents to remain indoors while foreigners started to evacuate, according to news service reports. Several houses and shops were set on fire as rival factions carried their fight to the capital's downtown area, including streets by the presidential office and the U.N. compound.

East Timor's armed forces have launched attacks against police strongholds, including the Interior Ministry, U.N. Undersecretary Jean-Marie Guéhenno told the Security Council in a briefing.

He said the country's nascent police force was in "total disarray," noting that its commander, Paulo Martins, had not come to work in days and that his deputy and other officers had reportedly joined a dissident group of military police.

The investment in East Timor "is in danger of being seriously undermined should the international community fail to extend its support at this critical time of need," Guéhenno said. Besides Australia, Guéhenno said Portugal, New Zealand and Malaysia had made commitments to send troops.

Since East Timor won its independence from Indonesia, the government has struggled to absorb former rebel fighters into a modern military. The latest troubles began in March, when senior officers fired nearly half the army after hundreds of soldiers went on strike, alleging discrimination inside the armed forces. Those grievances erupted into deadly riots last month before reappearing in the form of a nascent guerrilla campaign by about 600 former soldiers based in the hills outside Dili. It was unclear if the violence on Thursday was led by the breakaway army faction.

The rebel commander told the BBC that the deployment of outside peacekeepers was vital to heading off civil war.

"There is no other way, or it will be war forever," said Maj. Alfredo Reinado, commander of the renegade force. "The government has taken too long. It is not capable of resolving this."

East Timorese voted for independence in 1999 following mob violence by Indonesian-backed militias. That violence ended only after the deployment of an Australian-led peacekeeping force. Today, the government in East Timor remains weak and strapped for cash, leaving it dependent on assistance from foreign governments and private organizations. The United Nations has substantially reduced its role on the island since early last year.

When the first contingent of Australians emerged from their plane Thursday and fanned out across the airfield, they were met by hundreds of cheering East Timorese.

"Welcome, Aussie soldiers. Please help us again," Judit Isaac, a homemaker, said as she watched the troops arrive, the Associated Press reported.

As international troops prepared to deploy, the U.S. Embassy ordered the evacuation of all nonessential personnel and advised U.S. citizens to leave the country.

"We can't control the situation," said Foreign Minister José Ramos-Horta, according to the AP. He said the foreign forces would help "disarm renegade troops and police rebelling against the state."

Raiders From Sudan Killed 118 In Chad, Rights Watch Reports (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

LONDON, May 25 (AP) — Raiders from Sudan have killed more than 100 villagers in Chad, Human Rights Watch reported Thursday, and the group expressed concern that the violence in Darfur was spreading.

Survivors told Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, that the massacre was carried out last month by the janjaweed, an Arab militia that Sudan has been accused of unleashing on African villages where Darfur rebels might find support.

The Sudanese government denies backing the janjaweed but agreed to rein them in under a May 5 peace agreement. Violence, though, has increased since the government and the main rebel movement signed the accord. More than 180,000 people have died in Darfur, in western Sudan, since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0030068

"Sudanese militiamen are moving further and further into Chad, and are looting and killing Chadian villagers," Peter Takirambudde, executive director of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch, said in a statement.

The Darfur war has destabilized the region where Sudan, Chad and the Central African Republic meet. Some 200,000 Darfur refugees have sought shelter in Chad.

Chadian rebels have bases along the border and Chad's government accuses Sudan of backing them, while Sudan accuses Chad of backing Darfur rebels. There are also reports that opponents of the Central African Republic's government are gathering in the area to prepare an attack on their government.

The massacre denounced by Human Rights Watch on Thursday occurred April 12-13, when Chadian security forces were preoccupied with an abortive attack by Chadian rebels on the capital.

Human Rights Watch, quoting witnesses, said 118 people were killed in four neighboring villages. Survivors said attackers shot or hacked to death unarmed villagers. The United Nations refugee agency has reported cross-border attacks on Darfur refugee camps in Chad as well as on nearby Chadian villages.

But attackers struck far from the camps in April, "in an area where there's almost no international presence ... very little government presence," a Human Rights Watch researcher, Leslie Lefkow, said in a telephone interview from Amsterdam.

Chadian officials had no immediate comment.

Human Rights Watch researchers learned of the massacres weeks later during a rare visit to the southern border area, Ms. Lefkow said.

The rivalry over resources and the complex ethnic dimension of the recent fighting in Chad is reminiscent of the roots of the conflict in Darfur.

The western Sudanese region saw decades of low-level tribal clashes over land and water before members of its African tribes rose in revolt in 2003, accusing the Arab-dominated central government of neglecting their impoverished region. Besides the 180,000 dead, 2.5 million people have been forced from their homes since the widespread fighting erupted.

Militia Fighting Intensifies In Mogadishu (WP)

By Tom Maliti

The Washington Post, May 26, 2006

NAIROBI, May 25 -- Islamic and secular militias battled in Somalia's capital Thursday, the most widespread and some of the deadliest fighting in Mogadishu in 14 years. Dozens of people were killed and thousands fled their homes on foot.

The fighting spread from northern Mogadishu, the scene of fierce battles in recent weeks, into the southern and eastern parts of the city, where the Islamic Court Union militia made a rare foray, witnesses said.

Islamic militiamen captured a strategic road junction, known as K4, and seized the historic Sahafi Hotel, owned by a member of the rival secular militia, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism.

The fight for control of Mogadishu comes despite a May 14 cease-fire agreement. The alliance says the self-appointed Islamic Court leaders, who have their own militias, have links to al-Qaeda, while the Islamic militia accuses the alliance of working for the CIA. U.S. officials decline to confirm any association with the secular militia.

More than 140 people were killed in eight days of fighting earlier this month, and at least six people were killed in battles that erupted Wednesday in north Mogadishu. But residents said that Thursday marked the first time since 1992 -- when international forces came to Somalia, resulting in the failed U.S. military operation described in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down" -- that battles had broken out in different parts of Mogadishu on the same day.

At least 48 people were killed and about 90 injured, said Abdi Ibrahim Jiya of the Somali Doctors Association, citing information collected from the main hospitals in Mogadishu. He said the death toll would probably rise because many civilians were unable to make it to a hospital.

Thousands of civilians fled their homes on foot, some carrying children on their backs, trying to avoid the crossfire or stray rockets, shells and bullets.

Among those fleeing southern and eastern Mogadishu were residents who had sought refuge there after leaving the north.

"I have fled from northern Mogadishu. Now the fighting has affected me in the south. So I would prefer to go back to home since there is no safe place in the city," said Sadumo Imaam, whose youngest child was killed Thursday by mortar fire.

The Islamic militiamen portray themselves as an alternative force capable of bringing order to Somalia, which has been without a real government since largely clan-based warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991.

A U.N.-backed government based in the central city of Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu, has been unable to assert authority. Islamic leaders reject the government because it is not based on Islam.

The battle for Mogadishu has further complicated relations within the transitional government. Transitional Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi gave an ultimatum to cabinet ministers involved with the secular alliance -- which operates independently -- telling them to join the administration in Baidoa or resign.

Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, an alliance leader and the national security minister, said Thursday that he and three other alliance leaders in the cabinet had not resigned despite widespread reports they had, raising questions about the viability of the already weak government.

A Latin Leader Set To Defy Leftist Trend (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 26, 2006

BOGOTÁ, COLOMBIA - As leftists and populist politicians - some of them overtly anti-American - gain strength across Latin America, Colombia's conservative president, Alvaro Uribe, stands out as a political island.

The slight, bespectacled yoga enthusiast with an amateur historian's interest in the US Civil War (he knows the Gettysburg Address by heart) is expected to be reelected here Sunday. Uribe has more than 57 percent support, enough to win elections in the first round, according to the Napoleón Franco Group, a polling firm here.

The reason, say observers, is that Colombians feel safer - and better off economically - today.

"Uribe is a remarkable leader," says Michael Shifter, vice president of the InterAmerican Dialogue, a think tank in Washington, D.C. "He has an acute sense of what the people want, and despite continuing, serious problems, has made real progress on the security front."

Indeed, three days before the elections wealthy young Colombians while away the late afternoon at trendy outdoor cafes in Bogotá. In Plaza Bolivar, school children in plaid uniforms race to scatter the pigeons and small groups of tourists gather for the changing of the presidential guard nearby.

Four years ago, when Mr. Uribe took office, Colombia looked much different. Car bombings and kidnappings were an almost daily occurrence. Talks between the government and leftist rebels to end 40 years of insurgency had just collapsed, and Frommer's didn't even bother including Colombia in its South America tour guide.

Today, the ongoing conflict between rebels and right-wing paramilitaries, both fueled by drug money, still kills thousands each year and has displaced, according to UN estimates, more than 2 million people. But there has been progress.

Homicides and kidnapping rates here are among the world's highest - but are down sharply. The murder rate has fallen 36 percent since 2002, according to Uribe's spokesman. Kidnappings dropped to 800 last year from nearly 3,000 in 2002, and are down 47 percent so far this year.

Highways in some parts of the country are still off limits and dangerous, but many that were long-controlled by bandits have been reopened.

The country's largest rebel group, the 17,000-strong Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), preparing to celebrate its 42nd anniversary next week, still refuses to negotiate. But the smaller leftist National Liberation Army (ELN) rebel group is in preliminary peace talks, and 30,635 United Self Defense Forces of Colombia (AUC) rightist paramilitaries have demobilized.

The improved security situation in Colombia, meanwhile, has also helped the economy: reviving tourism, consumer demand, and investment. According to Central Bank statistics, foreign direct investment here is up fivefold - to $10 billion last year - since Uribe took office.

"I can go to the countryside for the weekend without being killed on the road, I can go out for lunch without fear of being kidnapped, and I have more money in my pocket. What's not to like?" asks Pedro Quintero, an accountant.

Uribe, a Harvard University graduate, is popular in Washington, too, where President Bush has referred to him as a "strong and principled leader," and has poured $3 billion in aid into Colombia since 2002, most of that for the war on drugs.

Despite having his hands tied by the war at home, Uribe is a natural bulwark to Washington nemesis Hugo Chávez, the leftist Venezuelan president, says Alvaro Vargas Llosa, a Latin America expert at The Independent Institute in Oakland, Calif., public policy think tank. "Uribe can be more forceful a counter than some of the more moderate left in the region, and the US needs that," says Mr. Vargas Llosa.

Uribe's tough antirebel offensive and willingness to extradite suspected drug traffickers to the US also play well. The State Department's annual report on terrorism, released last month, lists both the leftist rebel groups and the rightist paramilitaries here as terrorist organizations - and hails Colombia as "a model of success in its counter-terrorism campaign."

By contrast, the State Department claims that next-door neighbor Venezuela is "unwilling or unable" to control traffic in arms, supplies, and drugs to the FARC and ELN - a designation that prompted Washington last week to announce a suspension of arms sales to Mr. Chávez.

Uribe, if he wins, would be the first Colombian president immediately elected to a second term after congress changed the constitution last year to allow him to run. Uribe has maintained popularity levels of near 70 percent throughout his first term. But the history of second- or third- term presidencies in Latin America offers a caution. Argentina's Carlos Menem similarly won congressional permission to run for a second term, and Peru's Alberto Fujimori dissolved congress in a "self-coup" to get his second term, and changed the constitution to get a third term. Both ultimately left office amid declining popularity and corruption allegations.

"A second administration will be very tough because Colombians' instincts are against excess of power," says Vargas Llosa. "They will be hard on Uribe."

Criticisms of Uribe center around accusations that the wealthy landowner, whose father was killed by the rebels in the early 1980s, maintains too-cozy ties with paramilitary leaders, protecting them from long jail sentences and extradition to the US, and that he has allowed his security forces to commit abuses. Uribe is also charged with ignoring grave social problems in a country where more than half of the 41 million population live in poverty.

But perhaps the most serious criticism of him is how - in the tradition of Latin American strongmen who trample the judicial and legislative branches - he handles criticism. "Uribe has an authoritarian streak ... and embodies a new kind of conservative populism," charges Bruce Bagley, a professor of international studies at the University of Miami in Florida.

"He is intolerant of criticism, especially by human rights organizations and NGOs. He runs his foreign policy out of the presidential palace ... and most important, he has made no effort to build an effective political party that would allow the country to continue to function democratically after he leaves office," says Mr. Bagley.

Carlos Gavira, a left-wing judge who is also running for president, and who was once Uribe's law professor at the University of Antioquia in Medellin, joked to the Associated Press this week that Uribe "was a good student, but he forgot to come to the class on constitutional law."

Uribe's recent tirades against journalists critical of him - which earned him reprimands from Human Rights Watch - and his refusal to participate in any presidential debates, have not helped this image. "He projects himself as a messiah, saying that only he can bring the country out of chaos," says Maria Jimena Duzan, a columnist at Colombia's most influential newspaper, El Tiempo. "He manages the country like it's his farm, and I am afraid this will get worse."

The Alternative Democratic Pole (PDA) party's Mr. Gavira, who opposes free trade agreements with the US, is second behind Uribe, with some 19 percent of the votes, according to last Friday's Napoleón Franco poll. Former minister Horacio Serpa of the Colombian Liberal Party (PLC) is behind with 13 percent.

Colombia's Peace And Justice Law (NYT)

The New York Times, May 26, 2006

Last July, Colombia passed a measure called the Justice and Peace Law. It was supposed to offer paramilitary fighters incentives to put down their guns, but would instead have let them continue their criminal activities undisturbed. Now Colombia's Constitutional Court has restored justice and peace to the law.

The State Department considers the Colombian paramilitaries to be terrorists. They are responsible for massacring thousands of civilians, and they finance their activities through extortion and by providing 40 percent of Colombia's cocaine exports.

The Constitutional Court has greatly strengthened the demobilization law. The court left in a substantial reduction in sentences to induce paramilitaries to stop fighting, but requires them to confess in full to their crimes and provide the authorities with the information necessary to dismantle these criminal gangs. The court also struck down a provision that would have given prosecutors a cripplingly short time to prepare cases.

President Álvaro Uribe's administration has twice written bills that restrict the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, which is the most important remaining check on the president's power. Mr. Uribe may try again if he is elected to a second term on Sunday. He enjoys the strong backing of Washington, which considers him a counterweight to Hugo Chávez in Venezuela. The American ambassador, William Wood, has enthusiastically supported Mr. Uribe's sweetheart deal for the paramilitaries.

While the Bush administration acknowledges in general that Constitutional Court decisions should be respected, it needs to make a strong statement of support for that court's independence, and for paramilitary demobilization under the court's terms. Mr. Uribe should, too, and should abandon his efforts to meddle with the Constitutional Court.

The Tyranny Doctrine (LAT)

By Danielle Pletka And Michael Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, May 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030071

LAST WEEK, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced resumption of full U.S. diplomatic relations with Libya, citing Tripoli's renunciation of terrorism and intelligence cooperation. This ends a quarter-century diplomatic freeze. It also marks an effective end to the Bush doctrine.

At his second inauguration, President Bush declared: "The survival of liberty in our land increasingly depends on the success of liberty in other lands. The best hope for peace in our world is the expansion of freedom in all the world."

Since that soaring pronouncement, the Bush administration has watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the so-called Cedar Revolution in Lebanon and abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents; now Washington is mulling a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea.

The rhetoric of democracy, it turns out, comes more easily than its implementation. Washington worries that Egypt will bow out of the fight against Al Qaeda if the U.S. presses for reform. It worries that China will bar investment if Bush presses for the release of political prisoners. Are these fears realistic? No. These countries still have interests that parallel ours. But that won't be clear unless the president forces the tyrants to make a choice: reform or face isolation.

The case of Fathi El Jahmi, Libya's foremost democracy activist, is among the most poignant. When El Jahmi was briefly furloughed from prison in 2004, Bush hailed his release as a sign of change in Libyan strongman Moammar Kadafi. But El Jahmi's freedom lasted just two weeks, and his name hasn't passed the president's lips again. Rice's announcement welcoming Libya back into the fold of civilized nations mentioned neither democracy nor El Jahmi.

In Egypt, where only last year Rice made herself a heroine to reformers by demanding competitive elections, the government has accelerated repression. It has imprisoned Ayman Nour, the leading opposition leader, on spurious charges. Where once the Bush administration threatened to withhold aid and won the release of a prominent democracy advocate, it is now silent. In early May, Egyptian police rounded up hundreds of demonstrators rallying in support of two judges who said that parliamentary elections were rigged. Yet Washington does not seek to reduce Egypt's $1.8 billion in annual aid. Instead, this month it hosted President Hosni Mubarak's son (and anointed successor).

Pressure for changes also has lessened in Syria and Lebanon. In March 2005, in the wake of the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, the Lebanese people rose up to demand democracy and reform. The Bush administration cheered, but it soon lost interest. A July visit to Beirut by Rice, replete with the "obligatory" meeting with the puppet president installed by Syria, sowed doubt about the U.S. commitment to Lebanese independence. Washington's blunders have ensured that a Syrian stooge will likely govern Lebanon for another year.

The same devotion to form over substance has been apparent in our China policy. Before his 2005 visit, Bush asked for the release of several political prisoners, including a New York Times researcher, Zhao Yan. The Chinese government ignored the request. The same polite query went to Beijing before President Hu Jintao's April visit to Washington. This time, Zhao was released, only to be indicted again once Hu's world tour was complete. Signs of White House displeasure? Not one.

Is it possible that the administration is questioning the wisdom of promoting democracy as a long-term solution to U.S. national security woes? "Realists" suggest that the president has finally woken up and smelled the coffee. They say democracy gave us an Islamist government in Iraq and Hamas in Palestine. It could give us the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. Heaven knows what it would spawn in China or Libya. Better the devil you know.

But there is no sign the White House has done any strategic rethinking. The president continues to believe his own preaching, but his administration has become incapable of making the hard choices those beliefs require. Instead, it has been quick to embrace the showy, if transitory, political advantages that come from welcoming Kadafi into the family of nations and China's president on a tour of Boeing.

The many foreign dissidents and reformers who took Bush at his word are the first to pay the price for Washington's lack of backbone. They were told that if they took risks for freedom, the U.S. would stand with them. Letting them down will make it all the more difficult to find democratic allies. Brave individuals are the real building blocks for transitions to democracy. Without them, as we have learned in Iraq, there are few alternatives to the tyranny that threatens us all.

Democracy At Risk South Of The Border (WSJ)

By Manuel Suarez-Mier

The Wall Street Journal, May 26, 2006

On July 2 Mexico will hold the most closely contested presidential election in its history. That in itself wouldn't be a problem if all the candidates were committed to the democratic process. But in recent weeks two of the three main campaigns have jointly pledged to challenge election results in the streets with massive unrest if their candidates don't win. If that happens, Mexico will be thrown into chaos and Mexicans will be the losers.

DOJ_NMG_0030072

A poll by Zogby International last week gave Felipe Calderón a five percentage point lead over Andrés Manuel López Obrador and 12 points over Roberto Madrazo.

That's good news for Mexico. Mr. Calderón of the National Action Party offers the best chance to deepen the market-oriented economic reforms necessary for strong growth and job creation and to ease the exodus of Mexicans abroad. Mr. López Obrador of the hard-left Revolutionary Democratic Party, on the other hand, would return the country to nationalist populism and a closed economy. Mr. Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party is marketing a mixture of both, publicly siding with the left while privately pledging support for centrist reforms.

Yet even if Mr. Calderón can hold the lead, Mexico may be heading for trouble. The PRD and the PRI have announced that they are forming a united front to reject the election results if neither one wins. They charge that Mexico's PAN President Vicente Fox has illicitly used government resources to support Mr. Calderón. This week Manuel Camacho of the PRD signaled his party's nondemocratic intentions when he told the Financial Times that "there are going to be demonstrations on a scale rarely seen in Mexico and that will make it very hard to govern, no matter who wins."

Mexico can ill afford what Mr. Camacho has in mind. And yet, the prospect is looming as, much to the dismay of the PRI and the PRD, it appears that voter preferences have truly shifted toward the more market-minded Mr. Calderón.

The first big turnaround in this election concerns the PRI. It ran the country for 70 years until 2000 and as it enjoyed victories in state and local elections over the past three years, Mr. Madrazo appeared, six months ago, to have a good shot at winning. But he alienated so many would-be allies within the PRI, in his blind ambition to become its presidential contender, that today he appears unelectable. The Madrazo campaign is going nowhere but down.

The contrast with Mr. Calderón could not be more striking. He came from behind to beat Mr. Fox's hand-picked favorite in his party's primaries, and won the nomination. For months his candidacy appeared to stall. But in April he shook up his campaign team, focused his message and sharpened the attacks against his opponents. His cause was further advanced by winning, hands down, the first presidential debate in April in which Mr. López Obrador refused to participate.

Until Mr. Calderón's turnaround, this year's campaign phenomenon had been the PRD's Mr. López Obrador. Popularly known in the Mexican press as "AMLO," the PRD candidate has been running for president since he became Mexico City's mayor in 2000. Using savvy propaganda and generous giveaways, this populist demagogue seemed to have an unbeatable political advantage. But the lead went to his head, and he began acting as if he had already won. He rejected invitations to speak with nongovernmental organizations and private-sector groups and openly insulted Mr. Fox in alarmingly shrill tones.

As public opinion has turned against him, AMLO has resorted to accusing the pollsters, the media and the electoral authorities of plotting against him, a tactic he has employed regularly throughout his political career to boost his "victim" image and create social unrest in the streets. With his recent charges that Mr. Fox's government is illicitly helping Mr. Calderón he appears to be once again laying the groundwork for a challenge to an official ruling, this time the July 2 results. Mexicans are bracing for the protests that are now an AMLO trademark and that Mr. Camacho has threatened.

The surprising development, though, is that Mr. Madrazo -- once AMLO's arch-enemy in politics -- now seems ready to join in claims of an election swindle. This is all the more unusual because the PRI created Mexico's independent electoral authorities, which have gained widespread respect.

The PRD was formed by members of the PRI who bolted their party when it began to reform in the mid-1980s. As one of these dinosaurs, AMLO seeks to restore Mexican rule to the "true" PRI values of 1930s and to ban the "neoliberal" technocrats. If he wins, he could do this by wooing PRI legislators with perks that their losing party can no longer deliver, in exchange for changing parties. Think of it as a leveraged buyout. In this set-up the PRI, as a national party, would probably vanish.

With a congressional majority, AMLO could then change the laws that limit his power and by pledging federal money for state governors, he might also win enough votes to modify the constitution and add the ingredient that he needs to fulfill his mission: presidential reelection. He could crown his authoritarian reforms by uprooting the judicial system that has worked in recent years, for the first time in history, like the independent power intended in the original Constitutional design.

If Mr. Calderón wins and the government subdues the protests of a losing PRD and its PRI allies, the PRI might survive; Mr. Calderón is not likely to offer goodies the way AMLO would. This is what makes Mr. Madrazo's support of the PRD's electoral-fraud scheme so bizarre.

A lot is riding on this election, with repercussions far beyond Mexico's national boundaries. If Mr. Calderon wins by a wide margin, PRD and PRI claims of fraud would have little traction, although they will be tried anyway. But if the Calderón margin is narrow and his competition contests the results by creating serious unrest, it could compel the government to annul the poll's results, forcing a new election.

This situation would weaken the country's institutions, raise uncertainty and fears of anarchy, with potentially serious financial instability and economic disarray. Emigration would mushroom. The long awaited Mexican miracle of fast growth and job creation -- stemming migratory outflows -- would be lost for at least another six years, if not for much longer.

Bush Seals Jefferson's Seized Files

By Maura Reynolds and Richard B. Schmitt
Times Staff Writers

WASHINGTON — President Bush intervened Thursday to defuse an increasingly bitter dispute between congressional leaders and the Justice Department, ordering that documents seized in an unprecedented raid on a congressman's office be sealed for 45 days.

Congressional leaders, displaying rare bipartisan unity, had angrily accused the Justice Department of overstepping its authority and demanded the return of the material confiscated in a weekend search of the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is under investigation for bribery.

It is highly unusual for a president to step into a Justice Department investigation. Bush's decision followed an escalating conflict that strained relations between the White House and the Republican-led Congress.

The president's intervention also came as federal probes into possible corruption have the House on edge. In a radio interview Thursday morning, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who had complained to the president about the raid, accused Justice Department officials of trying to intimidate him by leaking a false story to ABC News that he was under investigation.

Although the 45-day delay will slow down the investigation of a Democrat, it could also benefit Republicans, who are under greater scrutiny in the investigation surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to fraud and schemes to bribe members of Congress.

In a statement explaining his decision, Bush acknowledged the "deeply held views" of House leaders that the raid violated the constitutional principle of separation of powers between Congress and the executive branch.

"After days of discussions, it is clear that these differences will require more time to be worked out," he said, noting that the timeout would allow a solution that "respects the interests of a coequal branch of government."

Hastert accepted the olive branch. "This gives everybody a chance to step back," he said after meeting with Republicans, whose cheers at the announcement could be heard outside a room in the Capitol.

Hastert insisted he was defending the Constitution, not a potentially corrupt congressman. "We need to protect our Constitution," he said. "It's important that the people's records are protected."

The dispute began Saturday, when FBI agents served a search warrant on Jefferson's office and barred congressional officers — including the House sergeant of arms and the Capitol Police — from the overnight search. The dozen agents removed two boxes of documents and copied computer files.

It is believed to be the only time in U.S. history that the executive branch served a search warrant on a congressional office.

The Justice Department said the move came after Jefferson had resisted a subpoena. Investigators have already searched his Washington-area home, where they reported finding $90,000 in marked bills wrapped in foil in his freezer. The FBI said it earlier videotaped him accepting the money from a Virginia businesswoman.

Congressional leaders argue that the Constitution protects lawmakers from such searches of their offices but have offered to establish a procedure to make available materials that are wanted in a criminal investigation.

"Members were relieved to see the White House response," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.). "They believe it gives us a chance to find the proper way to view this material."

Tensions between House Republicans and the White House have been building for months.

Members complain that the White House often ignores their views, which led to an unwanted debate over Social Security, and has been politically tone-deaf on issues such as allowing a Dubai company to manage U.S. ports.

"There are several instances here that are extremely troubling to members of Congress," said a Republican leadership aide who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Earlier in the day, Hastert told Chicago radio station WGN that the ABC News report was "one of the leaks that come out to try to … intimidate people, and we're just not going to be intimidated."

The network reported Wednesday night that the FBI was investigating Hastert in connection with the influence-peddling probe surrounding Abramoff, who is cooperating with federal investigators.

After the ABC News report, the Justice Department twice denied that Hastert was under investigation. Hastert said the report was false, and his lawyers have demanded a retraction and threatened legal action.

ABC News reported that investigators were examining a letter that Hastert and others wrote in 2003 to the secretary of the Interior to block a casino on an Indian reservation that would have competed with tribes then represented by Abramoff. The letter was written shortly after a fundraiser for Hastert at a Washington restaurant that Abramoff owned at the time.

An ABC News executive said the report did not say Hastert was a "target" or "subject" of the investigation. "We said he was 'in the mix' and that Abramoff had said things to federal investigators which have led them to look at a number of congressmen, including the speaker," said Jeffrey Schneider, a spokesman.

Responding to Hastert's charge that someone in the department was trying to intimidate him, a Justice Department spokesman said, "We are not going to dignify or speculate about the motives of anonymous sources providing inaccurate information."

White House officials would not say whether Bush spoke personally to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales about the raid but said that there had been "ongoing discussions" with officials from Justice and the House.

Bush ordered the U.S. solicitor general to ensure the documents remain under seal for 45 days. That office, which is not involved in the Jefferson investigation, represents the government before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Gonzales, who approved the search of Jefferson's office, issued a statement saying he was satisfied with the president's decision.

"Throughout this discussion period with the Congress over the court-authorized search of Congressman Jefferson's office, the Justice Department has sought to protect the integrity of this important ongoing public corruption investigation," Gonzales said. "The president's order does that and provides additional time to reach a permanent solution that allows this investigation to continue while accommodating the concerns of certain members of Congress."

A government official, who requested anonymity, said Justice Department negotiators were adamant that the department not relinquish the seized materials because it could compromise the investigation.

The official also said some senior department officials were prepared to resign if Bush had ordered the documents returned.

Press Secretary Tony Snow said Thursday that the White House counsel's office learned of the raid only after it had begun.

Snow said Bush decided to order the 45-day seal to "shift the focus from who gets the records right now to the more constructive task of working together to resolve the constitutional concerns of both sides."

"It became pretty obvious that this was a very complex issue, and it was necessary to give cooler heads time to prevail on it," Snow said. "We're getting into uncharted constitutional waters, and I think both sides want to preserve the integrity of their institutions."

Harvard law professor Charles Fried, a solicitor general in the Reagan administration, said he considered the House's legal arguments to be on shaky ground but said Bush's actions were reasonable.

"It is something new, but in principle it strikes me as probably OK," Fried said. "No evidence is lost. [Jefferson] has no chance to flush any papers down the toilet. So it's all on ice, and people can figure it out."

Jefferson, an eight-term congressman from New Orleans, is accused of accepting cash in return for helping a Virginia businesswoman obtain contracts to provide mobile phone and Internet services in the African countries of Ghana and Nigeria. Two Jefferson associates are cooperating with investigators, as is the businesswoman.

Members of Congress and their staffs have expressed concern privately that the Justice Department was less interested in prosecuting Jefferson than in establishing a legal precedent that could be used in other probes — specifically the widening ethics probe around Abramoff.

The president's decision to seal the documents was an unusual intervention in a criminal prosecution, but, as chief executive, he controls the entire executive branch, including federal prosecutions. The president not only appoints U.S. attorneys but at least in theory could decide that a particular case should or should not be investigated.

Past controversies involving the president and prosecutions have arisen in the rare circumstance when the chief executive, under political pressure, agreed to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate his conduct.

President Nixon appointed special prosecutor Archibald Cox to investigate the Watergate affair and then set the stage for his eventual resignation when he ordered Cox to be fired.

President Clinton agreed to have an independent counsel appointed to investigate the allegations of wrongdoing in the Arkansas land deal known as Whitewater and later clashed with Independent Counsel W. Kenneth Starr.

Secrets Claims In NSA Case May Stop Suits

By DIONNE SEARCEY

As lawsuits mount against phone companies from plaintiffs who allege their call records were handed over to the National Security Agency illegally, the companies' defense may benefit from a powerful force: the U.S. government.

The plaintiffs, who accuse Bell phone companies of privacy violations and are seeking billions of dollars in damages, would need to delve into the depths of the NSA's surveillance program to make their cases. But the government considers such information top secret, and legal experts expect the Bush administration to assert the "state secrets" privilege in the 20 or more lawsuits filed by privacy advocates in recent weeks. If judges accept the claim, as has been the case in nearly every instance in which it has been asserted since the early 1950s, the suits will dissolve.

The state-secrets privilege stems from the Cold War era, created to allow the U.S. government a means of moving to dismiss lawsuits that would hurt foreign policy or national security. The motion has been successfully invoked in cases involving government contractors and, more recently, in the case of a German citizen claiming he was wrongfully detained by the Central Intelligence Agency.

In a California suit filed earlier this year against AT&T Inc., the Bush administration has already weighed in to try to dismiss the case, asserting state secrets in a motion aimed at preventing the airing of any classified information. A federal judge in San Francisco is expected to rule on the motion as soon as June 23.

In that case, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco privacy-rights group, accuses AT&T of illegally helping the NSA analyze phone records and Internet communications without court authorization. Most of the suits have been brought on behalf of phone-company customers by activists ranging from the state branches of the American Civil Liberties Union to public-interest lawyers to Chicago author Studs Terkel. Nearly all seek class-action status.

The suits against AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. stem from recent media reports alleging that the companies violated privacy laws by handing over domestic calling records of Americans without court authorization. To litigate the cases, plaintiffs as well as defendants must produce evidence of exactly what happened between the companies and the NSA, lawyers say. AT&T declines to comment on the cases but insists it has violated no laws. Spokesmen for BellSouth and Verizon, which have denied turning over records to the NSA, say the suits are without merit.

Senate Judiciary Committee leaders met yesterday to consider issuing subpoenas to the chief executives of AT&T, BellSouth, Verizon and Qwest Communications International Inc. for a hearing that would examine the NSA issue. No decision was made, a committee aide said, but the senators plan to meet again June 6. Earlier this week Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin, citing the government's invocation of the state's secret privilege in the AT&T suit, said the agency wouldn't investigate allegations of privacy violations by the phone companies.

In highly redacted document unsealed yesterday in the Electronic Frontier Foundation suit, a former AT&T technician says an NSA agent visited an AT&T office in 2002 and 2003.

The bulk of the other lawsuits offer virtually no evidence from plaintiffs beyond the allegations raised in newspaper articles. The phone companies have either denied participating in the NSA program or said they did nothing illegal, and they have noted that they can't discuss classified information. So far, no one in the U.S. government has offered any information publicly.

"As it stands right now we have no way to defend against these lawsuits," said one telecom lawyer. "It's equally important to point out that short of a newspaper article the plaintiffs don't have anything to prosecute these cases," he added.

Lawyers familiar with the suits say they anticipate that the government will invoke state secrets in all the cases against the phone companies. In a filing Wednesday in which Verizon asked the courts to consolidate the myriad cases, the company's lawyers said: "The United States is likely to intervene in and seek the dismissal of these cases...in order to assert its state secret privilege." The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation in Washington, D.C., will determine whether to consolidate the cases.

In recent years, government officials have ratcheted up the use of state-secrets motions. According to Thomas Blanton, a director the National Security Archive at George Washington University, the use of the privilege climbed from about once every five years from the 1950s through the late 1970s to twice a year from 1977 to 2001. Since 2001, the government has used the privilege in at least 13 cases, or a rate of about three times a year.

Mr. Blanton says that in nearly every case judges have sided with the government. "With state secrets the way it's developed is that's the magic word, the neutron bomb that leaves no plaintiff standing," he says.

If judges dismiss state-secret motions in the cases, both sides would likely rely on classified information to argue their cases, which could result in significant logistical hurdles. Secret documents would need to be flown from Washington, with federal escorts, to judges' chambers in Rhode Island, Louisiana, Montana and numerous other states where suits have been filed.

Lee Tien, a lawyer for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, says he is optimistic that the judge in that suit will quash the state-secrets motion. He argues that the government isn't merely a bystander in the case. "They're an intrinsic part of what's going on," Mr. Tien says. "It's a bigger problem from a fairness or due process point of view."

The judge's ruling in June could set the stage for how the other cases play out, and other lawyers and plaintiffs in the suits said they will be closely watching.

Ever-Expanding False Claims Act

When a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit last fall endorsed a legal theory that made it easier for individuals to sue colleges under the federal False Claims Act, higher education legal experts did what they often do: They predicted that the sky might fall, in the form of a flurry of lawsuits that might be more likely to succeed.

That sound you just heard might have been the first piece of the sky hitting the roof.

A federal judge in California on Tuesday cleared the way for three former adjunct professors at Chapman University to sue the institution under the False Claims Act, which permits lawsuits by an individual who believes he or she has identified fraud committed against the federal government, and who sues hoping to be joined by the U.S. Justice Department. (The plaintiff then shares in any financial penalties, which can include trebled damages.) In siding with those who sued Chapman, Judge James V. Selna not only cited the Seventh Circuit's decision in United States of America ex. rel. Jeffrey E. Main v. Oakland City University as a key precedent, but expanded on it in significant ways. Most notably, the judge concludes that a college can run afoul of the False Claims Act by violating a requirement imposed not directly by the federal government but by an accrediting group — a position the Justice Department endorsed.

"This is exactly what we were worried about with the Main case, and in fact it broadens it and takes it a step further," said Mark L. Pelesh, executive vice president at Corinthian Colleges and a longtime higher education lawyer. "Now making false claims to an accreditor somehow translates, through this conflationary approach, into making false claims for money to the federal government."

This is complicated legal terrain, so let's back up. First, last October's decision by the Seventh Circuit was perceived as breaking new ground because it concluded that a college or other recipient of federal funds could be held accountable under the False Claims Act for breaking a promise or commitment it makes to the government at one point in time or at one stage of a federal application process, even if it does not make a similar promise at the point at which it formally requests or receives the funds. Specifically, the court ruled that a former admissions director could sue Oakland City for allegedly paying recruiters based on enrollment because the initial, "phase one" application that it and other colleges make to the Education Department for certification to eventually award federal financial aid funds bars it from doing that, even though no money passes hands at that point.

"Lawyers who make a living out of suing universities can have a field day with this," Sheldon E. Steinbach, vice president and general counsel of the American Council on Education, the chief umbrella group for higher education, said at the time of the ruling in the Main case.

The U.S. Supreme Court decided last month not to review the Oakland City v. Main decision, which leaves it intact in Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin, the states that are part of the Seventh Circuit, and as legal precedent for other courts to cite.

And indeed, that's what happened this week, in a case known as United States of America v. Chapman University. In that case, three former instructors at the comprehensive institution in Orange, Calif., charged that Chapman had broken promises made to the federal and state governments about certain aspects of the quality of education offered at Chapman's University College branch campuses, which primarily serve adults.

They said, for example, that instructors at Chapman regularly shortchanged students by providing fewer in-class hours than are required by the Western Association of Schools and Colleges, the regional accrediting agency that oversees California, and that the university had purposely and fraudulently failed to give students in its marriage and family therapy program as many hours of clinical training as California's certification program for such therapists requires. (The university released a statement Wednesday that said: "We are very confident that this case has no merit; it lacks basis in law and in fact. We are certain that Chapman University will ultimately prevail.")

The instructors, who say they resigned rather than participate in the fraud they allege occurred, sued under both the federal and California False Claims Acts. Chapman sought to have the case dismissed, and in his decision this week rejecting the university's request, Judge Selna said that the Seventh Circuit's decision in Main "provides a persuasive analytic framework" for the Chapman case.

Further, he accepted their unconventional argument that statements the university made during the course to the Western Association of Schools and Colleges in the course of the accreditation accrediting process were analogous to those Oakland City made to the U.S. Education Department that the Seventh Circuit concluded triggered the False Claims Act. The underlying theory: Chapman told the accreditor it would do certain things (like give students a certain amount of class time to make their degrees mean something). If it had not agreed to do those things, Chapman would not have received accreditation, and if it was not accredited by an agency recognized by the Education Department, the university would not have qualified for the federal grants and loans — the receipt of which triggers the False Claims Act.

In siding with the plaintiffs and their novel theory, the federal court had the encouragement of another not insignificant party: the U.S. Justice Department. Although the government declined to take the instructors' side in their lawsuit against Chapman, Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler filed a brief with the California court mostly backing their legal argument and opposing Chapman's request to dismiss the suit.

The university's argument "that 'no False Claims Act claim can be maintained based on the standards of [a] private accreditation authority' " sweeps "too broadly," the government brief notes. "Numerous courts have held that where the United States makes compliance with certain requirements a condition of receiving a government benefit and a person submits a claim while not in compliance with such requirements, the claim violates the [False Claims Act].... Nothing in this theory of liability requires that the substance of the federal requirement originate with the federal government, as long as the federal government has adopted the requirement as its own, by statute, regulation, rule or contract."

Michael B. Goldstein, a higher education lawyer at Dow Lohnes Albertson, said the Justice Department has seized on the Main case as a way of pushing for a broader interpretation of the False Claims Act, and has stepped into several pending cases — including the anticipated blockbuster of higher education False Claims cases, one involving incentive compensation at the University of Phoenix that is now before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit — to "make it clear that this is now the government's position."

Several lawyers who represent colleges bemoaned what they said was the expanding reach of the False Claims Act into higher education, although Goldstein and others were quick to note that all that the Main and Chapman cases have done so far is to allow those suing them to make the case that the institutions actually engaged in fraud, and to make it easier for others to persuade a court to give them such a chance.

But lawyers who tend to sue colleges in cases like this say that the lawyers' "sky is falling rhetoric" overstates the threat to the institutions. Daniel Bartley, who represents the three instructors in the Chapman case as well as those in the pending Phoenix case, says college lawyers are wrong to say that the new line of False Claims cases allow colleges to be sued if they have violated any of the hundreds of regulations that the government — or, under the Chapman ruling, an accreditor — imposes on them. "This applies only where there is a material breach of a condition of payment, and it's flagrant," Bartley said. "The only colleges that face trouble are those that are not obeying the law and the material accreditation standards that underlie their getting loans and credits."

Exactly what laws, regulations and standards are considered "material," of course, will be one of the many issues that could keep the courts (and colleges' lawyers) busy for months and years to come, if this line of False Claims Act cases continues to gather steam.

Doctor accuses former Methodist Hospitals executives of fraud

HAMMOND, Ind._Methodist Hospitals on Thursday denied a physician's allegations that hospital administrators and physicians conspired to overbill Medicare for years.

"These allegations are false, and we'll vigorously defend it and prove that they're false," hospital attorney R. Lawrence Steele said.

Dr. Richard Lichtenberg claimed in a lawsuit filed in U.S\l "l". District\l "l" Court\l "l" in Hammond that former Methodist CEO John Betjemann conspired to double-bill the federal government\l "l" for procedures performed at Broadway Radiology Services Inc., where Lichtenberg formerly worked, and other facilities starting in 1994.

Mary Hatton, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Joseph Van Bokkelen, said her office investigated Lichtenberg's claims but declined to pursue the case. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Reid declined to discuss the reasons for the decision.

A hearing was scheduled Friday that could determine whether Lichtenberg would pursue the suit privately.

The Associated Press left messages seeking comment from Lichtenberg.

Steele, the hospital attorney, said Lichtenberg used a Civil War-era law that allows private citizens to bring lawsuits in the name of the United States, prompting incorrect media reports that the U.S. Attorney's office had filed the lawsuit.

The lawsuit contends 14 people were involved in generating $51 million in improper Medicare bills between 1995 to 2004. Medicare is the federal health care program for the elderly and disabled.

It contends Betjemann and John Diehl, vice president of hospital financial services under Betjemann, wanted Broadway Radiology Services to pay the hospital $287,000 to continue to have it refer patients to the center.

The physicians initially resisted, but eventually agreed to pay Methodist $200,000 a year in kickbacks disguised as hospital services, court records allege.

Methodist Hospitals acting president Ed Charbonneau said Lichtenberg was one of several physicians who had a dispute among themselves, which caused to the hospital to be "dragged into it."

Methodist Hospitals has campuses in Gary and Merrillville.

Neurontin Deal - Slap On The Hand To Pfizer

by Evelyn Pringle

The off-label prescribing of drugs has become a serious problem over the past decade. Doctors are adjusting dosage levels and prescribing drugs for medical indications and treatment durations for which the drugs were never approved or intended.

When the FDA approves a drug, it also approves the labeling for the drug, which explains the manner in which the medication is to be used. While physicians may prescribe approved drugs as they see fit, its against the law for drug companies to promote drugs for uses outside of the approved labeling but they do it all the time.

Neurontin remains the most notorious example of an illegal, but highly successful, off-label marketing campaign. The drug was approved for the limited use of treating epileptic seizures but nonetheless, became an overnight blockbuster with sales that soared from $97.5 million in 1995, to more than $2.5 billion in 2003.

While Neurontin might be the most notorious, it is certainly not the only problem. A study published in the May 8, 2006, Archives of Internal Medicine, determined that more than one out of every 7 prescriptions written for 160 commonly used drugs were for off-label uses that lacked scientific support.

The study was based on information from the IMS Health National Disease and Therapeutic Index that defines drug prescribing patterns and provides market data on drug companies.

In 2001, an estimated 150 million prescriptions, or 21% of prescriptions written, were for off-label use, according to the Archives study.

To reach its results, the study first determined whether a prescription was off-label and then assessed the level of available scientific evidence supporting the use, through the Drugdex system, a comprehensive summary of evidence supporting off-label uses of prescription drugs.

The study found that 73%, or 109 million off-label prescriptions, had little or no supporting evidence. The study does not explain why doctors prescribe so many drugs off-label but one explanation may be that "both physicians and patients have misunderstood the role of the FDA," the study's lead author Randall Stafford says.

"I think there's sort of a presumption that if a drug has made it onto the market," he notes, "the FDA has vouched for its safety and efficacy for all of its potential uses."

One way drug companies have been able to increase the off-label sale of drugs is by influencing doctors in public institutions, and state policy makers, who are involved in the development of drug formularies that list which drugs will be used in state institutions and by persons covered by government health care programs like Medicaid and Medicare.

Allen Jones, a former Pennsylvania fraud investigator, explains that each state has a menu of approved drugs that doctors must prescribe to persons in state institutions. "Before a drug can be prescribed by a state physician for somebody in the state system," he says, "it has to be on the list."

According to Mr Jones, the drug companies "have bought the decision-making process from our government officials all the way down to the guy who decides what drugs get on the formulary."

Doctors who sit on the expert panels and decide which drugs will be on the lists, he says, are paid by drug companies to give positive opinions in order to circumvent the FDA approval process.

"The FDA has no control over what an individual doctor does or says," Mr Jones explains, "the pharmaceutical industry has funded a mechanism whereby they can gather favorable opinions."

"They then amplify and magnify those opinions," he says, "and put them in the form of a treatment protocol that can be implemented in any state with the approval of a few key decision-makers."

Stacking the deck with industry friendly "experts" is apparently common. An investigation by the scientific journal Nature found "extensive" financial connections between drug companies and the advisory panels, with as many as 70% of the panels affected. In one instance, Nature found every member of a panel had received payments from the company making the drug that was recommended.

In the summer of 2002, Mr Jones discovered an off-the-books account where drug companies were depositing "educational grants" from which state officials and policy makers involved in developing Pennsylvania's drug list were receiving payments.

"We had state officials accepting $2,000 honorariums," he noted, "and physicians who were taking trips, perks and gratuities."

One of the officials Mr Jones named in his investigation was the state pharmacist, Steven Fiorello. In April 2005, the State Ethics Commission fined Fiorello over $27,000 after finding that he repeatedly took money from drug makers, Pfizer and Janssen, while serving on the panel that decided which drugs could be given at 9 state mental hospitals. The commission's report cited repeated failures to disclose his income from the drug companies.

On June 10, 2005, Senators Chuck Grassley and Max Baucus announced the beginning of an investigation by the Senate Finance Committee, which has oversight responsibility for government health care programs, into the practice where drug companies give money to state governments.

"The drug companies call the awards educational grants," their press release said, "but the senators are concerned that the dollars are more focused on product promotion than education."

The Senators said their inquiry was based on reports that companies have awarded grants as inducements to prescribe medications the companies produce.

In some cases, they said, "such grants to state agencies may have prompted those agencies to develop programs leading to over-medication of patients at the expense of patient health or to unnecessary expense for taxpayers."

"We need to know how this behind-the-scenes funneling of money is influencing decision makers," Senator Grassley said. "The decisions result in the government spending billions of dollars on drugs."

In recent years, investigations into the prescribing patterns for people on Medicaid and Medicare has led to the discovery of a drastic increase in off-label prescribing to children and the elderly of drugs never approved for use with children and the elderly.

One class of drugs found to be prescribed off-label most often without scientific support are psychiatric medications. In 96% of the psychiatric drugs prescribed off-label, the Archive study found support was lacking.

According to the report, Death by Medicine (2003), by Gary Null, PhD; Carolyn Dean MD, ND; Martin Feldman, MD; Debora Rasio, MD; and Dorothy Smith, PhD, a study on prescription drug use by the elderly conducted by Medco Health Solutions found that 6.3 million senior citizens received more than 160 million prescriptions and a total of 7.9 million medical alerts were triggered by off-label prescribing, with 2.2 million alerts indicating excessive dosages unsuitable for seniors, and about 2.4 million indicating clinically inappropriate drugs for the elderly.

Drug companies have promoted the off-label use of psychiatric drugs with children even after their own studies have shown the drugs to be dangerous. In 2004, New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, filed a lawsuit against GlaxoSmithKline for withholding studies that raised doubts about the effectiveness and safety of Paxil in treating children and revealed that more than 2 million prescriptions for Paxil were written off-label to treat children in 2002.

In late 2004 the FDA ordered black box warnings on all SSRI antidepressants after it was discovered that drug makers had suppressed studies that showed the drugs were linked to an increased risk of suicide in children.

Documents that have surfaced during litigation reveal that drug makers knew about this risk before the SSRI antidepressants arrived on the market but continued to find ways to get doctors to prescribe the drugs to kids. A report by Express Scripts, Inc, a pharmacy benefit manager, titled "Trends in the Use of Antidepressants in a National Sample of Commercially Insured Pediatric Patients," shows that between1998 and 2002, the overall use of antidepressants among children increased from 160 children per 10,000 in 1998, to 240 per 10,000 in 2003.

Tom Woodward's daughter Julie hung herself after being prescribed the antidepressant, Zoloft, off-label. He is angry at the Bush administration and the FDA for failing to protect the public against drug companies who hide studies that show drugs are dangerous when given to children.

"It is clear that the FDA is a political entity and its leadership has protected the economic interests of the drug industry," he says.

According to Mr Woodward, officials in leadership positions have strong ties to the industry. "FDA's chief counsel Daniel Troy has spent his career defending the drug industry," he noted, "if a study does not favor a drug, the public never hears about it."

"Under the Bush administration," Mr Woodward said, "the FDA has placed the interests of the drug industry over protecting the American public."

He points out that 86% of the millions of dollars in campaign contributions by drug companies went to Bush and Republican candidates and wants to know, "what did Pfizer, Eli Lilly, and GlaxoSmithKline Beecham buy?"

A recent study reveals that even when the FDA does add a black box warning to a label, the highest form of drug safety alert available, doctors will continue to prescribe the drug.

The February 14, 2006 Archives of Internal Medicine featured a report on a study where researchers reviewed the records of 324,548 patients seen at several Boston area medical facilities between January 1, 2002 and December 31, 2002 and found that 33,778 patients were prescribed a drug that had a black box label, and 2,354 of those prescriptions were written contrary to the guidance set forth in black box warning.

The study found that in about 1,000 cases, patients were taking one drug at the same time as another when the warning said that taking the 2 drugs together should be avoided, and in about 90% of the cases, a drug was prescribed to treat a condition for which the drug was not approved.

According to Death by Medicine, each year approximately 2.2 million US hospital patients experience adverse drug reactions to prescribed medications and experts say many are caused by prescribing drugs for uses not approved.

The dangerous off-label prescribing practices have come under scrutiny in recent years because so many of the drugs are covered by government health care programs, and lawmakers charged with oversight of programs like Medicaid and Medicare became suspicious about the skyrocketing prescription drug costs.

In some of the largest cases involving Medicaid and Medicare fraud, former industry employees came forward with information about marketing schemes and filed lawsuits under the False Claims Act.

The Washington DC based Taxpayors Against Fraud, is a non-profit organization dedicated to combating fraud against the federal government through the promotion and use of the qui tam provisions of the False Claims Act.

Qui tam is a mechanism that allows persons with evidence of fraud to bring suit on behalf of the government. TAF educates the public about the FCA and its qui tam provisions and provides assistance to whistleblowers and their attorneys and sometimes files amicus curiae briefs on important issues.

TAF also has a staff of lawyers and other professionals who are available to assist anyone interested in the FCA and publishes the False Claims Act and Qui Tam Quarterly Review.

Whistleblower lawsuits are proving to be highly effective in exposing fraud. Of the10 top FCA Medicaid fraud recoveries to date, the top 5 are whistleblower cases against drug companies.

According to TAF, during FY 2004, between October 1, 2003 and September 30, 2004, the US Department of Justice settled 3 whistleblower cases against drug companies for a total of over $800 million, raising the total recoveries in such cases by nearly 50% to $2.46 billion.

Two of the settlements involved both criminal fines and civil penalties. The recoveries included $290 million in criminal fines, $275 million in civil penalties and damages to the federal government, and nearly $235 million to state governments. All three settlements involved allegations of fraud against Medicaid.

Two of the cases began as lawsuits filed under the FCA by whistleblowers and the third began as a case under the Texas Medicaid Fraud Prevention Act.

The defendant in one case was the nation's largest drug maker, Pfizer, with annual sales of $30 billion. The conduct at issue concerned a Pfizer subsidiary, the Parke-Davis Division of Warner-Lambert, acquired by Pfizer in 2000.

Drug maker Schering-Plough was the defendant in the other 2 cases.

Government recoveries from Pfizer totaled $430 million, and the two Schering settlements were $345 million and $27 million.

This is the second FCA whistleblower settlement entered into by Pfizer, and the second largest drug maker settlement ever when measured by the combined civil recovery of $430 million and the criminal fine of $240 million.

The Pfizer case broke new legal ground by recovering losses to Medicaid resulting from the illegal off-label promotion of a drug for uses other than those approved as safe and effective.

At the time of the settlement in May 2004, Pfizer's drug, Neurontin, ranked 9th among all drugs sold in the US, with annual sales of $2.7 billion, according to IMS Health, "Leading 20 Products by U.S. Sales, Moving Annual Total, June 2004," www.imshealth.com.

The whistleblower, David Franklin, a former medical liaison for Parke-Davis, who filed the FCA lawsuit, received a $24.6 million settlement, when Warner-Lambert agreed to plead guilty to two felonies to settle charges that it fraudulently promoted Neurontin for a wide variety of unapproved uses.

Among the tactics the DOJ found the company using to achieve its goal of increasing off-label use of Neurontin were the following:

(1) Encouraging sales reps to provide one-on-one sales pitches, or "details," to physicians about off-label uses of Neurontin;

(2) Utilizing medical liaisons, who represented themselves, often falsely, as neutral scientific experts on Neurontin, to promote off-label uses, working in tandem with the sales reps to directly sell Neurontin to physicians for off-label uses;

(3) Paying doctors to allow a sales reps to see patients with the doctor and to participate in discussing the treatment plan;

(4) Paying physicians, through both direct payments, and trips, hotel rooms, dinners and other benefits, to attend meetings termed "consultant" or "advisory" meetings or "speaker bureau trainings" in which doctors received listened to presentations about off-label uses;

(5) Implementing frequent teleconferences in which doctors were paid to speak about Neurontin on off-label topics to other doctors; and

(6) Sponsoring independent "medical education" events on off-label uses where there was actually extensive input from the company on topics, speakers, content, and participants.

"Neurontin was marketed for four broad categories of unapproved use: pain, psychiatric use, monotherapy and dosage," the DOJ stated. In fact, the company promoted the drug for so many unapproved uses, the DOJ said, "some employees referred to the list of these uses as the "snake oil" list."

In the settlement agreement, the company admitted that it aggressively marketed the drug by illicit means for unapproved uses including pain, bipolar disorder, migraines, and drug and alcohol withdrawal.

The prosecutors described the harm that resulted from the off-label scheme as: (1) health care reimbursement programs such as Medicaid paid more in reimbursement; (2) consumers paid for ineffective, experimental use and may have been improperly medicated; (3) improper medication could have resulted where Neurontin was not as effective as another approved drug; and (4) unnecessary exposure of patients to adverse side effects of Neurontin.

The prosecutors said Warner-Lambert turned Neurontin into a blockbuster drug with promotional tactics like paying doctors "honoraria" to listen to sales pitches on the off-label use of the drug and by treating physicians to luxury trips to Florida, Hawaii, and Atlanta for the 1996 Olympics.

According to court documents filed in the case, doctors were paid honoraria to listen to presentations that took place at: “Bus to Yankee Stadium,” “World Yacht Cruise” and “Braves Stadium.”

On one weekend in April 1996, the DOJ discovered that Warner-Lambert had arranged 2 weekend “consultant” meetings, one at the Jupiter Beach Resort in Palm Beach, Florida, and the other at the Ritz-Carlton in Aspen, Colorado. Both were 3 day affairs, for which each attendee received a $250 cash payment, plus airfare, and all other expenses paid at the resort, and the doctors who acted as faculty were also paid between $1,500 and $2,000.

According to the DOJ, the total cost for the Jupiter Beach weekend was approximately $361,000 for about 100 doctors, meaning the price per doctor was about $3,000, and the cost of the Aspen weekend ran about the same.

Documents showed that both meetings included presentations on off-label topics such as “Neurontin: Use as Monotherapy,” and “Reduction of Pain Symptoms During Treatment with Gabapentin,” that were designed to present information to the attendees, rather than to receive information from consultants.

One advisory board was treated to an extravaganza at the 1996 summer Olympics in Atlanta, Georgia. Along with free Olympics tickets valued at $650 each, the company staged an Epilepsy Advisory Meeting, at the Chateau Elan Winery and Resort, in Atlanta.

The brochure for the event describes the resort as: "Chateau Elan has made a name for itself as a fine winery. It is now earning a reputation as a one-of-a-kind resort... Here, you’ll enjoy all the comforts and amenities you’d expect of a fine resort, mellowed by the warm ambiance of a French country inn."

"During your meeting breaks," the brochure says, "you will have the opportunity to play a round at one of three accessible golf courses, swim, play tennis, explore the Georgia hill country by foot or by horseback, or escape to Chateau’s European style spa for a pampering body treatment...."

For this event, records show the company paid all expenses for 18 advisers and their spouses, and each adviser was given $750 in cash for spending. In planning the Olympics advisory board meeting, a company document obtained by the DOJ, referred to the cost of the event as a “$3 million investment.”

Another example of the lavish meetings doctors attended for free, was the Western Advisory Board Meeting, held at the Grand Wailea Resort, Hotel & Spa in Maui, Hawaii in April 2000.

Only one of the attendees resided in Hawaii and the company paid for all of the others to fly to Hawaii for a two night stay at the resort to attend only 3 hours of meetings, all on off-label uses of Neurontin, according to the DOJ.

In planning this meeting, the company targeted doctors whose uses for Neurontin were only off-label and "evidence shows this event was promotional, not an independent, scientific meeting," according to the DOJ's sentencing memorandum.

The DOJ said Parke-Davis held hundreds of meetings where doctors were paid to attend, and paid even more to speak and that Parke-Davis was especially interested in two types of physicians: (1) those who prescribed large amounts of anti-convulsants; and (2) those who had a prominent reputation.

These doctors were often referred to as the “movers and shakers” or “thought leaders” because of their influence, and were recruited as spokespersons on behalf of Neurontin.

Parke-Davis paid key “thought leaders” well who could be counted on to deliver a strongly favorable message on off-label use. At least 20 of these doctors, the DOJ said, were paid more than $50,000 over time for speaking on the company’s behalf. In fact, some received in excess of $250,000.

Corporate documents show, the DOJ says, that the company focused its attention on recruiting doctors from major teaching hospitals to serve as "Neurontin champions."

For example, documents show that Dr Steven Schachter, a professor at Harvard Medical School and a physician at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston received $71,477 between May 1994 and September 1997, and a Dr B.J. Wilder, a former professor of neurology at the University of Florida, was paid more than $300,000 for speeches given between 1994 and 1997. Six other doctors, including some from top medical schools, the DOJ said, received more than $100, 000 each.

The most common forums for speakers were consultant and advisory board meetings, where doctors were gathered to listen to a presentation. Parke-Davis justified holding these meetings, because it entered into pro forma consultant agreements with the physician attendees and doctors were paid anywhere from $250-$2,500 to serve as consultants or advisers.

In one 6-month period alone, the DOJ said, Park-Davis held over 50 meetings and despite being called “consultant” meetings, the actual objective was to provide off-label information to the doctors rather than to receive information from the consultants.

During its investigation, the DOJ discovered that doctors were misled into believing that educational programs they attended were independent programs when they were actually led by the drug maker. For example, prosecutors found a Ward-Lambert relationship with a company known as Physicians World where Warner-Lambert employees transferred to Physicians World to run the company's speakers bureau.

At the same time, a division of Physicians World, known as Professional Post-Graduate Services, purported to be an independent education provider for a program on anticonvulsants for pain, when in fact, Ward-Lambert staff planned and developed the program and thousands of US doctors took the classes.

This program was provided to thousands of doctors all around the country and in each instance, the materials stated that they were created in compliance with ACCME guidelines, which prohibited content control by Parke-Davis as a condition of accreditation, and required disclosure of all financial affiliations.

The materials did not disclose the relationship between Physicians World and Parke-Davis, and did not disclose the financial links between Parke-Davis and each of the faculty members, all of whom were paid consultants, the DOJ said.

For instance, one physician was a regular Neurontin speaker who had received payments of more than $10,000 and yet by the listing of each faculty member, there was an asterisk indicating “no significant financial or other affiliation reported."

"This evidence," the US attorney said, "demonstrates that Parke-Davis knew that these events were unlawful promotional activities."

Another method of promoting face-to-face was the preceptorship, or “shadowing.” This involved paying a doctor to allow a sales rep to follow the doctor through the course of a day seeing patients. In one example, a sales rep did a preceptorship with a neurologist and after they saw a teenage patient, the doctor and the sales rep discussed treatment options.

The sales rep advised the doctor to increase the Neurontin dose and at the same time, taper the patient off other epilepsy medication to reduce side effects, thus resulting in Neurontin being used for monotherapy. According to the sales rep, as recorded in a voice mail sent in to the company obtained by the DOJ: “I really felt I made a difference. I saw the actual prescription generated in front of me... and I certainly felt that me being there, I had some influence on that medical decision.”

Another patient seen was a 65 year old veteran who suffered neuralgia with pain in his limbs. The patient developed blurred vision while on Neurontin; and the sales rep told the doctor that such side effects are mild and transient and so the doctor kept the patient on the drug. In the sales rep’s own words: “I felt like I influenced that particular situation. So again, another prescription was generated for us. Overall, the day went, you know, very well. And we had the immediate impact of two prescriptions written.”

The DOJ said the drug maker decided not to seek an expanded use for Neurontin with the FDA because it would have required solid proof from clinical trials so instead, the company boosted sales through promotional strategies, even for conditions where studies had indicated that Neurontin was not effective.

In his sentencing Memorandum the US Attorney noted: "One of the psychiatric uses for which Neurontin was promoted ... bipolar disorder, was particularly troubling because the Company had very weak evidence of Neurontin's efficacy in treating this condition."

"Indeed," the prosecutor wrote, "in one study ... the placebo was as effective or more effective than was Neurontin."

Moreover, the DOJ found the company paid no attention even when the FDA did refuse to approve an additional use. For instance, Parke-Davis sought approval for use as a monotherapy on September 16, 1996, but because one of 2 clinical trials submitted with the application showed no demonstrable monotherapy efficacy, on August 26, 1997, the FDA rejected the application.

Nonetheless, the DOJ found that Parke-Davis had actively promoted the drug for monotherapy before it applied for approval, and after the FDA rejected its application right through at least 2000, when slides, lecture summaries and audiotapes obtained by the DOJ demonstrate that Parke-Davis continued to promote Neurontin for monotherapy without ever mentioning the fact that the FDA had rejected its application.

Documented examples listed by the DOJ, of statements made after the FDA's non-approval include a marketing event in 1998, where Parke-Davis went so far as to state that Neurontin was “now approved as monotherapy for seizures.”

In his whistleblower lawsuit, Mr Franklin explained how Warner-Lambert had hired two marketing firms to write favorable articles about the unapproved uses of Neurontin and to find doctors willing to sign their names as the authors. The marketing firms, he said, were paid $12,000 for the articles and the doctors were paid $1,000 for signing off as authors.

The off-label scheme proved to be highly successful. By government estimates, citing company documents and independent market research, by 2002, 94% of Neurontin's sales were for off-label use, up from 40% in 1995.

At the time of the settlement in 2004, Vermont Attorney General, William Sorrell, noted that a 30-day supply of Neurontin at a common dose sold for $205.

Under the terms of the settlement agreement, Pfizer agreed to:

(A) plead guilty to inadequately labeling of Neurontin and to introducing Neurontin into interstate commerce for unapproved purposes, which, by virtue of its prior violation of the Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act, constitute felony violations of the Act, and to pay a $240,000,000 criminal fine;

(B) settle its False Claims Act and other civil liabilities and to pay the Government $83,600,000, plus interest, in civil damages for losses suffered by the federally funded portion of the Medicaid program as a result of off-label promotion of Neurontin;

(C) settle its civil liabilities to the 50 states and the District of Columbia in an amount of $68,400,000, plus interest, in civil damages for losses suffered by the state-funded portion of the Medicaid program as a result of off-label promotion of Neurontin;

(D) settle its civil liabilities to the Consumer Protection divisions of 50 states and the District of Columbia state attorney general's offices in an amount of $38,000,000, plus interest, in civil damages for losses suffered by consumers and to fund a remediation program designed to offset the impact of the improper marketing of Neurontin; and

(E) comply with the terms of an amendment to the corporate compliance program of its parent, Pfizer, which, among other things, proscribes off-label marketing and requires training of employees and audits of its marketing practices.

At the time of the settlement, Pfizer issued a statement that said the illegal practices took place before Pfizer acquired Warner-Lambert in 2000. However, even if true, sales figures reveal that Pfizer was still reaping the benefits of the scheme at the time of the settlement.

For instance, on August 19, 2004, USA Today noted that: "Pfizer's confession that the success of one of its top drugs was built partly on fraud may have been humbling, but it isn't hurting the bottom line. Neurontin sales last quarter rose 32% from a year ago, and 2004 sales should pass last year's $2.7 billion."

"With few exceptions," USA said, "state Medicaid programs pay for Neurontin just as before and so do major insurers."

Pfizer's denials also rang hollow at the time due to the fact that the company's regulatory filings showed the DOJ was also scrutinizing its off-label marketing of the Genotropin growth hormone and a federal grand jury in Maryland was taking testimony from former Pfizer employees about the diabetes drug, Rezulin, that was pulled off the market in 2000 after it was linked to over 60 liver-related deaths.

But as far as fearing the FDA, the drug companies had no fear and apparently for good reason. documents unearthed in litigation reveal that the FDA was well aware of the company's off-label marketing scheme eight years before the settlement. In July, 1996, FDA official, Lesley Frank, wrote to Parke-Davis and said in part:

"Parke-Davis may be promoting Neurontin for 'off-label' uses ... in printed promotional materials, in detail or sales presentations to physicians, and through the use of company-solicited physician participation in a series of teleconferences.

"These promotions of Neurontin for off-label uses included, but were not limited to, its use in chronic pain, bipolar disorders, and other psychiatric conditions. As you are aware, Neurontin's only approved indication was for adjunctive therapy in the treatment of partial seizures with and without secondary generalization in adults with epilepsy."

Documents show that after 11 months, Parke-Davis responded and denied all allegations and the FDA simply accepted the company's denial and the issue was dropped.

As part of the settlement with the DOJ, Warner-Lambert pleaded guilty only to conduct that occurred before August 21, 1996, even though illegal conduct is documented as occurring much later than 1996.

This part of the agreement made it possible for Pfizer to continue to participate in government health care programs despite an August 21, 1996, health care fraud law that would have led to its exclusion.

In addition to financial fraud, the company pleaded guilty to criminal misbranding of the drug in promotional and advertising material claiming that "the drug is safe and effective for uses which have not been approved by the FDA."

Pfizer's settlement with the DOJ did not cover damages for any patients who may have been harmed by Neurontin and those patients are entitled to file personal injury lawsuits.

Pfizer is currently engaged in multi-district litigation (MDL). On October 26, 2004, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation consolidated nearly all Neurontin off-label cases in the US District Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The JPML is a panel of seven federal judges chosen by the Chief Justice of the US Supreme Court that decides on the appropriateness of establishing an MDL, and where the MDL should reside. The MDL brings together lawsuits with common claims to determine pretrial matters.

The MDL primarily involves cases of consumers who purchased Neurontin for off-label uses that Pfizer knew showed no efficacy but more lawsuits have been filed on behalf of persons who suffered adverse effects when Neurontin was prescribed for off-label uses. The first Neurontin trial is expected to take place later this year or early 2007.

In 2004, the New York law firm of Finkelstein & Partners filed several lawsuits and announced plans to file many more. At the time, the firm’s senior partner, Andrew Finkelstein, said he had gathered the names of 160 people who committed suicide and 2000 more who attempted suicide while taking Neurontin.

In addition to handling lawsuits, for more than 2 years Mr Finkelstein's law firm has been warning the FDA about patients committing suicide while taking Neurontin and asked the FDA numerous times to add a black box warning to Neurontin's label about the risk of suicide in patients taking the drug. As of October 2005, Mr Finkelstein has been contacted by the relatives of 425 people who committed suicide while on Neurontin.

After a year of inaction by the FDA, on March 21, 2005, Mr Finkelstein wrote a letter to the FDA's Dr Russell Katz and said in part: "Enclosed you will find two hundred fifty eight MedWatch forms … Each represents a suicide of an American who was on Neurontin when he or she took his or her own life."

Mr Franelstein told Dr Katz the "complete inaction by the FDA to warn an unknowing population that was relying upon the FDA to require warnings for potential adverse events from off-label usage is deplorable."

"Since our conversation of March 31, 2004," he wrote, "my firm has learned of seventy four additional suicides that occurred after that date."

"Many of these suicides likely could have been prevented," he said, "had both the treating physician and unsuspecting families been armed with full knowledge of the risks of suicide that was known to both the FDA and the manufacturer."

Neurontin was recommended for approval by the Neuropharmacolgical Drug Products Division of the FDA in 1992, and according to Mr Finkelstein, at that time, Mr Katz oversaw the FDA’s analysis of the clinical data supplied by the sponsor seeking approval to sell Neurontin.

Mr Finkelstein obtained the FDA's 1992 analysis of the New Drug Application for Neurontin, and in reviewing the data, he told Dr Katz he found "shocking information."

"During your evaluation of serious adverse events that occurred during original clinical trials," he advised Dr Katz in the letter, "the risk of Neurontin causing suicide was both known and a major concern."

The FDA reviewer from your Division, Mr Finkelstein pointed out, "specifically stated in December, 1992:

"Serious adverse events may limit the drug's widespread usefulness. Depression, while it may not be an infrequent occurrence in the epileptic population, may become worse and require intervention or lead to suicide, as it has resulted in some suicidal attempts during clinical trials.

"In fact, during the clinical trials ... Neurontin was attributable to four people actually attempting suicide, two more having depression with suicidal ideations and twenty two participants reporting depression so severe it required pharmacologic intervention.

"Additionally," he said, "nineteen of the seventy eight participants who reported depression during the clinical trials had no prior history of depression."

"Clearly," Mr Finkelstein wrote, "the FDA did not approve this drug with any expectation of use beyond the approved indication."

"Even though the FDA knew Neurontin caused depression that may lead to suicide and that Neurontin's effects were never fully tested on people who suffered from chronic pain, bipolar disorder or other psychiatric conditions," he told Dr Katz, "the FDA acted with no urgency."

Mr Finkelstein reminded Dr Katz of the company's 2004 conviction for fraud in the DOJ case and said: "The complicity by the FDA in Parke-Davis's scheme to defraud physicians and consumers is more egregious than the underlying fraud itself."

"The governmental body charged with the responsibility of protecting the health and safety of Americans has done absolutely nothing to prevent entirely preventable deaths," he continued. "Such complicity borders on criminality," he added.

On October 14, 2005, Mr Finkelstein wrote another letter to Dr Katz and summarized the efforts by his law firm to get the FDA to warn people about the risk of suicide over 2 years and began by saying: "Due to the continued public danger facing a substantial class of prescription drug users, I am compelled to write to you regarding the FDA's ineffective oversight related to appropriate warnings for Neurontin."

"On March 31, 2004," he reminded Mr Katz, "you were advised of thousands of serious psychiatric adverse events that occurred while Americans were taking Neurontin."

"At that time," he said, "the FDA recognized a potential imminent health crisis existed, yet nothing was done to require enhanced warning labels."

"Due to the FDA's inaction," Mr Finkelstein continued, "my firm filed a citizen's petition on May 17, 2004 with the hope that the FDA would investigate the potential for Neurontin contributing to self-injurious behavior."

In addition to the black box warning, the Petition asked that a Dear Doctor letter be sent to health care providers cautioning them to be on alert for increased depression in patients taking Neurontin.

"The FDA took six (6) months to respond," Mr Finkelstein told Dr Katz, "and stated no decision had been reached and more time was needed to investigate."

"All investigations, if any," he wrote, "have been couched in secrecy and not open to public scrutiny while the same serious health crisis continues."

"Regrettably," the letter concluded, "this is an example of why the American people have lost faith in the FDA's ability to protect them from unsafe drugs."

"While your real motivations are not known at this time," he advised, "it is clear your interest is not in discovering the truth or protecting the health and safety of the American people."

Author, Dr Marcia Angell, also recognizes the massive influence that drug companies exert over the FDA, Congress, and doctors, and how this influence is harming Americans.

After she resigned as interim editor-in-chief of the New England Journal of Medicine in 2000, Dr Angell decided to write a book about the biases in clinical trials but in doing her research, says she discovered that "all roads led back to drug companies."

Her book, "The Truth about Drug Companies: How They Deceive Us and What to Do About It," provides an indepth account of the entanglements between Big Pharma and every area of the health care field including government agencies, doctors, medical journals, Congress, and universities, as well as how these relationships harm the public.

During an August 18, 2004 interview with Business Week Online, Dr Angell told reporter Amy Tsao, that she saves her harshest criticism for her fellow physicians and the medical profession as a whole. "After all," she said, "the industry is in business to make money, but that isn't what doctors and medical schools should be doing."

"They don't have to be in bed with the drug companies," she said. "But they are."

Dr Angell explained how drug companies finance most of the continuing education seminars for doctors, as well as meetings of professional societies, and how they lavish all kinds of gifts on doctors including dinners in fancy restaurants and trips to exotic resorts.

"And they provide speakers and meals for interns and residents in teaching hospitals," she told Business Week.

All of which, she says, adds to the high cost of prescription drugs. "The profession should acknowledge that this is all a form of marketing," she said, "which adds to the prices of prescription drugs."

"Doctors should take responsibility for their own education and buy their own meals," Dr Angell said.

The most perverse examples of off-label marketing involve drugging children. In 2001, Dr Stefan Kruszewski, a Harvard-trained psychiatrist working for the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare, began investigating the widespread off-label use of psychotropic drugs and found cases of what he calls "horrendous polypharmacy."

The first disturbing pattern he noticed was that an overwhelming number of patients were being prescribed Neurontin to treat conditions like anxiety, depression, psychosis and impotence. "The FDA had not approved using that drug for mental illnesses," he noted.

Dr Kruszewski found patients on as many as 5 medications at the same time, something he says is "hard to justify."

One of the most disturbing cases he found was a mentally retarded 15-year-old girl who was supposedly being treated for being defiance and sexual promiscuity.

Dr Kruszewski discovered that the girl was on 11 different drugs, including five anti-psychotics, even though she had no diagnosis of a psychiatric disorder. "She was so overmedicated," he said, "that she had trouble getting out of bed or standing up by herself."

"Although physicians can choose to prescribe virtually any medication for any condition," he explains, "the promotion of Neurontin remains the subject of intense scrutiny since Pfizer's off-label promotion was previously the subject of civil and criminal penalties by the US Department of Justice."

"In my opinion as a clinical and academic psychiatrist," Dr Kruszewski says, "Neurontin's link to severe emotional and cognitive disturbances, including mania, depression, suicide and memory loss, continues to be the most egregious aspect of Neurontin's promotion."

"It causes suffering, morbidity and death," he noted, "problems that Pfizer and the current generic makers of Neurontin have failed to make known to consumers and potential victims," he said.

Attorney, Zena Crenshaw, Executive Director for National Judicial Conduct and Disability Law Project, agrees that off-label prescribing is a major problem and says any drug manufacturer even suspected of such "market expansion" should be called to the carpet.

"The idea of salesmen hyping drugs to doctors," she says, "for conditions beyond those for which the products were approved is unnerving."

"Considering that even dire prescription drug warnings probably reflect a minimum level of adequate care," she warns, "prescribing drugs off-label should seem universally hazardous."

When Dr Kruszewski warned his superiors that off-label use of the drugs was not only harmful to patients but could also expose the state to liability from lawsuits by injured patients, he was told "it's none of your business."

When Dr Kruszewski continued to voice his concerns he was told to quit digging up dirt and when he refused to let go he was fired. He has since filed a whistleblower lawsuit against state officials and 6 drug companies including Pfizer alleging among other things, that the defendants: "through the use of political friendships, money and other emoluments, effectively achieved a level of influence with Pennsylvania's state government that allowed them to abuse state finances and state citizens with impunity."

The Government Accountability Project (GAP) is a nonprofit public interest group that promotes government and corporate accountability by advancing occupational free speech, defending whistleblowers, and empowering citizen activists.

The GAP is assisting Dr Kruszewski with his lawsuit against the drug giants. Mark Cohen, an attorney with the GAP, describes whistleblowers like Dr Kruszewski as "regular people who have been pushed beyond the limits their consciences can bear."

"They feel a moral duty to set the situation right," he says.

"They can no longer "go along to get along" in the face of wrongdoing," he explains. "And they can't simply opt out -- take another job and keep their lips sealed -- and ignore the wrongdoing," he says.

"But if "right" and "wrong" mean anything," Mr Cohen says, "they feel they don't really have a choice but to blow the whistle."

"Of course, they do so at great personal risk," he says he recognizes. "Speaking up puts their current job in jeopardy and it threatens to brand them as trouble-makers with other employers."

In fact, people who do expose the highly profitable Medicaid fraud or off-label practices often find themselves fired like Dr Kruszewski. However, the False Claims Act now provides a cause of action for whistleblowers with remedies that include reinstatement to their job, 3 times the wages lost, compensatory damages, and attorney's fees.

FEDERAL LAWSUIT HEATS UP OVER FDA\l "I" OVERSIGHT OF RX COMPOUNDING

Oral arguments are scheduled Thursday in a federal court case in Texas that could end once and for all the persistent battle FDA and compounding pharmacies have waged over the agency's right, if any, to exercise authority over the medications the pharmacies alter at doctors' requests to meet patients' special needs.

Nine pharmacies filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court\l "I" of Western Texas in September 2004 claiming FDA is conducting unauthorized inspections of compounding pharmacies, unfairly treating compounded drugs as new drugs that require agency approval and blocking access to bulk drug ingredients.

Attorneys for both sides filed motions for summary judgment in late March asking District Judge Robert Junell to make a decision on the case based on current evidence without a jury trial. They will argue their positions Thursday, according to an industry source.

Compounding pharmacies alter commercial drugs to meet unique patient needs, such as dye removal for patients with allergies or preparation of an intravenous ingestion method. Often, the compounded drug can meet the needs of a large number of patients, but not quite a large enough number to entice commercial manufacturers to seek new drug approval.

At the crux of the plaintiffs' argument is the assertion that FDA\l "I" has been increasingly auditing compounding pharmacies over the last several years. Compounding pharmacies comply with FDA's\l "I" authority to inspect their equipment and ingredients used to prepare medications, but do not believe Congress has granted FDA\l "I" the authority to review their records, a source said. State boards of pharmacy currently regulate compounding pharmacies' books, although dual federal and state regulation of any entity is not uncommon.

Compounding pharmacies allege the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (FDCA), which empowered FDA\l "I" to regulate drug manufacturers, does not apply to them. The difference between manufacturers and compounding pharmacies, an industry source said, is compounding pharmacies prepare a drug to fulfill a prescription for distribution directly to a patient or a doctor who will administer the drug, while a manufacturer first makes a drug and then a market is created.

While both sides fought over the issue, Congress passed the FDA\l "I" Modernization Act in 1997 with a provision, Section 503A, that exempted compounding pharmacies from FDCA. The U.S. Supreme Court\l "I" overturned Section 503A in 2002 when pharmacists sued over part of the provision that prohibited compounding pharmacies from advertising their products.

Compounding pharmacies claim Section 503A was done to explicitly ensure their exempt status, a source said. But Senior Trial Counsel for the Department of Justice Gerald Kell argues Section 503A proved FDCA applied to compounding pharmacies, according to court\l "I" documents.

In addition, FDA\l "I" created guidelines for compounding human drugs in 2002 and veterinary drugs in 2003 -- provisions of which the pharmacies are asking the court\l "I" to overturn. In the guidance for human compounded drugs, FDA\l "I" states it will hold compounding pharmacies to the same requirements as manufacturers, including obtaining new drug approval, if they take part in certain activities. Activities FDA\l "I" believes stray too close to manufacturing but that compounding pharmacies argue are unreasonable include preparing compounded medications in anticipation of receiving prescriptions except in very limited quantities and when FDA\l "I" considers a drug is only "slightly" different than the manufactured drug.

Proponents of compounding pharmacies believe they should be able to stockpile compounded drugs based on prescription history. Proponents also believe doctors should be left to decide what is "slightly" different from the manufactured drug and what variation is vital for the patients' health. Compounding pharmacies agree some of the activities FDA\l "I" lists should be viewed as manufacturing, but view some of the activities prohibited for compounding as an attempt by FDA\l "I" to protect manufacturers' market share, an industry source said.

As compounding grows in popularity, compounding pharmacists believe FDA\l "I" is targeting them under pressure from manufacturers. FDA\l "I" claims compounding pharmacists are acting more like manufacturers, requiring more regulation.

Kell also points out in court\l "I" documents that FDA\l "I" always viewed compounded drugs as new drugs subject to an approval process, but exercised enforcement discretion to balance patients' needs with warranted enforcement.

The pharmacies also have asked the Texas court\l "I" to address a provision in FDA's\l "I" guidelines for compounded veterinary drugs that prohibits compounding pharmacies from using bulk ingredients for animal drugs.

A decision could come as early as Thursday on the motions for summary judgment, although judges rarely make decisions from the bench, a source said.

Bush may cite secrets to disconnect phone lawsuit

BY ANDREW ZAJAC

WASHINGTON - A suit filed this week in Chicago by author Studs Terkel and others accusing AT&T of invading its customers' privacy by sharing phone records with the National Security Agency could provide the next test of whether the Bush administration employs a once-rare tactic that essentially gives the government a blank check to kill civil suits.

Earlier this month, Justice Department lawyers intervened in an invasion-of-privacy suit in San Francisco against AT&T and asserted what is known as the state secrets privilege by asking a judge to dismiss the case because they said allowing it to go forward would compromise national security.

The government has repeatedly invoked the state secrets privilege to head off challenges to two of the most sensitive aspects of the administration's war on terror - domestic electronic surveillance and so-called extraordinary renditions. In the latter instance, suspected terrorists are secretly picked up overseas and sent to foreign countries for interrogations under harsh conditions.

All told, the administration has asserted the privilege at least six times since 2001.
Last week, the government used the privilege to short-circuit a German man's suit alleging that he was wrongfully imprisoned in Afghanistan for five months in a case of mistaken identity. In the San Francisco invasion-of-privacy suit, brought by the nonprofit Electronic Frontier Foundation, a judge has set a June date for arguments on the government's secrets claim.

The suit charges that AT&T gave NSA access to databases of domestic and international Internet and telephone records without obtaining prior court approval.

The Justice Department declined to discuss specific cases. The department said in a statement that both the head of an agency seeking to protect information, such as the Central Intelligence Agency or NSA, and Justice Department lawyers must agree that national security is at stake before asking a court to dismiss a case.

But Harvey Grossman, legal director of the ACLU of Illinois, which co-filed the Chicago suit, said invoking the state secrets privilege has moved from an extremely selectively used tool to a weapon of choice in combating suits challenging national security policy. "Anything that touches on national security, we expect to see" an assertion of the state secrets privilege, Grossman said.

He said he expects the government to use the privilege in the Illinois lawsuit, but "we're hoping we can convince a judge that the case can be tried in a way that protects the government's legitimate interests." The Illinois case is narrower in scope than the one in California, he said.

Although use of the secrets privilege is limited to the federal government, Verizon, a telecom company linked in news accounts to the NSA surveillance program, has tried to shield itself from regulatory scrutiny by arguing that its hands are tied by the administration's use of the privilege.

"The inability of Verizon to provide information concerning its cooperation, if any, with the NSA program is further demonstrated by the `state secrets' privilege which the Department of Justice has invoked in connection with a pending federal court action," the company wrote in a filing with the Maine Public Utility Board. The board is conducting an inquiry after a customer complained.

A company spokesman declined to comment. In an earlier statement, Verizon denied supplying various specific categories of telecom data to the NSA but said it would neither confirm nor deny "whether it has any relationship to the classified NSA program."

In addition to its use in NSA surveillance cases, the state secrets privilege has been cited at least twice in high-profile cases challenging renditions.

On May 17, a Washington judge accepted the government's assertion of a secrets privilege in dismissing a case brought by Khaled al-Masri, a German citizen who said he was a victim of mistaken identity when he was arrested in Macedonia in December 2003 and flown to Afghanistan, imprisoned and beaten. The judge said that if al-Masri's claims were true, he deserved redress but that national security trumped his cause.

The government also cited state secrets in the case of Maher Arar, a Syrian and Canadian citizen who said he was detained while transiting through New York's Kennedy International Airport in September 2002 and flown to Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured. He eventually was released and never charged with a crime.

In throwing out Arar's case in February, the judge did not specifically rule on the government's secrets claim but said Arar did not have legal standing for his suit and noted the "national security and foreign policy considerations at stake."

The state secrets privilege, recognized in modern form in a 1953 Supreme Court case, was used sparingly and narrowly for decades.

But in the past quarter century or so, use of the privilege has grown more frequent. The scope of requests has also expanded, with the government seeking the elimination of particular pieces of evidence and asking that entire cases be tossed out of court, according to Mark Zaid, a Washington attorney who represented plaintiffs in three recent cases ended by assertion of the secrets privilege.

The privilege is a particularly lethal legal weapon because the federal judiciary is loath to dispute executive branch decisions on national security questions and almost never rejects a government request for secrecy. "The judges don't want to be the ones who release the family jewels," Zaid said.

As a result, there's a powerful temptation for government lawyers to overuse the privilege, because, Zaid said, "They know the judges will accept it."

Suit says AT&T violated privacy laws
Company is accused of giving phone data to U.S. spy agency

Friday, May 26, 2006

ST. LOUIS — AT&T broke Missouri privacy laws when it allowed federal agents access to phone records of millions of customers, a lawsuit filed in St. Louis alleges.

The suit is part of a backlash across the country to news reports that several phone companies revealed calling information to the National Security Agency. Complaints about the alleged disclosures were made Wednesday by the American Civil Liberties Union to utility commissioners and attorneys general in 20 states, including Missouri.

The class action suit in St. Louis Circuit Court cites state regulatory laws that protect the privacy of phone customers, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch reported Thursday. Violations are felonies. Many states have similar laws.

The records at issue are said to include who called and for how long.

Phone companies can share records with the government or other third parties with a court order or with customer approval. The suit, brought on behalf of AT&T customers in Missouri, alleges that neither was the case.

“This comprehensive and warrantless gathering and disclosure of telephone logs violates Missouri law,” says the suit by lawyer Joseph Dulle.

Meanwhile, Missouri Public Service Commission members Robert Clayton and Steve Gaw said that AT&T had refused to cooperate with their investigation. They said they would start a formal investigation and issue subpoenas requiring the company to disclose with whom it shared customer records.

AT&T is the largest telephone company in Missouri. It has not confirmed or denied giving customer records to the government.

Walt Sharp, a spokesman for the San Antonio-based company, said AT&T does not comment on pending litigation or “national security issues.” Sharp also pointed to a letter the company sent last week to the Public Service Commission in Jefferson City.

That letter says AT&T shares customer information with law enforcement or other government agencies only with legal authorization.

AT&T told the commissioners that it shares consumer records with the government “strictly within the law.”

President Bush and other administration officials have neither confirmed nor denied a USA Today report that the NSA is collecting the calling records of Americans in its effort to detect the plans of al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations. But the White House has insisted that its surveillance has been within the law.

The St. Louis suit alleges that AT&T is still giving the government customer records, including databases that keep track of telephone numbers and the length of calls.

Editorial: Don't let lawsuit do end run around FBI security checks

Joel J. Sprayregen ; Special to The Chicago Sun-Times

A group with proven links to terrorism is demanding "immediate" U.S\l "l". citizenship for Arab men whose FBI background checks have not been completed. The Council on American-Islamic Relations and other groups have sued\l "l" in U.S\l "l". District Court in Chicago on behalf of nine Arabs and one Pakistani. Plaintiffs admit that "background checks performed by the FBI are not yet completed," but complain that naturalization takes "significantly longer" for Muslim men.

America's generous traditions suggest that applicants for citizenship not be consigned to limbo for lengthy periods. But since 9/11 we live, at our peril, in a new world of security concerns. Candidates for citizenship must pass two main events -- i.e., interview by the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services plus FBI background checks, especially the crucial "name check," to ascertain involvement in terrorism or crime. No sane person can suggest FBI checks are superfluous; they are essential to national security.

CAIR seeks to exploit efforts by CIS to expedite naturalization. Stung by accusations of bureaucratic inertia, CIS speeded processes so applications -- including interviews -- are generally completed within six months. In less than 1 percent of cases, the FBI did not complete name checks as swiftly as CIS completed interviews. According to CIS, 82 percent of name checks are completed within a few weeks and 99 percent within six months; the remaining 1 percent of applications "can sometimes take months and in rare instances years to resolve." More than 3.3 million name checks were conducted in 2005. The plaintiffs had their CIS interviews between March 2004 and September 2005.

Daunting obstacles delay checks requiring special FBI attention, including translations from non-Roman alphabets, multiple aliases (each must be checked) in countries where using several names is common, reliability of governments supplying information and profusion of identical names (three plaintiffs are named Mohamed). The gravity of the risks is illustrated by renewal of Mohammed Atta's visa after 9/11.

Federal law allows the court to take jurisdiction if CIS has not determined citizenship 120 days after the interview. CIS will not act without completion of FBI checks, for which the statute sets no deadlines. CAIR asks the Court to order "immediate . . . naturalization of plaintiffs," notwithstanding incomplete FBI checks. Alarmingly, the case is a class action for "all Muslim males applying for naturalization." The complaint claims 35,000 Muslim men apply annually. CAIR thus seeks to have thousands of Muslim men naturalized annually without complete FBI checks.

A peek at the record of CAIR functionaries might illuminate the motivation of CAIR for seeking to bypass FBI name checks. CAIR has been sued for wrongful death and other alleged wrongs in federal court in New York by the estate of John P. O'Neill, former head of FBI counterterrorism, who was killed on 9/11. Case documents reveal facts including the following:

uGhassin Elashi, founder of CAIR-Texas, was convicted of knowingly doing business with Abu Marzook, a designated terrorist who was deported in 1997 and is now a Hamas chief in Damascus.

uRandall Royer, CAIR communications specialist and civil rights co-ordinator, was indicted for conspiring to help al-Qaida and convicted of terrorist\l "l"-related weapons charges.

uRabih Hadid, CAIR fund-raiser and co-founder of a foundation\l "l" frozen by the U.S. Treasury for financing al-Qaida, was deported. CAIR solicited donations for the foundation.

uSiraji Wahajr of CAIR's board of advisers was named unindicted co-conspirator in the first World Trade Center bombing.

CAIR's activities have drawn authoritative scrutiny. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) described CAIR as an organization "which we know has ties to terrorism." Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.) observes CAIR is "unusual in its extreme rhetoric and associations." FBI counterterrorism chief Steven Pomerantz said, "CAIR, its leaders and activities effectively give aid to international terrorist groups."

Justice Robert Jackson, chief Nuremberg prosecutor, warned that "the Bill of Rights should not be converted into a suicide pact." One hopes the courts will uphold national security by allowing complete FBI checks on all applicants for citizenship and that CAIR's record will be exposed in the lawsuit.

Editorial: Dodging blame for errors drags U.S. down

Marie Cocco

May 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — No justice, no peace. The phrase is worn from overuse at too many protests of too many wrongs, real or perceived.

Still, it is the most apt reaction to the sad and infuriating case of Khaled al-Masri.

Masri is a German citizen who was mistakenly seized from a tourist bus en route to the Macedonian capital of Skopje in 2003, then held for five months of what he says was hellish treatment.

He was accused of being a terrorist, turned over to Americans and flown to a prison in Afghanistan. In the course of his detention, he claims he was shackled, beaten, sodomized, stripped naked, photographed nude and injected with drugs. After five months, Masri was released as suddenly as he'd been seized — dropped along a winding mountain road at the border between Albania and Macedonia, where he was handed a box containing his belongings, including his passport, which had been taken from him when he was captured.

German prosecutors have verified much of Masri's account. At least two official European bodies are investigating. German Chancellor Angela Merkel said last December that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had admitted the United States erred in Masri's case — his name apparently is similar to that of an al-Qaida suspect on terrorist watch lists. The U.S. government says Rice indicated that when mistakes are made, they are rectified.

Yet just last week, the CIA succeeded in squashing Masri's lawsuit against the U.S. government. He sought compensation and a public apology, trifling demands that surely could be met. And perhaps they would be met by an American government still inspired by the ideal of justice.

But this government said Masri's suit must be blocked because to acknowledge his situation — to confirm or deny it — would reveal a “state secret,” and so jeopardize national security. U.S. District Court Judge T.S. Ellis III agreed, although he made clear that accepting the “state secrets” argument in court wasn't a judgment on whether Masri's claims are true or false.

“Every single fact that is needed to prove liability is already in the public record,” says Ben Wizner, the American Civil Liberties Union attorney who represents Masri.

Several European governments and the United Nations, as well as unnamed American sources, have confirmed that the U.S. runs a secret program of “renditions” in which terrorism suspects are swept off the streets and spirited away to secret detention centers. Hundreds of media accounts around the world have detailed Masri's story — including one in The Washington Post that carried the headline, “Wrongful Imprisonment: Anatomy of a CIA Mistake.”

To whisper the word “secret” in connection with this case is to bend the language beyond absurdity. Stonewall is more accurate.

“The danger is that if secrecy can be invoked in this case, then the CIA has a blank check to shield even its most outrageous conduct from accountability,” Wizner says. “They say they're arguing secrecy, but what they're really arguing is immunity.”

The secrecy blanket that the Bush administration routinely throws over its questionable conduct also was used to cloak the case of Sibel Edmonds, a former FBI translator who was fired in 2002 after reporting security breaches and other misconduct. Unclassified briefings given to members of Congress about Edmonds' claims verified many of them — so then-Attorney General John Ashcroft classified the information retroactively. The Justice Department's inspector general also found that Edmonds' revelations of malfeasance were a factor in her dismissal. That report, too, was classified, though an unclassified version was released.

The Supreme Court ended the Edmonds case by refusing to hear it. Planned appeals of Masri's lawsuit would seem to be similarly doomed. The courts seem unperturbed by the government's addiction to the state secrets' strategy; its use has climbed dramatically since the Cold War wound down and the war on terror heated up.

Some discomfort, at least, seemed to unsettle Ellis. Even though Masri's claims couldn't be brought in court, the judge wrote that if they are “essentially true,” then “all fair-minded people … must also agree that Masri has suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake, and deserves a remedy.”

But his only hope, Ellis wrote, lies with the executive branch (which carried out the misbegotten seizure) or the legislative branch (where political complicity has sanctioned executive misconduct).

Masri, then, has no recourse. Yet the more the United States heaps injustice upon the innocent, the more we stoke grievances. And the longer we will go without something resembling peace.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says U.S. Must Honor War Dead (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 29, 2006

President Bush, delivering a Memorial Day message surrounded by the graves of thousands of military dead, said Monday that the United States must continue fighting the war on terror in the name of those have already given their life in the cause.

"The best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," Bush said, quoting from a letter that Lt. Mark Dooley wrote to his parents before being killed last September in the Iraqi city of Ramadi.

Noting that some 270 fighting men and women of the nearly 2,500 who have fallen since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, are buried at Arlington National Cemetery, Bush said, "We have seen the costs in the war on terror that we fight today."

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," the president declared, drawing a long standing ovation from the troops, families of the fallen and others gathered at the cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater.

"Here in the presence of veterans they fought with and loved ones whose pictures they carried, the fallen give silent witness to the price of liberty and our nation honors them this day and every day," he said.

The nation can best honor the dead by "defeating the terrorists. ... and by laying the foundation for a generation of peace," Bush said.

The president spoke after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. He ventured across the Potomac River on a sun-splashed Memorial Day just a short time after signing into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals.

At the White House, Bush signed the Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act," passed by Congress largely in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths symbolized God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals.

The new law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. This restriction applies an hour before until an hour after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Monday's observance at Arlington National Cemetery was not a funeral, so demonstrators were free to speak their minds at the site. Bush's motorcade passed several on the way in, including a small group that held signs saying, "Thank God for dead soldiers" and "God hates fags."

Approximately 10 people from the Washington, D.C., chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a self-styled grass roots conservative group, stood across the road with signs supporting U.S. troops. A large sign held by several people said, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

The FreeRepublic.com group was trying to counter demonstrations by the Kansas-based group, led by the Rev. Fred Phelps. He previously had organized protests against those who died of AIDS and gay murder victim Matthew Shepard.

In an interview when the House passed the bill that Bush signed Monday, Phelps accused Congress of "blatantly violating" his First Amendment rights. He said that if it became law, he would continue to demonstrate but would abide by the law's restrictions.

Bush signed a second bill Monday that allows combat troops to deposit tax-free pay into individual retirement accounts. Supporters of the legislation argued that rules governing these accounts were punishing soldiers in Afghanistan and Iraq who earn only tax-free combat pay.

Bush Invokes The Fallen, Past And Present (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va., May 29 — President Bush paid homage to fallen members of the nation's military on Monday, using his annual Memorial Day speech at Arlington National Cemetery to draw a link between those who fought in an earlier era and those killed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," Mr. Bush said, a remark that brought more applause than any other in his eight-minute speech. "Our nation is free because of brave Americans like these, who volunteer to confront our adversaries abroad so we do not have to face them here at home."

Mr. Bush spoke at the cemetery's marble-columned amphitheater after placing a floral wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns, on a hillside overlooking the Potomac. The president vowed to honor those who had died in Iraq and Afghanistan "by completing the mission for which they gave their lives: by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans."

Seeking to draw a connection to wars past, the president quoted from two similar letters written more than half a century apart, the first by Second Lt. Jack Lundberg, who died two weeks after D-Day, the other by First Lt. Mark Dooley, killed by a bomb last September in Ramadi, Iraq. Lieutenant Lundberg wrote his parents to say, "The United States of America is worth the sacrifice."

"That same feeling," Mr. Bush said, "moves those who are now fighting the war on terror."

Though polls suggest the public is uneasy about the war in Iraq, none of that unease was evident in Arlington on Monday. More than 4,500 people gathered in sweltering sun to catch a glimpse of the president, who was introduced by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld as "an historic leader, a selfless leader."

The crowd, waving tiny American flags, was both enthusiastic and somber: aging veterans in Pearl Harbor Survivor caps, grieving mothers with their children's dog tags dangling from their necks, little boys and girls in red T-shirts, a sign of membership in the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors, a group helping youngsters whose parents have died in military service. Afterward, they wandered the grassy knolls and the rows of white headstones.

The president began his day at the White House, where he signed bills to prohibit certain demonstrations at military cemeteries and to help military personnel in combat zones save for their retirement. He was joined at the cemetery by members of his administration and prominent lawmakers, including Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader. Former Senator Bob Dole of Kansas, badly wounded in World War II, was also there.

Of more than 300,000 people buried at Arlington, more than 270 have been killed since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and Mr. Bush singled them out for particular praise. Nearly 2,500 Americans have died in Iraq, according to Pentagon statistics, and more than 18,000 have been wounded there since the invasion in March 2003.

"In this place where valor sleeps, we are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly: because we know the costs of war," Mr. Bush said. "We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

Later, more than 600 members of the military who had served in Iraq or Afghanistan marched in a Memorial Day parade down Constitution Avenue in Washington. This was the first time that personnel returning from either of those two zones had participated in the event, which also featured veterans of other wars, high school bands, representatives of American Legion posts and banners promoting corporate sponsors.

Richard Rodriquez, a 23-year-old Navy petty officer from Union City, N.J., was one of the sailors selected by his commanders to take part. With the Army stretched thin, some of its ranks have been filled out by the Navy, and Petty Officer Rodriquez, who had been serving on a destroyer, left it to be a machine-gunner guarding Army convoys in Iraq.

He said Monday that he had decided to go out of a sense of solidarity with the troops there. "I lost a lot of friends," he said. "I know I could have helped somebody come home."

Bush Gets More Bad News From Iraq (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 29, 2006

Just when President Bush was trying to accentuate the positive in Iraq and declare a new beginning in the war on terror, a rash of bad news comes from multiple fronts in the global struggle.

New details are emerging in the killings of two dozen Iraqi civilians at the hands of Marines. Anti-American protesters are staging riots in Afghanistan after a U.S. military convoy rammed into several civilian cars. And a reported 75 military detainees at Guantanamo Bay are on a hunger strike to protest their continued imprisonment without charges.

Add the trouble to the continuing daily violence in Iraq — at least 40 were killed in a series of bombings Monday, including two from a CBS News crew — and Bush could be in danger of losing even more support for his mission.

Bush has tried to keep the nation behind him with repeated talk about the importance of defeating the terrorists abroad so they cannot attack the United States again. He has expressed confidence that the U.S. will prevail and spread democracy. And he has acknowledged costly mistakes along the way.

In the past week, Bush has spoken about a new chapter in the nation's relationship with Iraq since a new government has taken control. But that hasn't kept the violence and unrest out of the headlines every day, and some in the White House have been arguing that he needs to do more to push back. His public relations blitzes on the war have helped build support in the past, according to public opinion polls taken before and after his campaigns.

At a press conference last week, Bush said the war has featured personal mistakes — specifically his "tough talk" about capturing Osama bin Laden "dead or alive" and challenging U.S. foes to "bring it on." And he said the worst mistake the country has made in Iraq was the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," Bush said.

He has not yet commented publicly on an incident in Iraq that Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record), a decorated Marine war veteran and prominent critic of Iraq policy, has contended could undermine U.S. efforts there even more than Abu Ghraib did.

Murtha, D-Pa., has spoken critically about reports that Marines killed two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, last November in Haditha, a city western Iraq that has been plagued by insurgents. The congressman also believes that the deaths were initially covered up by the military.

The killings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into homes and shot other people, according to Murtha, who has been briefed by officials.

The Pentagon is investigating the deaths in Haditha, along with the events in Afghanistan that sparked rioting there Monday.

Witnesses said the incident began when a convoy of at least three U.S. Humvees came into the city from the outskirts, then rammed into a rush-hour traffic jam, hitting several civilian cars. There were disputes about the number of deaths, but at least one person died.

The crash sparked a riot by dozens of stone-throwing Afghans who shouted "Down with America." Witnesses said U.S. forces then fired on the crowd, and the violence escalated.

Hundreds of Afghan army troops and NATO peacekeepers in tanks were deployed around the city, as chanting protesters marched on the presidential palace and rioters smashed police guard boxes, set fire to police cars and ransacked buildings.

The military also is dealing with defiant prisoners at Guantanamo Bay who are trying to draw attention to the fact that some have been held for up to 4 1/2 years without charges and with little contact with the outside world.

The U.S. military holds about 460 men at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. Human rights groups say many innocent people have been swept up in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and sent to the prison at the Cuban base in Guantanamo Bay, with no end in sight to their incarceration. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

Their military trials, the first held by the United States since the World War II era, are set to begin within months. The Supreme Court, however, is expected to rule in June on whether Bush overstepped his authority by ordering war-crimes trials for some of those held at Guantanamo Bay.

Bush, Rumsfeld Honor Dead At Arlington Cemetery (WP)

By William Wan

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

With their hands over their hearts, in salute and waving flags, thousands gathered at Arlington National Cemetery yesterday to remember those who had died for their country.

Under a sweltering sun, they watched as prayers were said, speeches were given and a wreath was laid at the Tomb of the Unknowns. For some, it was a well-timed tourist destination; for others, an annual pilgrimage through the rows of alabaster-white markers toward the cemetery's amphitheater.

There, shortly before noon, President Bush and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld spoke to the standing-room-only crowd. Rumsfeld urged audience members to renew their resolve against U.S. enemies and to count the country's many soldiers as blessings.

Following him, Bush said: "We are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly, because we know the costs of war. We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

Standing in the shade outside the amphitheater, Diane Cameron, 59, said it was her 15th year to make the journey from Texas. She has sat through similar speeches by Ronald Reagan, Bush's father and Bill Clinton.

"You don't come here for the politicians," she explained. "The politicians are the ones who get us into war. Our military gets us out."

After the ceremony, she planned to visit the grave of her brother, a Navy pilot whose jet had been shot down over Vietnam in the 1960s.

"This is the right way to celebrate Memorial Day," she said. "It's something I can only do here in Arlington."

A few paces away, Air Force Maj. Robert Grazulis, dressed in civilian shorts, took in the spectacle with his 6-year-old son, John, at his side. It was John's first visit to Arlington, and Grazulis, who works at the Pentagon, said he had brought him hoping to teach him about the duty and sacrifice required in a soldier's life.

"He's still young, so I don't know if he completely understands it all: life and death, honor and duty," Grazulis said. "He knows the white stones are for soldiers who aren't alive anymore."

They would take pictures, he said, so that on future Memorial Days they could look back and remember.

Bush Vows To Win War For Fallen (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

President Bush stood among the graves of nearly 300,000 veterans at Arlington National Cemetery yesterday and said that the United States must continue fighting the war on terror in the name of those who have already given their lives in the cause.

"The best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," the president said in a Memorial Day speech, quoting from a letter that Army 1st Lt. Mark Dooley wrote to his parents shortly before he was killed in September in the Iraqi city of Ramadi.

Mr. Bush noted that some 270 of the nearly 2,500 service members who have fallen since the September 11 terror attacks are buried at the nation's most famous military cemetery, which he called several times a "place where valor sleeps."

"On this Memorial Day, we look out on quiet hills and rows of white headstones -- and we know that we are in the presence of greatness. Here, in the presence of veterans they fought with and loved ones whose pictures they carried, the fallen give silent witness to the price of our liberty -- and our nation honors them, this day and every day," Mr. Bush said.

While he said that America has "always gone to war reluctantly," he added that the costs of the war against terror begun after the September 11, 2001, attacks are clear today.

"Our nation is free because of brave Americans like these, who volunteer to confront our adversaries abroad so we do not have to face them here at home. Our nation mourns the loss of our men and women in uniform; we will honor them by completing the mission for which they gave their lives -- by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans," he said to applause from troops, families of the fallen and others gathered at the cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater.

The president also referred to soldiers from wars past and those still missing from the Vietnam War. "With us here are veterans who fought alongside them -- and who have come today to pay their respects. They are joined by veterans of World War II, Korea, Vietnam and other conflicts across the globe, whose friends and comrades also lie in this sacred ground. As we pray for their fallen friends, we also remember those who went to war and are still missing, and we are determined to account for them all," he said.

Mr. Bush remembered 2nd Lt. Jack Lundberg, killed two weeks after D-Day in World War II. "He wrote his Mom and Dad a letter to be opened in the event he did not come home. He wrote, 'I am sorry to add to your grief ... but we of the United States have something to fight for -- never more fully have I realized that. The United States of America is worth the sacrifice.' "

The president spoke after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. In his speech, he said: "The names of those buried there are known only to God, yet their souls have entered into the spirit of America, and they will never be forgotten by our nation."

Mr. Bush visited the cemetery shortly after signing into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals.

At the White House, Mr. Bush signed the "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act," passed by Congress largely in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths symbolized God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals.

The new law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. This restriction applies an hour before a funeral until an hour afterward. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Yesterday's observance at Arlington National Cemetery was not a funeral, so protesters were free to demonstrate. Mr. Bush's motorcade passed several on the way in, including a small group that held signs saying, "Thank God for dead soldiers."

About a dozen people from the Washington chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a grass-roots conservative group, stood across the road with signs supporting U.S. troops. A large sign held by several people said, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

Some 296,000 military members are buried at Arlington, most from the two World Wars and the Vietnam and Korean wars.

Tribute Paid To Fallen Soldiers In USA And Abroad (USAT)

ARLINGTON, Va. — President Bush honored Americans killed in action Monday by vowing to complete "the mission for which they gave their lives — by defeating the terrorists."

Marking Memorial Day at Arlington National Cemetery for the fifth time during his presidency, Bush noted that 270 of the 296,000 men and women buried there died in the "war on terror" that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

He singled out two of them: 1st Lt. Mark Dooley, killed in Iraq in September, who wrote his parents that "the best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," and Lt. Col. Joseph Fenty Jr., killed in Afghanistan this month, one of whose comrades said they "were all in awe of him."

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," Bush said, to sustained applause.

"We will honor them by completing the mission for which they gave their lives — by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty, and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans," he said.

Across the country and overseas, Americans honored their war dead in a variety of ways:

•In New York City, the chairman of the city's top military museum apologized to the nation's servicemembers and veterans for what he said was the lost meaning of the once-solemn holiday.

"We Americans have become less concerned about those who died for us than we are about the menu being planned for the family picnic," Arnold Fisher said on the flight deck of the USS Intrepid Sea, Air & Space Museum. "I apologize to you for carrying the burden of this nation's commitment to freedom and liberty alone."

•In Topeka, Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said her generation learned a lesson from the Vietnam War: Even if Americans question or oppose a war, they must stand behind the troops who fight it. "The most important lesson from the era I grew up in is to remember that, as we debate the causes and outcomes of armed conflicts, we must remain united in our resolve to support and honor our troops and their families," Sebelius said.

•In Europe, members of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee laid wreaths near the graves of thousands of servicemembers killed in World War I and World War II, including many who died storming the beaches of Normandy on D-Day in June 1944. Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, the panel's chairman, said the delegation was the first to survey the condition of American cemeteries in France, Belgium, the Netherlands and North Africa.

Bush spoke at the Arlington cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater, its first rows filled with family members of servicemembers killed in Iraq. Before his eight-minute speech, the president laid a wreath of red and white carnations and blue irises at the Tomb of the Unknowns.

Earlier, he signed into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals. It was passed by Congress in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths are evidence of God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuality.

The law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. Violators face up to a $100,000 fine and a year in prison.

Monday's observance was not a funeral, so demonstrators were free to speak their minds. Several did, including a handful from Westboro Baptist Church of Topeka, the target of the new law. They sang, "God hates America" to the tune of God Bless America and held signs reading "You're going to hell" and "Bush killed them."

About 10 people from the Washington, D.C., chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a grass-roots conservative group, responded with their own signs at the cemetery entrance supporting U.S. troops. One sign read, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

Bush Aligns Nation's Past And Present Wars (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Invoking the memory of more than 270 service members buried at Arlington National Cemetery who have died in combat since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, President Bush vowed Monday to honor them by "completing the mission for which they gave their lives."

DOJ_NMG_0030114

Speaking at Arlington after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns as part of annual Memorial Day remembrances, Bush drew parallels between the forces felled in Iraq and Afghanistan and their predecessors who were killed in Korea, Vietnam and the two world wars, saying they all died fighting enemies abroad so the United States would not have to face them at home.

"In this place where valor sleeps, we are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly, because we know the costs of war," Bush said. "We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

Bush added that even as Americans mourned the deaths of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, the United States would continue the fight, saying the country could best honor those killed "by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty, and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans."

As of Monday, 2,466 U.S. soldiers have died in Iraq and 292 in Afghanistan, according to Defense Department figures.

Speaking on a hot, cloudless day, Bush was greeted warmly by friends and relatives of fallen soldiers and by the veterans in attendance. The loudest applause came when he told the story of Army Lt. Col. Joseph J. Fenty Jr., who was buried at Arlington last week after being killed in a helicopter crash in Afghanistan before ever meeting his newborn daughter.

One of Fenty's soldiers described his unit as being in awe of its leader, said Bush, adding he shared that feeling. "I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," the president said to loud cheers.

Bush's remarks came on the same day that car bombs in Iraq killed at least 33 people, including one American soldier and two CBS journalists embedded with the U.S. military. The president's comments were preceded by short addresses from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, both of whom thanked the soldiers who had died and offered strong endorsements of Bush's stewardship.

Pace said Bush and Rumsfeld were providing soldiers "the very finest" leadership, and Rumsfeld called Bush "a historic leader, a selfless leader."

Rumsfeld also indirectly addressed public criticism of the war in Iraq, arguing that although naysayers had existed during most American wars, the U.S. military had always done its duty professionally and with honor.

"In whatever era they lived, it was said by some that America was a fading nation; in whatever era they fought, it was said by some that their fighting was not worth the cost," Rumsfeld said of the generations of soldiers buried at Arlington. "Yet every time, in every era, these citizen-soldiers answered those who doubted our country's cause with grit and gallantry."

The strong backing of Bush comes as his handling of the war in Iraq has increasingly been questioned by the American public. In an ABC News/Washington Post poll released this month, 66% of those surveyed said they disapproved of his handling of the war, the highest percentage to date.

Bush also used Memorial Day to sign two pieces of legislation aimed at helping military personnel and their families. One bill revises the Internal Revenue Service code to allow service members to deposit tax-free combat pay into individual retirement accounts, and the other bans some demonstrations at government-run cemeteries.

The ban was passed by Congress last week in response to a Topeka, Kan., church group that has been demonstrating near funerals of soldiers killed in Iraq, holding placards claiming that God was punishing the U.S. for its tolerance of homosexuals. Ban violators face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Memorial Day Demonstrators Face Off (AP)

AP, May 29, 2006

As throngs came to the hallowed grounds of Arlington National Cemetery to honor the fallen on Memorial Day, a handful of protesters from an anti-gay group stood across a four-lane highway from a conservative group supporting the troops.

The two groups, separated by a line of police cars, were faced off about 300 feet from the entrance to the cemetery. They held signs making competing arguments. But because of noise from approaching motorcycles and cars, they could not hear one another.

A small group of members of the Westboro Baptist Church of Topeka, Kan., who have been demonstrating around the country at military funerals, sang "God hates America" to the tune of "God Bless America" and held signs that read "God is America's terror", "Thank God for dead soldiers", "You're going to hell", and "Bush killed them."

DOJ_NMG_0030115

Across the street, a handful of people from the conservative group known as FreeRepublic.com held a large sign saying, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes." Other signs said, "God does love our defenders of freedom" and "This Memorial Day, thank a soldier for your freedom."

As people walked to the cemetery past the Westboro church group, many looked at them and scowled and several shouted insults.

A Marine lance corporal in uniform, passing by on the sidewalk, suddenly lunged toward one of the church protesters. A policeman put his arm around the Marine and led him away before there was any physical contact.

"Shut your mouth," one woman yelled at them, and a man passing by said, "Read your Bible." A spokesman for FreeRepublic.com, Kristinn Taylor, said his group showed up to demonstrate because they knew the church group was coming. He said they have staged counter demonstrations on several occasions when Westboro protesters disrupted military funerals.

"They're out of line," Taylor said. "Their hateful message isn't welcome here. Many of us have loved ones buried here."

"We wanted to send a positive message of support for troops serving now and their families and those who made the ultimate sacrifice," he said.

Margie Phelps, spokeswoman for the Westboro church group, said the group was protesting because "Congress doesn't have the power and can't pass enough laws to stop the wrath of God" against homosexuals.

"America is doomed because she has institutionalized sin and exalted homosexuality," she said.

Many people in cars and on motorcycles honked and gave friendly waves to the FreeRepublic group as they drove by.

A passerby got close to one of the protesters and yelled, "Thank God for America." A policeman stepped between them and the incident ended.

NSA Cases May Hinge On Issue Of Standing (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, May 30, 2006

Carolyn Jewel says the federal government's warrantless wiretapping program is giving her writer's block.

"I have recently begun to write in a new genre (action and futuristic romance)," the Petaluma, Calif., database-administrator-cum-novelist -- and named plaintiff in a class action against AT&T for cooperating with secret government eavesdropping -- wrote in court papers earlier this year.

"I feel that certain plots or subplots that would otherwise be of significant interest to me may be unwise since they would require research into weapons, arms and military and paramilitary operations. As a result, I do not plan to use my Worldnet service to do this research," continued Jewel, the only AT&T named plaintiff to specifically state how she was affected by the wiretaps.

"I suppose that's a claim," said Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law. "It's not as strong as saying they were definitely wiretapped."

A lawyer for the plaintiffs said Jewel and other AT&T customers suffered real harm.

"She actually chose not to pursue certain areas of writing," said Lee Tien, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

Lawyers for AT&T and the government are trying to convince U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker that chilling effects on customers -- such as Jewel's reticence to research upcoming books (one of which, "Rake," promises: "Romantic sensualist meets widowed novelist. Hot. Hot. Hot. Proposal is done and with my agent," according to her Web site, carolynjewel.com) -- don't amount to enough harm to give them standing.

While Walker mulls over the standing question, a similar case in Oregon federal court probably won't have that problem.

The suit, which has received less recent publicity than the AT&T class action, has a more direct complaint -- and fewer standing issues.

In late February, the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation says it was directly harmed through illegal wiretaps -- and it has proof, according to court filings.

DOJ_NMG_0030116

"This case is unique among the various pending lawsuits challenging the president's warrantless electronic surveillance program in that only these plaintiffs possess incontrovertible proof -- the document filed under seal -- that they were victims of the president's program, and thus have standing to sue," wrote Thomas Nelson, a lawyer for Al-Haramain, in papers filed Monday.

Jon Eisenberg, an Oakland, Calif., lawyer and Nelson's co-counsel, said he was "immediately excited to see this case because there's standing." Eisenberg said he expects core issues in the case to be litigated faster than in the AT&T suit.

"They have a standing issue to overcome that we don't have," he said. "They're seeking to say the administration violated the law without having a specific instance of violation, which spills over into policy. That's problematic."

Tien said he expects Walker to rule that the class plaintiff have standing nonetheless. But in the meantime, he and the Oregon lawyers are facing a similar set of problems posed by government lawyers.

In both cases, the government has insisted that documents at the core of the case, as well as government pleadings, should remain confidential. Anthony Coppolino, the lead Department of Justice attorney in both cases, could not be reached by press time.

In the AT&T suit, the key evidence is documents provided by a former AT&T engineer that, plaintiffs lawyers say, show communications were routed through government computers. The documents are filed under seal, and Walker has agreed to keep them in a secure case as the litigation continues.

The most important piece of evidence in the Oregon suit is a secret document accidentally disclosed by the FBI in 2004 through discovery in another lawsuit. It's currently being held in a secure location in Seattle, despite efforts by the federal government to take it back.

The judges in both suits are now trying to decide whether that information should remain secret -- and whether to consider government motions kept concealed from plaintiffs lawyers. The secret papers, government lawyers said, argue that the suits should be thrown out because they jeopardize state secrets.

In a hearing in the AT&T suit last week, Walker seemed disturbed by the notion that plaintiffs would be unable to see their opponents' arguments, and asked for briefing on the issue. Similar briefs have been submitted in the Oregon case, too.

In both suits, defense lawyers say the Justice Department has a longstanding right to submit ex parte, in camera documents in sensitive cases.

"Contrary to plaintiffs' arguments, AT&T does not believe that an assertion of state secrets may blithely be dismissed without even considering the basis for it," wrote lawyers for AT&T.

Such arguments don't sit well for the plaintiffs in either case. As lawyers for the Oregon plaintiffs wrote, "Secret court filings are repugnant to a free society."

As the issues continue to be litigated, the judges in both suits will have to decide whether to open the heretofore secret documents, whether plaintiffs have standing, and if the suits would indeed unearth secrets vital to national security.

In the AT&T case, plaintiffs are hoping that Walker's decision on these issues will ultimately lead him to consider their motion for an injunction that would keep the government out of AT&T's network.

Until that decision is made this summer, Jewel -- judging by her Web site -- seems to have plenty to work on that won't bring government suspicion upon her.

One title in development is called "The Barbarian."

In that book, her Web site says, "a Highlander ends up married to the daughter of an English lord. He speaks only Gaelic and she doesn't. She thinks he's the muscle, not the bridegroom." That book, she wrote, will only require her to study Gaelic.

75 Now On Hunger Strike At Guantanamo (AP)

By Ben Fox

AP, May 29, 2006

The number of Guantanamo Bay detainees participating in a hunger strike has ballooned from three to around 75, the U.S. military said Monday, revealing growing defiance among prisoners held for up to 4 1/2 years with no end in sight.

DOJ_NMG_0030117

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand called the hunger strike at the U.S. naval base in southeastern Cuba an "attention-getting" tactic to step up pressure for the inmates' release and said it might be related to a May 18 clash between detainees and guards that injured six prisoners.

"The hunger strike technique is consistent with al-Qaida practice and reflects detainee attempts to elicit media attention to bring international pressure on the United States to release them back to the battlefield," Durand said from Guantanamo Bay.

The United States now holds about 460 people at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. But human rights groups say innocent people have been sent to the jail.

Defense lawyers said the hunger strike, which began last year, reflects increasing frustration among men who have little contact with the world outside the remote prison.

"I think it is escalating because the people down there are getting more and more desperate," said Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees. "Obviously, things have reached a crisis point."

The military did not release the names of the striking detainees, and lawyers said they have no way of learning whether their clients are involved until they can visit the base.

"All these men want is a chance to have a trial," said Zachary Katznelson, an attorney for Reprieve, a British human rights group that represents 36 Guantanamo detainees. "If they are guilty, punish them. If not, then send them home."

Only 10 of the prisoners have been charged and face trial before military tribunals. The U.S. Supreme Court is expected to rule in June whether President Bush overstepped his authority in ordering the tribunals.

Durand said the number of hunger strikers reached about 75 over the weekend. U.S. officials classify detainees as being on hunger strike when they have missed nine consecutive meals.

Some 76 detainees began the strike last August to protest their confinement, with their ranks peaking at 131 in the fall, the military has said.

Defense lawyers have accused the military of underreporting the number of hunger strikers.

The lawyers say the number of strikers dwindled to three earlier this year after the military adopted more aggressive measures to force feed them, including using a restraint chair. U.S. officials said the measures are "safe and humane" and have been used in American civilian prisons.

Four of the detainees on hunger strike are being force-fed, including the three who were participating in the protest before the recent increase, Durand said.

Military officials believe the increase in hunger strikers was timed to coincide with the arrival of journalists and lawyers for the next round of pretrial hearings for Guantanamo detainees in June, Durand said.

He added it also could be related to the clash earlier this month in which, according to the military, a detainee pretended to commit suicide to lure guards into a cellblock, where they were attacked by prisoners armed with makeshift weapons.

Earlier that day, two detainees overdosed on antidepressant drugs they collected from other detainees and hoarded in their cells. The men have since regained consciousness.

75 Prisoners Join In Hunger Strike At U.S. Base In Guantanamo Bay (WP)

By Jane Sutton

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

MIAMI, May 29 -- Seventy-five prisoners at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were on a hunger strike Monday, joining a few who have refused food and been force-fed since August, a military official said.

Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman for the Guantanamo Bay detention operation, called the hunger strike an attempt by the prisoners to gain media attention and pressure the United States to release about 460 men held there as enemy combatants.

Detainees are counted as hunger strikers if they miss nine consecutive meals, and most of the 75 hit that mark Sunday, Durand said. Most are refusing food but continuing to drink liquids, he said.

One of the recent group is being force-fed through a tube inserted through the nose and into the stomach, as are three others who have been on a hunger strike since Aug. 8, Durand said.

Hunger strikes have occurred periodically since the first suspected al-Qaeda and Taliban prisoners were taken to the U.S. base in southeast Cuba in 2002.

Durand said the current hunger strike may be timed to a series of hearings scheduled in June by the U.S. war crimes tribunals at Guantanamo Bay, which are formally called commissions.

"This new hunger strike is likely a coordinated, but short-term, effort designed to coincide with the military commissions hearings scheduled for the next several weeks, as defense attorneys and media normally travel to Guantanamo to observe this process," Durand said by e-mail.

He said it may also be related to an outbreak of violence on May 18, when two detainees tried to commit suicide by overdosing on hoarded medicine. Several others attacked guards who rushed into a communal barracks to stop an attempted hanging that was later determined to be a ruse.

The two who overdosed are expected to recover fully, and they remain under observation at a hospital inside the detention camp, Durand said.

"They are alert, talking, walking and recovering," he said.

Human rights groups have long criticized the indefinite detention of foreign captives at Guantanamo Bay. President Bush said recently he would like to close the base, but administration officials said many of those held there are dangerous men who should remain locked up somewhere, if not at Guantanamo Bay.

Military officials said 287 Guantanamo Bay prisoners have been freed or transferred to other governments, and negotiations are ongoing to return more than 100 others to their homelands for continued detention.

Excluding Friends (WP)

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

THE SENATE HAD an opportunity last week to fix the horrendous mess Congress has inadvertently made out of the law governing the admission of refugees to the United States. In an overwhelming, bipartisan vote, it passed it up -- much to its shame. The body voted 79 to 19 to reject an amendment put forth by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) that would have restored discretion to the government to admit human rights victims bizarrely branded under current law as terrorists or supporters of terrorism.

The vote followed gross misrepresentations of the proposal by Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). Indeed, given their descriptions, it's a wonder even 19 senators voted for it. Mr. Kyl portrayed it as permitting the admission of Taliban fighters; Mr. Specter warned of members of Hamas and other terrorists showing up on American shores.

The proposal would have done nothing of the kind. The government has wide latitude to exclude people who pose a national security threat. The problem with the existing laws are that they define a terrorist group so broadly as to include virtually any organization that has ever used weapons. And they not only permit but also require the exclusion of all members and material supporters of such groups -- with no exceptions for people who acted under the threat of violence. So a Liberian woman used as a sex slave in her own house or a Northern Alliance soldier who fought alongside American troops in Afghanistan would both be excluded -- the former for providing shelter to terrorists, the latter for membership in a "terrorist" group. Tens of thousands of refugees around the world are held up because of these strictures, many of them for affiliations with armed groups this country has actively supported and certainly never regarded as terrorists.

The Leahy proposal would have clarified that the bar applies only to groups the government has designated foreign terrorist organizations, and it would have created an exception for people who were forced to provide support to such organizations. Its rejection puts a huge burden on the administration -- which also shamefully opposed Mr. Leahy's amendment -- to exercise its very limited discretion under existing law aggressively. Current law allows the government to waive the ban for supporters, though not members, of terrorist groups. Following a lengthy intra-governmental skirmish, the administration has finally begun using this power -- permitting one large group of ethnic Karen victims of Burmese oppression to move forward in the process. But it won't be enough. The Senate needs to revisit this.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

For Some Katrina Evacuees, Another Displacement Looms (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

AUSTIN -- In the nine months since their New Orleans home was flooded with nine feet of water, Dianne Jeanpierre has worked hard to put her life and her daughters' lives back in order.

Their orderly apartment here is filled with gently worn donated furniture. The new routine for this Catholic family includes weekly inspirational services at a Baptist church.

Ashley, 17, attended her junior prom through the generosity of a department-store dress giveaway to children affected by Hurricane Katrina. Brittany, 14, had been enrolled in a high school for academically gifted students in New Orleans when the hurricane hit Aug. 29; she stayed focused and last week finished the school year with two citations for scholarship.

But the family's fragile stability is threatened. Jeanpierre has run out of unemployment insurance benefits from her former job as a security guard in New Orleans and cannot work because of debilitating asthma. Earlier this month, she got a notice that she would lose her housing benefits from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Soon thereafter, her car was repossessed.

"I tried to make a home," said Jeanpierre, 46. "Now they're trying to eat you up, I tell you. Everything is just going downhill."

Jeanpierre's family is among about 55,000 nationwide facing the end of a FEMA-funded rental assistance program, in which local governments issued 12-month housing and utility vouchers.

Last month, FEMA began issuing letters to thousands of evacuees telling them their aid would be terminated. The vouchers are to end Wednesday in most of the country and on June 30 in 11 Texas jurisdictions, including Austin, Dallas and Houston.

That decision, says a class-action lawsuit filed by the Houston law firm of Caddell & Chapman and a consortium of public interest law groups, will create "widespread homelessness" and violates FEMA's statutory obligations to provide temporary housing assistance to hurricane victims.

FEMA's decisions on which evacuees to move into a housing assistance program with more rigorous requirements are "arbitrary, inconsistent and inequitable," the lawsuit contends. "As a result, FEMA is creating an opportunity to discontinue its housing assistance for tens of thousands of people."

Sixty-two members of the House filed a brief last week supporting the suit. It says that FEMA "continues to engage in a process that is marked by inefficiency, a lack of discernable standards and seeming disregard for the plight of the vulnerable survivors who are depending on the aid that FEMA is statutorily obligated to provide."

U.S. District Judge David Hittner is expected to rule Tuesday on a request to stop FEMA temporarily from shutting down the housing assistance program and to hold a trial on the lawsuit's merits.

"This process is broken, and FEMA is not following its mandates," said John B. Scofield Jr. of Caddell & Chapman. "Some people have extensions [to June 30], but still there are multiple thousands that are being left in the dust."

Aaron Walker, a FEMA spokesman in Washington, declined to comment on the lawsuit, citing agency policy regarding pending litigation. But, Walker said, reviews of evacuees' cases -- appeals and application updates -- are being conducted continually.

"There's a number of reasons, reasonable and logical reasons, people are found ineligible" for continued housing assistance, Walker said. "We genuinely aren't in an effort to have people without housing."

FEMA officials say that about 50,000 households are in the housing assistance program and that 12,000 have been informed they are ineligible for continued aid. The lawsuit contends that about 55,000 households are in the program nationwide and that "at least 17,000 households or at least 50,000 people of all ages have been deemed ineligible for further housing assistance and/or have not received a final determination of eligibility."

Of the households deemed ineligible, 7,600 are in Houston, where the majority of displaced Katrina evacuees live, and 2,100 are in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the suit says.

Many rulings of ineligibility were wrong, according to the lawsuit and officials working with evacuees. Some evacuees were told that their homes in New Orleans were not damaged enough to qualify them for continued assistance or that their old houses or apartments are habitable. Some were told that their paperwork was incomplete or that they did not meet certain requirements. Others were given no reason.

Those determinations, said LaTosha Brown, executive director of the Saving Our Selves Coalition in Atlanta, has displaced Louisianans panicked and landlords -- who were told by FEMA that it will no longer honor the housing vouchers -- sending eviction notices for next month.

"Instead of the government helping, it exacerbates the problem," said Brown, co-founder of the coalition, which is working with Katrina evacuees throughout the Gulf Coast and in Georgia. "There's an insensitivity to where people are emotionally. This is not business as usual. People are still damaged from the debacle."

Jeanpierre found out she was ineligible for continued rental assistance after her landlord received a notice from FEMA that it would stop paying her rent and utilities on Wednesday (an extension to June 30 was granted last week). The insurance settlement she received for her destroyed home in the Gentilly neighborhood went to the bank to pay off the mortgage.

She has applied for federal disability benefits through the Social Security Administration because of her health, but the case is pending. An urgent request to FEMA by a lawyer representing her asked the agency not to terminate her housing assistance until her case is settled. The request has not been answered.

"I'm just going to stay here until they send the police to put us out," Jeanpierre said. "There's nowhere for me to go."

After Katrina, New Fear Along Coast (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

VIOLET, La. -- When the floodwaters of Katrina reached the second floor of his home, Jesse Reed decided it was time to flee. He grabbed a shotgun, climbed onto the roof from a second-floor dormer window and jumped into his bass boat, which he kept nearby just for that purpose.

The 51-year-old, an outdoorsman and a plumber by trade, was proud of having ridden out previous storms with a certain woodsy elan.

Now, he says, "I wouldn't stay here for a goddarn hard rain."

All along the coast of the southeastern United States, even in those places untouched by its rage, Hurricane Katrina has obliterated long-held certitudes. Last year's destructive storm eroded the almost innate self-confidence of residents who once viewed hurricanes as tempests that could be weathered, not unimaginable catastrophes.

On the verge of what forecasters say will be a "very active" hurricane season, the result is a hovering fear. The wariness is a key but often unspoken cause for the slow recovery in towns wrecked last year -- residents are too afraid to return -- and a source of widespread anxiety everywhere else along the southeast coast.

Tony Fernandez, a sheriff's office official for St. Bernard Parish here, said that throughout the community there is a new reverence for "nature's strength and fury."

"Before we were all like doubting Thomases -- we had to see it," he said, shrugging. "Now we saw it."

The new faith is pervasive. Since Katrina, emergency managers from Houston to Biloxi, Miss., to Charleston, S.C., have chucked or revised evacuation plans that were long thought to have been adequate.

Dillard University in New Orleans has moved the start of classes from mid-August to late September to miss most of hurricane season. Some Florida residents have banded together to buy enormous generators capable of running entire households.

And civil engineers from around the country are similarly gripped by a new sense of the perils. They have reported widespread and long-standing flaws in the New Orleans levees, called for investigations into every levee in the United States and identified flaws in the dike that keeps Lake Okeechobee from overflowing South Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0030121

"Katrina was a defining experience for many people, and that's no less true for engineers," said Steven G. Vick, a Colorado engineer and one of the investigators who reported that the Lake Okeechobee dike is unsafe. The news spurred state leaders this month to create an evacuation plan for thousands of nearby residents who had long thought there was nothing to fear.

"You just don't do engineering in the same way after you've seen New Orleans. You don't take it as an abstraction, lines on a map," he said. "You recognize that you're dealing with people's lives."

While federal, state and local leaders have assured an anxious coastal public that every possible measure is being taken to avoid the calamitous evacuations and bungled responses during the last season, there are clearly unbridgeable gaps in the preparations.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff expressed concern last week that the "greatest vulnerability" remains in areas that were hardest hit last year because the ubiquitous trailers that house storm victims cannot withstand high winds and because work on the protective levees has not been completed.

In Louisiana, about 200,000 people are living in 100,000 trailers, and a scattering of them dots this flood-wrecked town.

After Katrina passed by, Violet was inundated in a matter of minutes by water flowing over what was left of the levees protecting it from the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet. The surrounding area of St. Bernard Parish took some of Katrina's worst punishment.

Nearly every one of the 27,000 homes in the parish was severely flooded, and residents have taken to a rueful joke: One guy says, "How'd you do in the flood?" And the other guy says, "Not bad, just four feet -- on the second floor."

Of the several thousand people who did not evacuate, many languished for days without adequate food, water and medical supplies, and today, debris and wrecked houses still line roadways. Many stoplights don't work, and most businesses remain closed.

"We're living in a monument to why you need to get out when a hurricane is coming," Fernandez said.

On Friday, at Our Lady of Prompt Succor here -- the only Catholic church of eight in the area to have reopened -- parishioners will fast and pray for safety during the hurricane season, responding to a statewide call by the bishops of Louisiana. Churches elsewhere in Louisiana and in Florida have held services to ask for God's mercy this season.

"There's a tremendous anxiety here," said the Rev. William Maestri, spokesman for the Archdiocese of New Orleans. "We have to avoid despair, and we have to avoid the presumption that God will handle everything. We have to offer hope."

The specter of Katrina, combined with the warnings from the National Hurricane Center last week predicting eight to 10 hurricanes this season, has created an atmosphere of suspense and vulnerability.

St. Bernard Parish leaders announced last week that in the event of a hurricane, they will call for evacuations 24 hours earlier and store emergency supplies on higher ground, and that they had decided it is too dangerous to open any local shelters.

Because so many now say they will obey evacuation orders, the fear is not for lives but for the community itself. Many people are not returning. Fewer than 1 in 10 houses in Reed's neighborhood have trailers out in front; the others are unoccupied.

Despite assurances by the Army Corps of Engineers, many here believe the levees are inadequate.

Last week, Corps contractors were repairing the levees damaged by Katrina, piling them up to 20 feet with dirt floated in on barges, but officials acknowledged that even once that job is complete, another storm like Katrina could inundate the area again. More funding for the levees is pending before Congress.

Among those distrustful of the levees -- and not returning -- is Warren Duvieilh, 47, an electrician. He and his wife and daughter, all natives of the Violet area, have moved north of New Orleans. He rode out the storm at home and when the flood came, ran to the second floor of a house next door, where he was rescued 24 hours later. Then, like hundreds of others, he was stranded for days at a nearby improvised evacuee camp, where water and food had to be rationed.

"We've been married for 26 years and we lost everything," Duvieilh said. "No one could ever imagine the water could get that high. I'll never doubt it again."

Most of his family's friends, he said, have already moved out of harm's way.

"It is very difficult for some to leave," he said. "But they don't feel they could go back and risk everything again."

When Katrina flooded this small town, Jesse Reed rescued neighbors with his boat before heading toward dry land a few days later. Like a hardy few, he is planning to give the area one more chance. But just one.

Levee Progress Report: Much Done, More To Do (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - With meteorologists predicting another severe round of hurricanes this summer, the US Army Corps of Engineers is hastily working to finish repairs to the New Orleans' levee system by June 1 - the official start of hurricane season - calling the end product "stronger and better than before."

But independent engineers and scientists say that even with $800 million in repairs and re-inforcements, the levee system is not safe yet, and they caution residents in badly damaged areas against "buying promises" and returning too soon.

The result is that many evacuees remain uncertain about whether to rebuild and move home, adding to the trepidation about the approaching hurricane season.

"People need to have confidence in their protection system in order to come back," says Col. Lewis Setliff, the engineer overseeing the levee repairs for the corps.

Currently, his team is installing three new floodgates where New Orleans meets Lake Pontchartrain, to block tidal surges, as well as auxiliary pumps to help prevent inland flooding when the gates are closed. But the massive floodgates - at a cost of about $35 million each - are only temporary, says Colonel Setliff as he watches the work being done on the 17th Street Canal.

Congress is debating a more permanent solution, the building of which could take years and cost significantly more than the $3.1 billion now allotted for repairs to the protection system.

After the corps completes initial repairs, the integrity of the entire system is not certain, corps officials acknowledge. They are working to have a full assessment by September - two-thirds of the way through hurricane season.

That's especially disconcerting, says Raymond Seed, a civil engineer at the University of California, Berkeley, and head of the Independent Levee Investigation Team, which presented its final report this week. "During Katrina, the weakest link in the chain broke, and the next weakest link is the one we now have to worry about," he says.

Across from the breach at the east side of the 17th Street Canal, for instance, the west bank's floodwall is now off center about 3-1/2 inches. "It was about to fail," says Dr. Seed.

His group is calling for a Federal Flood Protection Authority similar to local flood-protection authorities and a reorganization of the corps similar to what occurred at NASA after the space shuttle Columbia went down.

"I myself would not purchase property and move in now if the commitment of the state and federal government is to continue with business as usual," he says.

Pam Dashiell, for one, is taking his advice. About 250 people have returned to her historic neighborhood in the Ninth Ward's Holy Cross area, but she is not one of them.

"I'm waiting to see whether the levees will hold," she says, adding that she does not trust the corps when it says the levees will be stronger and better. "They told us it was safe before."

Residents should be concerned, says Robert Bea, an expert in technical forensics and a member of the Independent Levee Investigation Team. "The corps has made some really substantive and good repairs to the system since Katrina, but it is essentially the same system," he says. "If it is challenged again, it will suffer the same outcome, which is catastrophic failure."

For a new system to work, says Dr. Bea, new technologies and new ideas must be incorporated. "Beyond sheet pilings and floodgates," he says, the corps needs to bolster the barrier islands, plant trees and other vegetation, eliminate drainage canals, build underground culverts, and turn some backyards into fields.

"In some places, you are going to have to surrender land, because either you can't defend it or it should be part of the defense system," says Bea.

Recently, the corps announced that two of the new floodgates and pumps won't be ready until July - though Setliff stresses there are adequate fallback plans in case of an early hurricane.

Sandy Rosenthal, with levees.org, says her watchdog group was not surprised to hear of the delay.

DOJ_NMG_0030123

"The organization that is responsible for this catastrophe is still in charge," she says, referring to the corps. Ninety percent of what went wrong lies at the feet of the federal government, and more specifically, the corps, which built the levee system, she says.

But Seed, who has been a critic of the corps' performance, cautions against that view. "Everybody's looking to blame the Army Corps of Engineers, but this is very much a layered cake with regards to responsibility."

The levee along the Orleans Avenue Canal, for instance, did not fail during Katrina. But because a 400-foot section was simply unfinished, it became a spillway, inundating nearby neighborhoods with water.

It was up to the city to complete that section, but the levee board and the reclamation district could never agree on how to finish it.

"There seems to be a rule down here that two agencies have to be in conflict. And their failure to get together in the interest of the public good caused catastrophic damage," says Seed.

Acknowledging local failures, Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a city councilwoman whose district includes hard-hit Gentilly and Pontchartrain Park, says everyone needs to take part in the solution.

"But it's the responsibility of the federal government to provide the funding for safe levees," she says. She is satisfied that the corps' repairs will prevent storm surge, "but what about overtopping, what about heavy rains, what about the long-term solution? We need a comprehensive plan."

The Catastrophe Wasn't Katrina (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The evidence, by now, is overwhelming: Beautiful, decadent New Orleans wasn't doomed by Hurricane Katrina but by decades of human incompetence and neglect. As far as the drowned city is concerned, the greatest natural disaster in the nation's history would have been just a messy inconvenience if not for the fumbling hand of man.

The mortal threat to New Orleans, as Katrina plowed into the Gulf Coast, was not the powerful winds -- Mississippi took the brunt of those -- but the massive storm surge the hurricane generated. We now know that the levees, floodwalls and other barriers protecting the city were, for the most part, plenty tall enough and theoretically strong enough to keep the waters at bay. On paper, New Orleans should have ended up wet and wounded, but basically intact.

What happened instead was "the single most costly catastrophic failure of an engineered system in history," according to a report issued last week by the Independent Levee Investigation Team, a blue-ribbon panel led by experts from the University of California at Berkeley and funded by the National Science Foundation.

Some of the flood barriers were built using inadequate materials, the report says. Others were designed so poorly that they provided weak spots for the waters to exploit. Still others were left unfinished for lack of funds.

The Army Corps of Engineers, which was responsible for building the levees that failed, has not yet issued its own final report on the flood and likely will dispute some of the independent team's conclusions. But Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff remarked last week that "had it not been for what appear to be structural problems in the building of the levees, Katrina would have been a bad hurricane" but not an unparalleled catastrophe.

The report of the independent team, which was led by UC Berkeley engineering professor Raymond B. Seed, cites these examples of cause and effect:

Earthen levees stretching east from the city were built with "highly erodible sand" and other "lightweight" materials that could be found locally, rather than more "cohesive" clay soils that would have had to be trucked in. "When the storm surge arrived, massive portions of these levees eroded catastrophically," the report says. "The resulting carnage in St. Bernard Parish was devastating," with a "wall of water . . . pushing homes laterally, flipping cars like toys and leaving them leaning against buildings, and driving large shrimp boats deep into the heart of residential neighborhoods."

Floodwalls lining the east side of the Inner Harbor Navigation Canal, known to locals as the Industrial Canal, were not engineered to keep water from seeping beneath and undermining them. "The result was two massive breaches that devastated the adjacent Ninth Ward neighborhood, and then pushed east to meet with the floodwaters already rapidly approaching from the east from St. Bernard Parish."

Surging water pushed by the hurricane's winds from Lake Pontchartrain into the 17th Street and London Avenue drainage canals remained "well below the design levels, and well below the tops of the floodwalls." Nonetheless, the floodwalls suffered "catastrophic" failures; the designers apparently had not fully understood the weakness of the foundation soils on which the walls were built. So even though little if any water lapped over the walls, sudden breaches inundated central New Orleans -- residential neighborhoods, business districts, the streets around the Superdome.

The report notes that "no one group or organization had a monopoly on responsibility" for the disaster. Local, state and national government officials were rarely on the same page. In terms of pure engineering, there should have been independent review of some of the Corps of Engineers' assumptions and methods.

The most chilling sentence in the report is this one:

"A number of these same problems appear to be somewhat pervasive, and call into question the integrity and reliability of other sections of the flood protection system that did not fail during the event."

In other words, there are many miles of levees around New Orleans that were built with the same questionable design principles and materials that were used in the barriers that gave way. The Corps has patched the levee system so that it could probably prevent the last flood, but what about the next one?

Chertoff worries about a storm hitting next-door Jefferson Parish, which has seen its population swell with evacuees and reconstruction workers. He worries that with so many people living in flimsy trailers, even an approaching tropical storm might necessitate an evacuation. With New Orleans still crippled and the jury not yet back on whether it can ever fully recover from Katrina, no one wants to flip the calendar. Hurricane season officially begins on Thursday.

DHS Personnel Officer Resigns As Department Tackles Crucial Workplace Issues (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The top personnel officer at the Department of Homeland Security, on the job about eight months, has resigned and will leave June 9, a department spokesman said.

K. Gregg Prillaman , who has more than 30 years of experience in personnel and management issues, had been tapped to oversee an ambitious revision of pay scales and workplace rules at Homeland Security, which has about 185,000 employees.

His departure is another jolt to the department, which has been coping with turnover in its senior executive ranks. "I was surprised by his resignation," said Michael Jackson , deputy secretary for Homeland Security. "He had done some good work for us. He just made a decision to make a change, and that was his call."

Department spokesman Larry Orluskie said Prillaman had no comment on his resignation. "We will pass on the opportunity at this time to do an interview," Orluskie said.

Prillaman's departure comes as the department wrestles with a series of critical workplace issues. A lawsuit brought by federal unions has blocked new rules that would curtail union rights and an appeals court ruling could come within the next few weeks. The House has voted to take money from the department's management account and shows little interest in providing funds to develop a new personnel system. And the merger of 22 agencies into Homeland Security, although three years old, continues to drain employee morale.

The department is behind its original schedule for changing how employees will be paid, deployed and disciplined. Officials now hope to introduce a new pay-for-performance system in February 2007 and continue in phases through 2008.

Some officials fear that the changes, although a priority for the administration, may continue to slip because of more pressing issues, such as improving immigration and border controls, and preparing for the summer hurricane season.

Prillaman's position -- chief human capital officer -- is relatively new in the government. Congress created the position in 2002 as a way to elevate workforce issues and put them on the table at senior leadership meetings.

But the job did not work out for Prillaman, according to current and former colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0030125

Prillaman and Janet Hale , the department's undersecretary for management, clashed over policy and operational issues, colleagues said. Strong philosophical differences so strained their relationship that they could not work together, said the colleagues, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to publicly discuss an internal matter.

Jackson suggested that the accounts were off base. "I would not oversubscribe to any sort of internal discussions here about people pushing on each other, because that happens in any organization," he said.

Hale also is leaving the department; her last day was Friday. She had been at Homeland Security since its founding. . She declined to be interviewed, Orluskie said.

Jackson said being Homeland Security's undersecretary of management "is one of the toughest jobs in the U.S. government. . . . It is a contact sport sometimes. It is a lot of complex issues, and people who bring a passion to the job like Janet did are the solution to what we need."

Searches are underway for successors to Prillaman and Hale, and an interim replacement for Prillaman has been found, Jackson said.

Scott Charbo , who oversees technology issues for the department, will be acting undersecretary for management.

Other key vacancies also have been filled, Jackson said.

On Friday, the Senate confirmed W. Ralph Basham , a 29-year veteran of the Secret Service, as the commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, which has 41,000 employees and is one of Homeland Security's largest agencies.

The Senate also confirmed R. David Paulison as undersecretary for federal emergency management and David Norquist as the department's chief financial officer.

"We are attracting strong public servants," Jackson said.

WAR NEWS:

Marine Probe Poses A Crucial Test For Iraqi Leaders (WSJ)

By Yochi Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The killing of unarmed Iraqi civilians allegedly by U.S. Marines could become a flash point between the U.S. and the new Iraqi government, which faces the question of whether to seek the extradition of American military personnel who may have been involved in the incident.

When Nouri al-Maliki was sworn in as Iraq's prime minister earlier this month, the Bush administration expressed hope that the installation of Iraq's first democratically elected government would reduce tensions there and pave the way for a U.S. military withdrawal. But the possibility that Marines in the Sunni city of Haditha killed 24 Iraqi civilians and tried to cover up the shootings could inflame conditions during Mr. Maliki's first days in power.

U.S. military investigators opened a pair of formal probes into the mid-November incident in Haditha, and civilian and military officials familiar with the matter said photos, videos and other evidence in the possession of military authorities indicate the Marines killed unarmed civilians, including women and children, without provocation. The evidence also indicates the Marines tried to cover up the incident by blaming the deaths on insurgents, these officials said. Investigators are likely to charge several Marines with murder, which carries the death penalty under military law, and other Marines are likely to be charged with attempting to cover up the incident, the officials said.

U.S. officials say they are bracing for the possibility that Mr. Maliki will demand that any Marines involved in the incident be turned over to the Iraqi justice system for trial as a way of burnishing his credentials as leader and addressing outrage over the incident.

Under the U.S. government's "status of forces" agreements with Iraq, U.S. military personnel accused of wrongdoing can be tried solely under the U.S. military justice system. As a political matter, however, an Iraqi extradition demand would almost certainly spark a standoff between the two governments.

Gen. George Casey, the top military commander in Iraq, said in an interview that he hadn't discussed the Haditha incident with the new prime minister or his Iraqi counterparts, and they hadn't asked about it. Once the investigation is complete, Gen.

Casey said, he likely would discuss it with them. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad referred questions about Haditha to the military. A spokesman for Mr. Maliki said the government is "considering all its options," but declined to comment further.

Allegations of the incident in Haditha, where dozens of U.S. forces have been killed in ambushes and other attacks since the 2003 invasion, prompted several U.S. lawmakers to warn that the deaths could damage America's efforts in Iraq and its moral standing in the Arab world more deeply than the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal. Republicans pledged to hold public hearings to investigate the military's handling of the deaths.

"There is this serious question...of what happened and when it happened and what was the immediate reaction of the senior officers in the Marine Corps when they began to gain knowledge of it," Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday on ABC's "This Week."

Iraqis have complained that the U.S. military rarely investigates the accidental killings of Iraqi civilians in raids or at military-run checkpoints. The belief that Mr. Maliki's predecessors as premier have been unable or unwilling to confront the issue has fueled Iraqi skepticism about the political transition.

Thousands of Iraqi civilians have been killed in recent months in sectarian violence carried out by insurgents, militia fighters, and death squads linked to the new U.S.-trained Iraqi military and paramilitary forces. With fears of sectarian bloodshed escalating, Sunnis and Shiites who have lost faith in the new federal government and its forces see U.S. troops as the only semihonest broker in the country. Many Iraqi leaders have expressed outrage over the incident, but broader concerns of sectarian violence could help reduce a public backlash against U.S. forces.

"None of the locals here trust the new government at all," said Capt. Rick Montcalm, who leads a reconnaissance platoon in a largely Sunni area north of Baghdad.

General Pledges 'appropriate Action' In Probe Of Iraqi Deaths (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, May 30, 2006

The chairman of the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff said Monday that "it would be premature for me to judge" the outcome of a Pentagon investigation into the killing of as many as a dozen Iraqi civilians by Marines.

However, Marine Gen. Peter Pace said he believes it's critically important to make the point that if certain servicemembers are responsible for an atrocity there, they "have not performed their duty the way that 99.9% of their fellow Marines have."

Interviewed on CBS' The Early Show as the nation observed Memorial Day honoring men and women lostin war, Pace pledged that "we'll get to the bottom of the investigation and take the appropriate action."

Pace's interview came a day after Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine war veteran and critic of Iraq policy, said the incident could undermine U.S. efforts there more than the Abu Ghraib prison scandal did.

Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, also charged that the shootings last November at Hadithah, a city in the Anbar province of western Iraq that has been plagued by insurgents, were covered up.

"Who covered it up, why did they cover it up, why did they wait so long?" Murtha said Sunday on This Week on ABC. "We don't know how far it goes. It goes right up the chain of command."

A bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into two homes and shot other people, according to Murtha, who has been briefed by officials.

One of the Marines in Hadithah that day, Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones of Hanford, Calif., told the Los Angeles Times that he took photos and carried out bodies as part of a cleanup crew dispatched to the homes after the shootings. He said he did not witness their deaths.

"They ranged from little babies to adult males and females. I'll never be able to get that out of my head. I can still smell the blood. This left something in my head and heart," Briones, 21, told the Los Angeles Times for a story published Monday.

Murtha said Sunday that high-level reports he received indicated that no one fired upon the Marines or that there was any military action against the U.S. forces after the initial explosion. Yet the deaths were not seriously investigated until March because an early probe was stifled within days of the incident, he said.

Said Pace on Monday: “This investigation is ongoing. It would be premature for me to judge the outcome.”

Asked how such a thing could have happened, he replied, “Fortunately, it does not happen very frequently, so there's no way to say historically why something like this might have happened. We'llfind out.” Murtha repeated his view that the war in Iraq cannot be won militarily and needs political solutions, which he said were damaged by such incidents involving the United States.

“This is the kind of war you have to win the hearts and minds of the people,” he said. “And we're set back every time something like this happens. This is worse than Abu Ghraib.”

The U.S. effort to win over Iraqis and others in the Arab world by fostering a democratic government was damaged when it was revealed that U.S. military personnel had abused and humiliated people held at Abu Ghraib, a prison outside of Baghdad.

Bloody Scenes Haunt A Marine (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, May 29, 2006

HANFORD, Calif. — Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones says he is tormented by two memories of Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha, Iraq.

The first is of the body of his best friend and fellow Marine blown apart just after dawn by a roadside bomb. The second is of the lifeless form of a small Iraqi girl, one of two dozen unarmed civilians allegedly killed by members of his Camp Pendleton unit — Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division.

Briones, a wiry, soft-spoken 21-year-old interviewed Sunday at his family home in this Central Valley city, said he was not among the small group of Marines that military investigators have concluded killed the civilians, including children, women and elderly men.

However, Briones, who goes by Ryan, said he took photographs of the victims and helped carry their bodies out of their homes as part of the cleanup crew sent in late in the afternoon on the day of the killings.

"They ranged from little babies to adult males and females. I'll never be able to get that out of my head. I can still smell the blood. This left something in my head and heart," Briones said.

He said he erased the digital photos he took at the scene after first providing them to the Haditha Marine command center. He said Navy investigators later interrogated him about the pictures and confiscated his camera.

At least two military investigations are underway into the incident at Haditha, which is emerging as possibly the worst case of alleged criminal misconduct by U.S. forces in the 3-year-old Iraq war.

Of the 12 Marines being investigated, three or four are thought to have done the killing, according to officials briefed on the investigation. The others are being investigated for failing to stop the killings or for not reporting the incident truthfully.

Briones is the first of his unit to speak publicly about the events. His account provides background on the atmosphere and activities that day in the Euphrates River town and the traumatic memories it left in its wake.

Shortly after 7 a.m. on Nov. 19, Briones, who received a Purple Heart during a previous tour in Iraq that included fierce fighting in Fallouja, said his team of five men was called to respond to a roadside bomb explosion about 300 yards outside Kilo Company's Firm Base Sparta, located in an abandoned school.

When they arrived about 10 minutes later at the smoky, chaotic scene in a residential neighborhood, he said he saw the remains of his best friend, Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas, his body split in half, resting in the destroyed Humvee in which he had been riding.

"He had a giant hole in his chin. His eyes were rolled back up in his skull," Briones recalled of the 20-year-old Texan. Briones said he draped a poncho over the body of his drinking buddy and workout partner and said a short prayer over his body: "Rest in peace. You are my brother by another mother. I love you, man."

After the explosion, Marines began a methodical sweep of homes looking for the bomber or people who knew his identity, according to officials briefed on the investigation. At some point during the sweep, Marines entered three nearby homes, killing the people inside.

But Briones said he didn't see any of this.

"It was such a blur. Smoky and smelled like an explosion," Briones said. "I only saw T.J. because he was right there. I practically walked into him."

He said his team evacuated two other soldiers in Terrazas' unit who were wounded in the explosion, including one, whom he identified as Lance Cpl. James Crossan of Washington state, who was pinned under the wreckage.

Briones and his team, including a Navy medical corpsman he identified as Brian Witt, evacuated the two wounded to a nearby soccer field where they were picked up by a Black Hawk helicopter. He said he and his team then returned to the Sparta home base.

"We went back to the firm base and just waited," Briones said. "A lot of people were mad. Everyone had just had a [terrible] feeling about what had happened to T.J." Still in shock over the death of his best friend, Briones said he retreated to a dark corner of the camp to collect his thoughts. Only 20 at the time, he said he didn't want his even younger 3rd Squad, 3rd Platoon team members to see that he was grieving.

He said he and his team remained at the camp until they were called back to the scene of the explosion about 5:30 p.m. the same day.

When they arrived, Briones said that most of the Marines on the site were sergeants or above, including several officers: "I remember because they didn't have enough lance corporals to deal with the bodies."

Briones said his team was assigned to mark the bodies of the victims by number and place them in body bags. He said a sergeant or a junior officer, he couldn't recall which, asked if any of the Marines carried personal cameras and that he and another Marine, whom he identified as Lance Cpl. Andrew Wright of Novato, said they did.

"You are going to be combat photographers," Briones said they were told.

Briones said he took pictures of at least 15 bodies before his camera batteries died. He said he then helped other Marines remove the bodies and place them in body bags. He said his worst moment, and one that haunts him to this day, was picking up the body of a young girl who was shot in the head.

"I held her out like this," he said, demonstrating with his arms extended, "but her head was bobbing up and down and the insides fell on my legs."

As he spoke, his mother, Susie Briones, 40, a Hanford community college teacher, who was sitting beside him at the kitchen table, silently wiped away tears.

Earlier she confided to a reporter that her son called frequently from Iraq after he experienced nightmares over the little girl.

"He called me many times," she said, "about carrying this little girl in his hands and her brains splattering on his boots. He'd say, 'Mom, I can't clean my boots. I can't clean my boots. I see her.' "

Ryan Briones said that he and other members of the cleanup crew remained at the site until about 11 p.m. When he came back he said he dropped his Olympus 3.2 megapixel camera by the unmanned Sparta base command operations center. When he returned a few hours later he said it looked like the camera had been moved so he assumed someone had downloaded the pictures and he erased them all.

But whether the photos ever reached authorities, who also have pictures from an intelligence investigation team and another source, is not clear.

Briones also said that he did not want to give the impression that he still had copies of the photographs because he did not want his possessions or those of his family searched by Navy investigators. He said there had been several examples recently of Navy investigators confiscating computers and PlayStation consoles capable of storing photographs.

The photos later became the main focus of questions by investigators who interviewed Briones for several hours in Iraq in March, shortly before he returned home. In the second interrogation, which he said took place at the battalion headquarters at Haditha Dam north of the city of Haditha, investigators showed him photographs of the bodies similar to his but shot from different angles.

"They wanted to know if the bodies had been moved or tampered with," Briones recalled. He said he had not been interviewed by Navy investigators since his return, although other Marines in his company had been interrogated repeatedly for hours at the Naval Criminal Investigative Service at Camp Horno, part of sprawling Camp Pendleton.

DOJ_NMG_0030129

In early April, less than 36 hours after his return from Iraq, Ryan Briones got into serious trouble in his hometown that he and his family say was related to stress from the Haditha incident.

Briones was charged with stealing a pickup truck, crashing it into a house, leaving the scene of the accident, driving under the influence and resisting arrest. A picture of the spectacular crash with a white Ford F-150 lodged in a Hanford living room appeared on the Hanford Sentinel's front page April 4.

Released from Kings County jail April 5 on $35,000 bond, Briones has a court date set in mid-June.

His mother said that her son has joined Alcoholics Anonymous and is being treated by a San Diego physician for his post-traumatic symptoms.

"My son saw what the Marines did, and he knew who did it before the Haditha investigations began," the mother wrote in a long letter to local authorities seeking leniency in the criminal cases.

"He saw the killings and knew who sent the word out to do the killings, he had to clean up the bodies of children who were sleeping in their beds and he saw his best friend die in front of his eyes."

Susie Briones said she is angry at what she described as the Marines' failure to adequately "decompress" him and other Marines when they come home from combat. She said she was writing a book to help other families avoid what she and her son are going through.

"I used to be one of those Marines who said that post-traumatic stress is a bunch of bull," said Ryan Briones, who has prescriptions for anti-depressants and sleeping pills. "But all this stuff that keeps going through my head is eating me up. I need immediate help."

Drone's Video May Aid Marine Inquiry (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Military investigators piecing together what happened in the Iraqi town of Haditha on Nov. 19 -- when Marines allegedly killed two dozen civilians -- have access to video shot by an unmanned drone aircraft that was circling overhead for at least part of that day, military defense lawyers familiar with the case said in interviews.

It is unclear whether the video obtained from that day's flight captured the violence, said the lawyers, who have consulted with Marines who were there. One lawyer said investigators have reviewed surveillance footage taken hours after the shootings, which showed the Marines returning to the town to remove the bodies of the Iraqis.

Yesterday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said charges will be issued against troops if the evidence merits it. For now, however, "it would be premature for me to judge" the outcome of the two U.S. military investigations, Pace said on CBS's "The Early Show." "We'll get to the bottom of the investigation and take the appropriate action."

Iraqis who say they witnessed the violence in Haditha have said U.S. troops shot men, women and children at close range in retaliation for the death of a Marine lance corporal in a roadside bombing. The two investigations -- one into the incident and another into allegations that military personnel tried to cover it up -- began this year after news reports challenged an early military statement that the civilians were killed in the bombing.

People familiar with the case say they expect that charges of murder, dereliction of duty and making a false statement will be brought against several Marines.

In addition to video from the drone, investigators have records of radio message traffic between the Marines and a command center, said military defense lawyers who have discussed the investigation with Marines who were at Haditha but who have not yet been formally retained by them.

"There's a ton of information that isn't out there yet," said one lawyer, who, like the others, would speak only on the condition of anonymity because a potential client has not been charged. The radio message traffic, he said, will provide a different view of the incident than has been presented by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and other members of Congress. For example, he said, contrary to Murtha's account, it will show that the Marines came under small-arms fire after the roadside explosion.

Two of the lawyers said the message traffic will show officers in higher headquarters knew early on that a large number of civilians had been killed and that they did not raise alarms.

"The chain of command knew about it," said one, and "the number of deaths was reported" by the commander of the company involved, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion of the 1st Regiment of the 1st Marine Division.

Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, a Marine spokesman, said yesterday he could not comment on the reports of drone-aircraft video or other aspects of the case because "the investigation isn't complete." Last month, the Marines relieved of command the battalion commander, Lt. Jeffrey R. Chessani, as well as McConnell and another company commander, citing a lack of confidence in their leadership.

The presence of the drone is potentially significant because such surveillance craft are in high demand in Iraq and their use is supervised by senior officers -- which could indicate there was interest among higher officers about what was occurring in Haditha.

One of the military lawyers said Nov. 19 was the 3rd Battalion's "hottest day" in Iraq, and was unusually violent even for al Anbar Province, which is where the insurgency began and where it remains extremely active.

In addition to drone surveillance that day, AV-8 Harriers were dropping bombs, helicopters were evacuating wounded, and a large firefight occurred about one-third of a mile from the site of the civilian shootings, said several people familiar with the investigation.

Also yesterday, the Los Angeles Times reported that a Marine said he photographed at least 15 bodies after the attack, which he said he was not involved in. Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones, the first member of the unit to speak publicly about the incident, told the newspaper that after he took the pictures he helped remove bodies, including that of a young girl who had been shot in the head.

Briones indicated that since returning home to Hanford, Calif., he has suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder stemming from the corpses he saw and carried that day. "They ranged from little babies to adult males and females," the Times quoted him as saying.

Less than two days after coming home he was charged with stealing a pickup truck, leaving the scene of the accident, driving under the influence of alcohol and resisting arrest, the newspaper said.

On A Marine Base, Disbelief Over Charges (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., May 29 — In this "company town" where everything and everyone caters to the well-being of the Marine Corps, there is no shortage of people, both military and civilian, who are willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the troops accused of unjustified killings last November in Haditha, Iraq.

Denial and utter disbelief are the overwhelming reaction to reports of the killings involving marines based here. If there is any truth to the accusations, some say, then the troops must have been acting on direct orders, responding as they were trained to do.

Lawrence Harper, 36, now retired, served in the Marine Corps for more than 15 years, and was in the Persian Gulf war.

"Many times you see a situation the next day and wonder, how did my brain think this was dangerous?" Mr. Harper said, while shopping for gear at G.I. Joe's, a military supply shop in Oceanside.

Mr. Harper expressed doubt that the marines knowingly committed crimes in Haditha, saying that they undoubtedly acted on instinct, as trained, in the heat of battle.

"When a bullet comes at you and you turn around and half your buddy's head is blown off, it changes the way you think forever," he said.

Jerry Alexander, the owner of G.I. Joe's and a Navy man who served with the Marines for a dozen years, had much the same perspective, saying, "If I saw my buddy laying there dead, there is no such thing as too much retaliation."

While Mr. Alexander said "unacceptable kills" should not be covered up, he worried about the unfairness of judging those who were in Haditha.

"In the heat of combat, you cannot hesitate; he who hesitates is lost," he said. "I would not prosecute these young men because they were just doing their jobs."

DOJ_NMG_0030131

On this Memorial Day, in this military community, people will concede that any marine who committed illegal acts must be punished and that the Pentagon must take responsibility.

But conversation quickly returns to emotional and earnest explanations of the need for understanding for what one former marine described as "these 19-year-old kids who get paid 900 bucks a month to put their lives on the line."

The marines and several senior officers assigned to the Third Battalion of the First Marine Division are the focus of criminal investigations looking into the deaths of 24 people who lived in the Subhani district of Haditha, an insurgent stronghold in Iraq.

A preliminary inquiry indicated that the civilians were killed during a four- to five-hour sweep, led by a handful of marines angry over the death of Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, 20, of El Paso, Tex., who was killed as his patrol drove through the area.

Appearing Monday on the CNN program "American Morning," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said, "We want to find out what happened and we'll make it public."

He added, "If the allegations, as they are being portrayed in the newspaper, turn out to be valid, then of course there will be charges. But we don't know yet what the outcome will be."

The family of Corporal Terrazas was interviewed Monday morning on "Morning Edition" on National Public Radio. His uncle, Andy Terrazas, a former marine who is now a border patrol agent, said, "I hope this is over soon so they can just let him rest in peace. I hope these marines come out clean, but I guess it's not looking too good, right?"

None of the active and former marines interviewed for this story knew Corporal Terrazas or the members of the unit at the center of the probe. But most of them had seen combat, recently or in the Gulf war.

"In Iraq, everything you do has to be cleared with a commanding officer," said Cpl. Michael Miller, 25, who has served two tours of duty and fought in Falluja and Ramadi. "You just can't go clearing houses without the permission of higher-ups."

Corporal Miller said he believed that the marines would be vindicated in the inquiry. "I just think the marines did what they had to do," he said. "I don't know why innocent people are dead, but someone must have seen a gun." Several retired senior officers agreed. Col. Ben Mittman of the Air Force, interviewed as he got his regular military buzz cut at the Beachcomber Barber Shop in Oceanside, worried that the young servicemen were being made scapegoats.

"If this thing really happened, they had to radio communication and get the go-ahead," he said. "The frontline grunts these days do not do anything without the commanders knowing, especially something like that."

The Los Angeles Times reported Friday that photographs taken by a Marine intelligence team sent into Haditha showed execution-style killings, including gunshots to the head. As more details about the Haditha deaths incident surface, it has conjured disturbing memories of the My Lai massacre in Vietnam for many former marines and in other circles of war veterans. "I would draw the same parallel," Mr. Alexander said. "The young guys took the heat for the higher-ups there too."

Most of those "young guys," the active-duty marines who are the peers of those under scrutiny in the Haditha deaths, were off base this weekend on a five-day holiday leave.

It is those marines and their leaders who were the focus of other remarks by General Pace in his interview on "Morning Edition."

"We should, in fact, as leaders take on the responsibility to get out and talk to our troops and make sure that they understand that what 99.9 percent of them are doing, which is fighting with honor and courage, is exactly what we expect of them," he said, adding, "Because regardless of where this investigations goes, we want to ensure that our troops understand what's expected of them."

Nation's Honor Requires Full Inquiry Into Haditha Killings (USAT)

USA Today, May 30, 2006

It was a hard thing to have to address on Memorial Day.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, responding to a brewing scandal over an alleged massacre of as many as 24 civilians by Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, pledged that two investigations would get to the bottom of what happened and that appropriate action would be taken.

DOJ_NMG_0030132

The investigations are another painful reminder that there are no tidy wars. Young soldiers under tremendous stress don't always act honorably. Those dishonorable actions by a few tarnish the vast majority whose sacrifices and courage were marked Monday in ceremonies and remembrances across the USA.

That is all the more reason to make sure that the Haditha inquiries — into the alleged massacre and a possible coverup — live up to Pace's promise.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a former Marine and outspoken critic of the Iraq war, says the preliminary findings sketch a disturbing sequence: that after a bomb rocked a military convoy in the town Nov. 19 and killed a Marine, other Marines shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi and at least two homes.

Witnesses cited by The New York Times Monday say the dead included a 77-year-old man in a wheelchair and a 4-year-old boy in one home, and five children in the other.

Jumping to conclusions is, as Pace said, premature. So is any comparison to Vietnam's My Lai massacre, where hundreds died at the hands of U.S. soldiers.

But one particularly disturbing aspect is that it took reporting by Time magazine in March to reopen a quickly closed Haditha probe. Time challenged official accounts that civilians were killed in a roadside bombing or in a crossfire between insurgents and Marines.

It's understandable that military officials might have little appetite for an unvarnished investigation, which is why Congress also needs to play an active role. The war in Iraq has already damaged the image of America's military — particularly, as President Bush noted last week, the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal.

And amid all the killing, torture and violence in Iraq, the deaths of a dozen or two more Iraqis — fewer, even, than died in bombings Monday — might seem inconsequential. Many Iraqis have reacted to the reports about Haditha with the numb shrugs of those inured to brutality.

But that is not the point. Iraqi insurgents carry out premeditated slaughter of innocents with appalling regularity. The United States should never stoop to that level. It is a measure of a country's moral strength that it can face up to such horror, investigate it thoroughly and punish it appropriately.

Carbomb Kills CBS Crew, Injures Reporter (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, May 30, 2006

Baghdad -- CBS television correspondent Kimberly Dozier and her two-man crew became part of the Memorial Day story they had set out to report when a car bomb exploded Monday beside their patrol in central Baghdad, killing the two British crew members, an American soldier and an Iraqi translator.

Dozier, 39, was critically injured, and six U.S. soldiers from the patrol with which she was traveling also were hurt in the midmorning blast in central Baghdad's Karradah neighborhood, just one of a surge of bombings that ripped across the capital and its surrounding provinces, killing at least 40 people.

CBS named the dead TV journalists as veteran cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and sound man James Brolan, 42. Both based in London and veterans of many wars, they were embedded with Dozier at the time of the attack with soldiers from the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division in Baghdad, according to a statement issued by the network.

Dozier, who has been reporting from Iraq for the past three years, was in critical condition at a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad's Green Zone. She was undergoing her second surgery early Tuesday, a CBS spokeswoman said.

``Doctors are cautiously optimistic about her prognosis," the network statement said Monday.

The CBS team had set out with U.S. soldiers early Monday to gather an eyewitness account of the everyday activities of U.S. and Iraqi troops on this fourth Memorial Day in Iraq since the war began, said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a 4th Brigade spokesman.

``They wanted to know what we did to commemorate Memorial Day," Cheadle said. ``Essentially what we do is continue the mission, because every day is a little bit of a Memorial Day for us."

DOJ_NMG_0030133

The three were traveling in an armored Humvee but exited their vehicle when U.S. troops got out to inspect a checkpoint, according to an account posted on the CBS Web site. Just as they disembarked, at about 10:30 a.m., a nearby car packed with explosives detonated, killing the four and setting ablaze one of the Humvees in the convoy.

The military did not name the U.S. soldier killed in the attack, the 2,466th since the war began, according to Defense Department figures.

It was not clear whether the car bomb was intended to hit the U.S. patrol or was just one of the string of bombings across Baghdad on Monday, including three others in Karradah, a Shiite neighborhood that is bombed fairly regularly.

Karradah is one of Baghdad's calmest districts, however, and U.S. soldiers rarely are attacked there, Cheadle said.

``It was an anomaly," he said. ``It isn't indicative of the state of security in Karradah at all, although obviously there are other places that we still need to work on.

``Looking at the damage, I'm not sure it would have made a difference if they had been in their vehicle," he said. ``It was a pretty large explosion.

Monday's two deaths brought to 71 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion, the overwhelming majority of them Iraqis.

The CBS team was the second U.S. television news crew to be struck by a bombing while embedded with American forces this year. In January, ABC ``World News Tonight" co-anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt were seriously injured when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in Taji, just north of Baghdad.

``This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of CBS News and Sports, said in a statement. ``Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad also paid tribute to the crew.

``These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation," he said. ``That story must and will be told."

The attack serves as a reminder of the perils confronting soldiers and journalists alike whenever they venture out in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, spokesman for the multinational force in Baghdad.

``U.S. soldiers are going out every day and journalists are going out every day to cover them, and there are inherent risks in that," he said. ``The terrorists don't care who they kill or injure."

Withington attributed Monday's wave of bombings to ``terrorists who want to disrupt the formation of Iraq's new government."

The attacks rolled across Baghdad starting shortly after dawn, targeting civilians and security forces and Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods in eastern and western Baghdad, sending jitters across the city.

Two car bombs killed 17 people in the Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah, and a device planted under a mini-bus just across the river in the Shiite neighborhood of Kadhamiyah killed seven, police said. Three other explosions in Karradah killed at least five people, and a bombing on the eastern edge of the city killed one person traveling in a mini-bus.

In the deadliest single attack, 14 Iraqi civilians employed on a base used by the Iranian opposition group People's Mujahedeen of Iran were killed when a bomb targeted the bus carrying them to work in Khalis, about 50 miles north of Baghdad. Also, police said they found the bodies of 10 men who had been shot in the head and dumped in garbage in the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, a police spokesman said.

The escalation in violence comes as Iraq's new government remains paralyzed by bitter infighting over whom to appoint to head the crucial Interior and Defense Ministries. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had promised he would name the ministers by last weekend, but Sunnis and Shiites still are unable to agree on candidates, meaning the two ministries with responsibility for bringing security to Iraq remain leaderless.

Car Bomb Kills Soldier, 2 CBS News Crew Members (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A car bomb on Monday killed a U.S. soldier and two CBS News crew members, and severely wounded an American correspondent.

DOJ_NMG_0030134

On-air reporter Kimberly Dozier, 39, and two British crew members had embedded with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division, which was working its way through central Baghdad. Cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and soundman James Brolan, 42, died at the scene of the attack. An Iraqi contractor also died in the blast, the military said.

The CBS crew was riding through the predominantly Shiite Muslim, middle-class shopping district of Karada, and had stepped down from a Humvee when the car bomb ripped through the vehicles. It was unclear how the bomb was detonated.

The attack came as bloodshed surged across the country Monday. At least 33 people were shot dead or killed in bombings in Baghdad, as an ongoing insurgency raged and the two major Muslim sects continued to swap rounds of attacks and assassinations.

Targets for bombing attacks included the German embassy, an Iraqi police station and a parking garage.

The most deadly attack struck a bus full of day laborers on their way to work at a base belonging to Iranian dissident group Mujahedeen e Khalq. The blast north of Baghdad killed 11 workers and wounded 16 others. Most of the men were farmers and construction workers on the base; they had mixed religious backgrounds.

Another bomb targeting a patrol of Iraqi police in northern Baghdad killed eight people, most of them students from a nearby school. And Sunday night, two British soldiers died after a British patrol north of Basra was struck by a roadside bomb.

After the patrol attack, Dozier was rushed into surgery at a U.S. military hospital in the Iraqi capital. She was in critical condition, and doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis, a statement from CBS said.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of the network's news and sports divisions, said in a statement. "Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public."

McManus said Dozier was undergoing a second operation Monday evening at the military hospital in Balad and would likely be airlifted to a U.S. military base in Germany.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad rushed to the hospital Monday night to pay their condolences to CBS staffers and to monitor Dozier's condition.

Dozier, who had been reporting in Iraq for three years, had returned to Baghdad this week after taking a break to help move her elderly parents, who live in Baltimore, to an assisted living facility, said anchor Bob Schieffer.

"We're just sick to our stomachs about this," he said in an interview. "This is a reminder that this is not a reality show. We see so much of this on television that we tend to look at these things as a movie. But people are getting hurt and killed out there. This brings it home."

Schieffer said he had just spoken to Dozier last week about taking a break from the war zone.

"I was encouraging her to take some assignments where there was less risk," he said. "But she was just determined to go back to Baghdad and see the story through. It's just a heartbreaker."

The attack suffered by the CBS news crew was an eerie echo of the one sustained by ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt five months ago as they were traveling with Iraqi troops north of Baghdad.

On Monday, Woodruff released a statement saying he was "devastated" by the news.

"I have met both remarkable journalists Kimberly Dozier and Paul Douglas in so many different countries from Israel to Afghanistan," he said. "Their work and intelligence have always impressed me, whenever our paths have crossed. James Brolan and I were embedded together, working very closely on many difficult stories. During the Iraqi invasion in 2003 we spent more than a month on the road with the Marines, and it was often James' wonderful sense of humor that kept us going."

McManus said he had received personal calls and messages from the top executives at the other broadcast networks and cable news channels offering support.

He said he hasn't contemplated whether the network should re-evaluate how it is covering Iraq, but added, "I don't think there are any more precautions that any of us could take that we're not taking. The fact of the matter is that it is so, so dangerous and so unprecedented. It's something that every news organization is grappling with trying to cover the story."

Douglas had worked for CBS News for more than a decade in hot spots such as Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Rwanda and Bosnia. He is survived by his wife of 29 years, Linda, as well as two daughters, Kelly 29, and Joanne 26, and three grandchildren, Charlie , 8, Georgia, 4 , and Kai, 18 months.

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked for the network for a year, in Baghdad and Afghanistan, and was part of the CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club Award for its reporting on the Pakistan earthquake.

Brolan's family released a statement calling him "the best dad, the best husband and the best mate to be with in a tight spot out in the field."

He is survived by his wife, Geri, and his two children; Sam, 17, and Agatha, 12.

Roadside Bomb Kills Two CBS Journalists In Iraq, Injures Third (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Two CBS News crewmen were killed and a correspondent critically hurt in Iraq on Monday when U.S. forces they were traveling with came under attack.

A U.S. soldier and an Iraqi contractor also were killed in the attack, one of eight explosions in Iraq that killed at least 33 people and wounded dozens Monday in a wave of violence.

The CBS News journalists were on patrol in Baghdad when the U.S. troops they were with stopped to inspect an Iraqi army checkpoint, according to a story posted on the CBS News website. The journalists got out of the armored vehicle as a nearby car packed with explosives detonated. Six U.S. soldiers were injured in the attack. The death of CBS cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and sound technician James Brolan, 42, both Britons, brings to 71 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Correspondent Kimberly Dozier, 39, who has served multiple tours in Iraq, underwent surgery in a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad, where doctors were “cautiously optimistic,” CBS said.

CBS News said the three journalists were covering American troops for Memorial Day.

“These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation,” U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said. “That story must and will be told.”

News organizations said the latest attack underscored the risk of reporting in Iraq, but that the danger of the assignment would not stop them from covering the war.

ABC News anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt were injured by shrapnel from a roadside bomb while patrolling with Iraqi soldiers in January. NBC News correspondent David Bloom died from a pulmonary embolism during the invasion in 2003.

Iraq is the “single most dangerous place on earth,” said CBS News President Sean McManus. “This is going to happen again but you just hope and pray that it doesn't happen to someone who works for you.”

Monday's wave of attacks began just after dawn when a roadside bomb killed 10 in Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, the Associated Press reported. A car bomb parked near Baghdad's Sunni Abu Hanifa mosque killed at least nine Iraqi civilians.

Iraq Blast Kills Two On Crew For CBS (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Salih Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 29 -- A car bomb explosion in central Baghdad Monday killed two CBS News crew members, an Iraqi interpreter and a U.S. soldier, and severely wounded the news team's correspondent, in one of a string of attacks that killed dozens of people in Iraq over the course of the day.

Paul Douglas, a cameraman, and James Brolan, a sound man, died in the blast, CBS News said in a statement. Both men were British citizens based in London. Kimberly Dozier, an American correspondent who has covered the war in Iraq for nearly three years, was taken to a Baghdad hospital for surgery. The network said she was listed in critical condition and that doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis.

U.S. military authorities did not identify the soldier and the interpreter who were killed. Six other soldiers were wounded, the military said in a statement.

The president of CBS News, Sean McManus, said that Dozier was undergoing a second round of surgery in Baghdad and that the network hoped she would be evacuated to Germany as soon as possible. Doctors successfully removed shrapnel from Dozier's head, but her more serious injuries are to her lower body, CBS News correspondent David Martin reported. She had been in Iraq only for a few days on this visit and was in New York last weekend, according to McManus.

The news team had been traveling in a convoy with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division, working on a Memorial Day report. On its Web site, CBS News said they had planned to stay out only a few hours in order to get back to their bureau to edit their report.

The convoy had stopped to inspect an Iraqi army checkpoint when a car bomb blew up nearby. Dozier, 39, Douglas, 48, and Brolan, 42, were outside the convoy's Humvees at the time to film the American soldiers inspecting the checkpoint. The network said it believed they were wearing helmets and body armor.

The three journalists were the latest to become casualties in a conflict that has claimed the lives of 71 reporters, most of them Iraqis, since it began in 2003, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

On Jan. 29, in the most recent incident involving Americans, Bob Woodruff, then co-anchor of the ABC News "World News Tonight," and his cameraman, Doug Vogt, suffered serious wounds when the Iraqi military vehicle in which they were traveling was struck by a roadside bomb. Both men are still recovering.

In an interview, McManus called the attack "horribly sad." Iraq is "the most dangerous place on Earth right now, and we take every precaution," he said. He added that CBS would not pull back on its war coverage. "The reporters have a very strong obligation and passion to cover this story."

"What people need to know about Paul is what an amazing human being he was, as well as a great professional," said Jim Murphy, a former executive producer of the "CBS Evening News" who worked with both Douglas and Dozier. "So many times, I watched him get us out of dangerous situations just with his body language or the right words. He projected this great strength but amazing calm at the same time."

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked with CBS News in Iraq and Afghanistan over the past year. He was part of a CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club Award for its reporting on the 2005 Pakistan earthquake.

Dozier, born in Honolulu, has been a foreign correspondent specializing in the Middle East since the early 1990s and speaks Arabic and Hebrew. She has worked in radio and print -- she was a freelance reporter for The Washington Post in 1994 -- as well as television. She won three American Women in Radio and Television Gracie Awards for her reports on violence in the Middle East, Kosovo and Afghanistan.

"Every time Kimberly left, she wanted to know when she could go back to Iraq," McManus said. "She really lived for this story. She's passionate and brave and committed."

Murphy said that she had probably spent more time in Iraq than any other single American correspondent.

This attack and others Monday underlined the gravity of the problems facing the country's nine-day-old government. As Iraqi politicians continued a long debate over who will head the country's security ministries, more than 40 people died in eight bombings and several shootings, according to police and news reports. Military authorities also reported that two British soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in the city of Basra in southern Iraq on Sunday night.

The bloodiest attack was the bombing of a bus near Khalis, a predominantly Shiite town about 40 miles north of Baghdad in Diyala province. Fifteen people died, according to police and hospital officials. The passengers worked for the People's Mujaheddin Organization of Iran, a group opposed to the Shiite government of Iraq's eastern neighbor.

The explosion ripped through the middle of the bus. One passenger, Ahmed Bilal Thyab, interviewed while recuperating at a nearby hospital from wounds to his head and right arm, said he was in the back when the bomb exploded. "I saw the others die in front of me," Thyab said. "I survived because I wasn't in the middle."

Thyab thought the bus was attacked in Khalis because "most of the people there are Shiites and hate the People's Mujaheddin."

DOJ_NMG_0030137

The organization maintained a military wing in Iraq during the government of President Saddam Hussein, which was intensely hostile to Iran during and after the 1980-88 war between the two countries. After the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 ended Hussein's rule, the organization was disarmed and took a lower profile. Shiites dominate Iraq's new government.

Another bombing, in northern Baghdad's predominantly Shiite Kazimiyah neighborhood, claimed eight lives, an Iraqi army officer said.

Maj. Abbas Khudhaiyer described what happened, in an account confirmed by another witness. A man wearing a brown tracksuit -- and a hidden explosive belt -- placed a box on the front seat of a minibus waiting on a street packed with vendors who sell clothes. A soldier, seeing the suspicious activity, ran toward the man and stopped him.

"Who are you? Why did you drop that box there? What does it have?" the soldier demanded.

"I'm just a passenger and I'm going to ride in the minibus," the man replied. "I'm going to go to Shulah," another neighborhood in Baghdad.

"Show me some identification," the soldier said.

"I don't have any identification," the man said.

The soldier grabbed him by the hand, apparently intending to take him to his officers for questioning, but then the man detonated his explosive belt, which also set off a bomb in the box.

Just before the explosion, Hussein Abdel Ghaffar, a bystander, saw a woman walking hand-in-hand with her 8-year-old boy along the street. After the detonation, the boy was gone. The mother, hysterical, couldn't find him. Ghaffar helped, and found the boy's mutilated body.

"The thing that stayed in my mind, and I will never forget it, is that mother who lost her kid," Ghaffar said. "I was only able to bring her the upper half of his body."

Surging Iraq Attacks Kill Dozens (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A wave of car bombings and shootings plagued Shi'ite and Sunni areas of Iraq yesterday, killing more than three dozen people, including two CBS crew members and a U.S. soldier. The network's correspondent was seriously wounded.

Network correspondent Kimberly Dozier, 39, was critically wounded. CBS said Miss Dozier underwent surgery at a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad. She was in critical condition, but doctors were cautiously optimistic, the network said.

As parliament discussed the nation's disintegrating security, lawmakers pressed for the appointment of defense and interior ministers -- seen as a necessary step toward Iraqi forces assuming more control so U.S.-led troops can begin withdrawing.

At least eight bombings rocked the capital in the worst wave of violence in days. A car bomb exploded as a U.S. convoy patrolled in central Baghdad, killing veteran CBS cameraman Paul Douglas, 48; soundman James Brolan, 42; and an American soldier, U.S. officials said.

The CBS crew was on patrol with the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, when the bomb exploded. The U.S. military said an Iraqi interpreter also was killed and six American soldiers were injured.

There were conflicting reports on whether the car was moving or parked when it detonated.

According to CBS and Iraqi police, the journalists were reporting outside their armored Humvee when the blast occurred just before noon in Tahariyat Square, a mixed area in south-central Baghdad. The blast collapsed the front end of the Humvee.

Dozens of journalists have been injured, killed or kidnapped in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. Before yesterday's attack killed the two Britons, the Committee to Protect Journalists had put the number killed at 69. Of those, nearly three-quarters were Iraqis, the New York-based group has said.

More than 35 other persons were killed nationwide, most of them in Baghdad.

The attacks began just after dawn, with one roadside bomb killing 10 persons and injuring another 12 who worked for an Iranian organization opposed to the Tehran regime, police said.

That bombing targeted a public bus near Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad in Diyala province, an area notorious for such attacks, provincial police said.

DOJ_NMG_0030138

All the dead were workers at the Ashraf base of the Mujahedeen Khalq. The group, made up of Iranian dissidents living in Iraq, said the dead were Iraqi workers heading to their camp.

A car bomb parked near Baghdad's main Sunni Abu Hanifa mosque killed at least nine Iraqi civilians and wounded 25, said Saif al-Janabi, director of Noaman hospital. It exploded at noon in north Baghdad's Azamiyah neighborhood and disintegrated the vehicle.

A bomb planted in a parked minivan killed at least seven persons and wounded at least 20 at the entrance to an open-air market selling secondhand clothes in the northern Baghdad suburb of Kazimiyah.

Another parked car bomb exploded near Ibn al-Haitham college in Azamiyah, also in northern Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding at least five -- including four Iraqi soldiers, police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said.

In other attacks, a roadside bomb killed two police officers and wounded three others in Baghdad's Karradah district, while one man was killed and six were wounded when a bomb hidden in a minivan exploded.

A mortar shell exploded at a Shi'ite mosque in southern Baghdad's Zafraniyah district. Shi'ite militiamen sealed off the area and prevented police from approaching, said Col. al-Mohammedawi.

Also, gunmen in separate incidents killed two police officers in western Baghdad; two police officers, identified as former Ba'athists, in Amarah, 180 miles southeast of Baghdad; and police Brig. Gen. Sadiq Jaafar Salih, director of the national ID card office in Diyala, authorities said.

Iraq's parliament debated the deteriorating security situation in the capital and some of its outlying provinces but did not set up a commission to address the problem because of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's inability to appoint ministers of defense and interior -- two posts that control the various security forces.

2 On CBS Crew Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD — A car bomb on Monday killed a U.S. soldier and two CBS News crew members and severely wounded an American correspondent.

On-air reporter Kimberly Dozier, 39, and two British crew members were traveling with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, which was working its way in a convoy through central Baghdad. Cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and soundman James Brolan, 42, died at the scene of the attack.

The CBS crew was riding through the largely Shiite Muslim, middle-class shopping district of Karada and had stepped down from a Humvee when the car bomb ripped through the vehicles. It was unclear how the bomb was detonated.

The attack came as bloodshed surged across the country Monday. At least 33 people were shot dead or killed in bombings in Baghdad as an insurgency raged and the two major Muslim sects continued to swap rounds of attacks and assassinations.

Targets for bomb attacks included the German Embassy, an Iraqi police station and a parking garage.

The most deadly attack struck a bus full of day laborers on their way to work at a base belonging to the Iranian dissident group Mujahedin Khalq. The blast north of Baghdad killed 11 workers and wounded 16 others. Most of the men were farmers and construction workers on the base; they had mixed religious backgrounds.

Another bomb targeting a patrol of Iraqi police in northern Baghdad killed eight people, most of them students from a nearby school. And Sunday night, two British soldiers died after a British patrol north of the southern city of Basra struck a roadside bomb.

After the Karada attack, Dozier was rushed into surgery at a U.S. military hospital in the Iraqi capital. She was in critical condition, and doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis, a statement from CBS said.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of the network's news and sports divisions, said in a statement. "Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public."

DOJ_NMG_0030139

McManus said in a phone interview that Dozier was undergoing a second operation Monday evening at the military hospital in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, and would probably be airlifted to a U.S. military base in Germany.

"We're hoping and praying for a full recovery," he said. "She is in the best possible hands and is getting medical attention that is probably better than any hospital in America."

Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad rushed to the hospital Monday night to pay their condolences to CBS staffers and to monitor Dozier's condition.

Dozier, who has been reporting in Iraq for three years, had returned to Baghdad this week after taking a break in Maryland to help her parents move, said anchor Bob Schieffer.

"We're just sick to our stomachs about this," he said in an interview. "This is a reminder that this is not a reality show. We see so much of this on television that we tend to look at these things as a movie. But people are getting hurt and killed out there. This brings it home."

Schieffer said he had just spoken to Dozier last week about taking a break from the war zone. "I was encouraging her to take some assignments where there was less risk," he said. "But she was just determined to go back to Baghdad and see the story through. It's just a heartbreaker."

"This is the story that most of all she wanted to cover," McManus agreed. "She couldn't wait to get back. The amazing thing is how many of our reporters really, really have a need and a desire to report from Iraq. It's an amazing tribute to their dedication and their bravery."

The attack suffered by the CBS News crew was an eerie echo of the one sustained by ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt four months ago as they were traveling with Iraqi troops north of Baghdad.

On Monday, Woodruff released a statement saying he was devastated by the news.

"I have met both remarkable journalists Kimberly Dozier and Paul Douglas in so many different countries from Israel to Afghanistan," he said. "Their work and intelligence have always impressed me, whenever our paths have crossed. James Brolan and I were embedded together, working very closely on many difficult stories. During the Iraqi invasion in 2003 we spent more than a month on the road with the Marines and it was often James' wonderful sense of humor that kept us going."

McManus said he had received personal calls and messages from the top executives at the other broadcast networks and cable news channels offering support.

He said he hadn't contemplated whether the network should reevaluate how it was covering Iraq, but added, "I don't think there are any more precautions that any of us could take that we're not taking. The fact of the matter is that it is so, so dangerous and so unprecedented. It's something that every news organization is grappling with trying to cover the story."

Douglas had worked for CBS News for more than a decade in hot spots such as Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Rwanda and Bosnia-Herzegovina. He is survived by his wife of 29 years, Linda; as well as two daughters, Kelly, 29, and Joanne, 26; and three grandchildren, Charlie, 8, Georgia, 4, and Kai, 18 months.

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked for the network for a year, in Iraq and Afghanistan, and was part of the CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club award for its reporting on the Pakistani earthquake.

Brolan's family released a statement calling him "the best dad, the best husband and the best mate to be with in a tight spot out in the field."

After serving in the British army, Brolan ran his own painting and decorating business before getting into TV as a sound recordist, according to his family.

"James had a natural way with people and was always in demand as the person to go with to the world's trouble spots; always putting the locals at ease, winning friends everywhere he went and always putting in his best effort," the statement read.

He is survived by his wife, Geri; and his two children, Sam, 18, and Agatha, 12.

The military had not yet released the name of the U.S. soldier killed in the blast.

With its steady bouts of kidnappings, bombings and shootouts, Iraq has proved a deadly place to practice journalism. Before Monday's attack, the Committee to Protect Journalists had said that at least 69 journalists and 29 support staff members had been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion. The vast majority of the slain reporters have been Iraqi.

DOJ_NMG_0030140

"Reporters who are embedding have always had a very realistic understanding of the dangers," said Army Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a senior spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad. "They cover it every day."

Reporters who have been covering the war in Iraq for the past three years have experienced a whittling away of their ability to gather information as the violence continues to spiral. Many have been forced to rely increasingly on Iraqi colleagues and reporters traveling with the military to get an accurate view of everyday life in Iraq.

"You develop coping strategies; you develop a little cocoon — a place you feel safe," Dozier told CNN in 2004. "I still go out and report the story, but I do it in a way that gives minimum danger to me and to the team of people I'm working with. We're still trying to get the story out. I think if we would pull out, that would be a cop-out."

Before reporting from Iraq, Dozier was the chief Middle East correspondent for New York affiliate WCBS-TV in Jerusalem, covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the war in Iraq.

She also served as London bureau chief and chief European correspondent for CBS Radio News.

Among her peers, she has a reputation for kindness, collegiality and a knack for asking incisive questions.

"Kimberly is a very genuine person who wanted to go out and be with the soldiers and understand what they're doing and feeling," Johnson said. "This is exactly why she chose to do this story today."

2 At CBS News Die In Baghdad On Bloody Day (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 29 — On a day of soaring violence in Baghdad, two Britons working as members of a CBS News television crew were killed on Monday and an American correspondent for the network was critically wounded when a military patrol they were accompanying was hit by a roadside bomb.

The police said at least 31 other people were killed in bombings and shootings in one of the worst days of bloodshed in the capital for weeks.

An American soldier and an Iraqi interpreter were also killed in the attack on a joint United States and Iraqi patrol that killed the two CBS crew members, and six other soldiers were wounded, a statement by the American military command said.

The bombing marked the first time that Western journalists embedded with United States troops have been killed as a direct result of hostile fire since 2003.

CBS News identified the two dead network employees as Paul Douglas, 48, a cameraman, and James Brolan, 42, a soundman. It said that Kimberly Dozier, 39, a correspondent who had worked long periods in CBS's Baghdad bureau in the past three years and had been a correspondent for the network's New York affiliate, sustained serious injuries and underwent emergency surgery at a military hospital in Baghdad. The statement said Ms. Dozier was in critical condition, but that doctors were "cautiously optimistic about her progress."

Later in the day, Ms. Dozier was airlifted by a Black Hawk helicopter to the main American air base in Iraq at Balad, 50 miles north of the capital, a spokesman for the United States Embassy said. Most seriously wounded Americans are airlifted aboard specially equipped transport jets directly from Balad to a military hospital at Landstuhl, Germany, and from there on to hospitals in the United States.

The Iraqi police said the attack that killed the CBS crewmen was only one of a sequence of at least eight bombings which, together with a series of drive-by shootings, killed at least 33 people and wounded dozens of others, a fresh surge in violence that has brought hundreds of deaths in the capital in recent weeks.

The police said 12 Iraqis died and 25 were wounded in a noontime car bombing outside the Abu Hanifa mosque in Adhamiya, a Sunni stronghold in north Baghdad.

They said at least seven others died and 20 were wounded when a bomb planted in a parked minivan exploded at the entrance to an open-air clothes market in Khadhimiya, a mainly Shiite area across the Tigris River from Adhamiya.

At least 25 other people were killed in bombing and shooting attacks elsewhere in the country, including 10 Iraqis working at a camp for members of an exiled Iranian Communist group who died shortly after dawn when a roadside bomb hit their minivan near Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad. Two British soldiers were killed Sunday night when an armored Land Rover hit a roadside bomb in the southern city of Basra. The British deaths brought to nine the number of British troops killed in Iraq this month, one of Britain's highest monthly tolls of the war.

The deaths of the two CBS staffers raised to more than 70 the number of journalists killed in Iraq in the 38 months since the American-led invasion, including at least 47 Iraqis.

Monday's attack marked the second time this year that a United States television network crew embedded with American troops has been hit by a roadside bomb.

On Jan. 29, the co-anchor of the ABC News program "World News Tonight," Bob Woodruff, and a cameraman, Douglas Vogt, were seriously wounded while accompanying a joint United States-Iraqi patrol. ABC has said Mr. Woodruff is still recovering from serious head and neck injuries, and Mr. Vogt has returned to his home in France to convalesce.

The American military command in Baghdad said the CBS journalists were embedded with a unit of the Fourth Infantry Division, responsible for security in wide areas in and around Baghdad, when they were hit by a car bomb.

A CBS spokesman said the journalists were filming for a Memorial Day report on American troops and were outside the armored Humvee in which they were traveling, wearing body armor, when the explosion occurred at about 10:30 a.m. in the middle-class Amina district. The site is about a mile east across the Tigris River from the Green Zone.

The statement by the United States command did not specify whether the blast took the form of a suicide attack or a bomb left in a parked vehicle.

Iraqi employees of The New York Times who visited the scene said the bomb exploded on a busy avenue just south of an intersection known as Basil Building Square, opposite a compound containing two schools. They said the blast left a crater in the road and a carpet of broken glass, and shattered windows in neighboring homes and shops.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, its president, said in a statement issued in New York.

"Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public." He added: "Our deepest sympathy goes out to the families of Paul and James, and we are hoping and praying for a complete recovery by Kimberly."

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, issued a statement condemning the attack.

"These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation," he said. "The terrorists who committed this evil crime have shown themselves for who they are. They do not want the world to see the truth of what is happening in Iraq, where a determined people are fighting for freedom and liberty."

"That story must and will be told," he said.

Ms. Dozier, who was born in Honolulu and educated at Wellesley College in Massachusetts and the University of Virginia, has spent most of the past 15 years working in Europe, the Middle East and Afghanistan for the CBS radio and television networks. For 19 months in 2002 and 2003, she was the chief Middle East correspondent, based in Jerusalem, for WCBS-TV, the network's New York affiliate. She returned to Baghdad only last week for her latest stint covering the war here.

In the past year, the risks of reporting the war have played a part in the steady reduction of the number of Western journalists based in Baghdad. The main hazard has come not from the bombings that have killed more than half of all American troops but from a rash of kidnappings, including the 82 days that Jill Carroll, an American reporter for The Christian Science Monitor, spent as a hostage of an insurgent group before being released in March.

The surge in attacks in Baghdad on Monday came as the new, four-year government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, which took office 10 days ago, continued to struggle with a step American officials here see as crucial to curbing the violence racking the country: filling the three key security posts in his cabinet, at the Ministries of Interior, Defense and National Security. The positions were left vacant when the Maliki cabinet was sworn in on May 20, with key Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish groups unable to agree on nominees.

The fresh momentum American officials have said the government needs in cracking down on the violence is unlikely to be achieved while jockeying over the security posts continues, American officials have said.

DOJ_NMG_0030142

Over the weekend, one American commander said he expected to see the posts filled within two or three days. But an Iraqi official familiar with the negotiations said Monday that Mr. Maliki was considering asking each of the contending groups to submit three names for each vacant post, a process the prime minister's aide said could take another week to complete.

Iraq Is A Deadly Assignment For Journalists (NYT)

By Marc Santora And Bill Carter

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

By some reckonings, the death of two journalists working for CBS News on Monday firmly secured the Iraq war as the deadliest conflict for reporters in modern times.

Since the start of the war in 2003, 71 journalists have been killed in Iraq, a figure that does not even include the more than two dozen members of news media support staff who have also died, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. That number is more than the 63 killed in Vietnam, the 17 killed in Korea, and even the 69 killed in World War II, according to Freedom Forum, a nonpartisan free speech advocacy group.

"It is absolutely striking," said Ann Cooper, the executive director of the Committee to Protect Journalists. While cautioning that the recorded number of journalists killed in past conflicts may be inexact, she said: "We talk to veteran war correspondents who have covered everything going back to Vietnam and through Bosnia. Even those who have seen a number of different wars say they have never seen something like this conflict."

In the latest incident, a veteran cameraman, Paul Douglas, 48, and a soundman, James Brolan, 42, were killed, and a correspondent, Kimberly Dozier, 39, was seriously wounded when the United States Army unit in which they were embedded was attacked.

All three had extensive backgrounds covering wars and each had volunteered to work in Iraq.

They set out Monday morning to do what might seem simple: spend a few hours with soldiers, hoping to give the audience back in America a glimpse of what this holiday was like, far from family barbecues and beach vacations. Ms. Dozier sent a note to her colleagues before leaving, CBS News said, saying she was working on a report about an wounded serviceman who insisted on returning to Iraq.

On this day, their reporting ended less than a mile outside the fortified Green Zone when a car laden with explosives was detonated just as the crew members stepped from their armored vehicle, military officials said.

An American soldier and an Iraqi translator also died, and six more soldiers were wounded in the attack. The condition of the wounded soldiers was not available last night. Ms. Dozier was rushed from the scene to a military hospital in Baghdad, where she underwent an operation, and then was moved to a hospital north of Baghdad for a second operation. When her condition allowed it, she was to be flown to Germany for more care. She suffered extensive wounds to her legs and shrapnel wounds to her head, CBS News reported.

"Terrible is exactly the right word for this day," said Sean McManus, president of CBS News. "The ironic thing of course is that it was Memorial Day. But everyone here is a professional, and we're going to move forward and do our jobs."

Ms. Dozier has reported numerous stories for CBS from Iraq over the past three years. She had been embedded with other units and, like most reporters in Iraq, had endured close calls. "Every time Kimberly has left Iraq she has asked, 'When can I get back in there?' " Mr. McManus said. "She was particularly determined to report on Iraq. This is what really drove her."

Before going to Iraq, Ms. Dozier worked as chief correspondent for WCBS-TV in New York, based in its Middle East bureau in Jerusalem. She has covered news ranging from the hunt for Osama bin Laden to the crises in the Balkans. She was well aware of the risks involved in reporting from Iraq, recalling her frustration with the difficulty of telling the story of ordinary Iraqis during a 2004 interview with CNN.

"The last time I tried to do that — to go to someone's home and sit down with that man and say, 'Are you thinking about leaving Iraq or staying?' — the moment he saw me, blond hair and my two armored vehicles," Ms. Dozier said, "he turned white."

Her colleagues who were killed were equally experienced.

Mr. Douglas, the cameraman, had worked with CBS since the early 1990's. Based in London, he had traveled to some of the most dangerous countries in the world, including Afghanistan, Pakistan, Bosnia and Rwanda. Big and brawny, he is seen in photos released by CBS smiling and playing the ham, posing with flak jacket on, helmet under his arm and a smirk breaking through his goatee. He left behind a wife, two daughters, three grandchildren and his mother.

Mr. Brolan, a former soldier in the British Army, was a freelancer who, during the course of the past year, worked as a soundman for CBS News in Iraq and Afghanistan. Noted for his quick wit, he once made George Clooney laugh, joking about their physical resemblance during an interview, colleagues at CBS News said. Mr. Brolan was part of the CBS team that won an Overseas Press Club Award in 2006 for its coverage of the earthquake in Pakistan. He had a wife and two teenage children.

CBS, like other major news organizations, has been struggling to cover the war while providing security for its employees, including their Iraqi employees, who often go places Westerners cannot.

Still, it is Iraqi journalists who have been most at risk.

Just this month, three Iraqi reporters were killed in a two-week period, according to Reporters Without Borders. More often than not, no one is ever brought to justice for killing journalists, fostering a climate of impunity, the group said on its Web site.

In addition to those killed, at least 42 journalists have been kidnapped, according to the group.

Even the seeming security of being with the American military carries substantial risk, as it did in January, when the ABC anchorman Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt, a cameraman, suffered severe injuries in a roadside bombing in Iraq.

The death of the CBS journalists was the first time since 2003 that reporters embedded with the American military had died as a direct result of hostile fire.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, the director of the press center for the multinational force in Baghdad, is currently responsible for embedding reporters. He said the military had not changed its policy in any significant way since the start of the war, leaving the final decision to commanders on the ground.

The CBS crew, by all accounts, was wearing the standard protective gear.

"I think Kimberly just saw this as an opportunity to be on the ground with the troops on Memorial Day," he said, "to hear their thoughts, to see what they see."

U.S. Will Reinforce Troops In West Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 29 -- The U.S. military said Monday it was deploying the main reserve fighting force for Iraq, a full 3,500-member armored brigade, as emergency reinforcements for the embattled western province of Anbar, where a surge of violence linked to the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq has severely damaged efforts to turn Sunni Arab tribal leaders against the insurgency.

The insurgents have assassinated 11 tribal leaders in the Ramadi area since the end of last year, when Sunni sheiks in the city began open cooperation with the U.S. military. That alliance was heralded by U.S. commanders as a sign of a major split between Sunni insurgents and the larger Sunni community of western Iraq.

The insurgent attacks since then have all but frozen the cooperation between Sunni tribal leaders and U.S. forces in Ramadi, local leaders say.

Disclosure of the plan came on a day when insurgent bombings and other attacks killed more than 40 people around the country, including two members of a CBS News team. The team's correspondent, Iraq veteran Kimberly Dozier, was wounded and listed in critical condition. [Details, A9.]

Last week, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad conceded, in answer to a question about Ramadi in an interview with CNN, that parts of Anbar were under insurgent control. Ramadi is the capital of the overwhelmingly Sunni province. The difficulties facing stretched-thin U.S. Marines in Ramadi suggest the continuing obstacles to a reduction of American forces in Iraq.

"We hope to get rid of al-Qaeda, which is a huge burden on the city. Unfortunately, Zarqawi's fist is stronger than the Americans'," said one Sunni sheik, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of insurgent retaliation. He was referring to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, an umbrella group for many of the foreign and local resistance fighters in Iraq. Local Sunni leaders often insist that the most violent insurgent attacks are by foreign fighters, not Iraqi Sunnis.

In Ramadi, "Zarqawi is the one who is in control," the sheik said, speaking to a Washington Post special correspondent in Ramadi. "He kills anyone who goes in and out of the U.S. base. We have stopped meetings with the Americans, because, frankly speaking, we have lost confidence in the U.S. side, as they can't protect us."

Another sheik, Bashir Abdul Qadir al-Kubaisi of the Kubaisat tribe in Ramadi, expressed similar views. "Today, there is no tribal sheik or a citizen who dares to go to the city hall or the U.S. base, because Zarqawi issued a statement ordering his men to kill anyone seen leaving the base or city hall," he said.

"We are very upset. But being upset is better than mourning the death of a sheik or tribal leader," Kubaisi said. "Zarqawi has imposed himself on us. We started thinking of appeasing Zarqawi and his group, because rejecting them means death."

Gen. George W. Casey, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, has called up the 2nd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, the main standby reserve force for the roughly 130,000 American troops in Iraq, Maj. Todd Breasseale, a Marine spokesman in Baghdad, confirmed.

The call-up leaves a Marine Expeditionary Unit, which typically includes one combat infantry battalion and air and logistical support, in Kuwait as the only American reserve in the Iraqi theater, a U.S. Central Command spokesman said.

CNN reported last week that as many as two of the brigade's three battalions were headed to Ramadi. U.S. military officials would not comment then, citing security of any ongoing troop movements.

Breasseale confirmed Monday that the full armored brigade is headed to Anbar, where both U.S. Marines and many local tribal leaders -- particularly in Ramadi -- have appealed for more U.S. troops.

"Enough is never enough" when it comes to commanders on the ground wanting more troops, Breasseale said. "It might be when these guys get into position they might be in a better position to provide the force structure on the ground that would reenergize the sheiks to begin their work."

Although Anbar province is heavily Sunni, many local residents have grown weary of the presence of the foreign fighters who joined the Sunni insurgents. They have tired of the violent control the fighter groups wield over cities and towns, and of the U.S. attacks the insurgents draw.

Scores of local Sunni tribal leaders turned out for a groundbreaking meeting with U.S. Marine officers in Ramadi in November. Robed sheiks and Marine officers in camouflage faced each other in a town hall, ignoring mortar rounds that insurgents lobbed at the meeting, to start talking about the first major, open cooperation between Ramadi's sheiks and U.S. forces.

But when U.S. and Iraqi forces held the first local recruiting drive for local Sunni young men in January, bombs killed more than 60 of the Sunni tribal enlistees and others. The local residents said the bombs were set by Zarqawi's group.

The assassinations of the tribal leaders then mounted, in what was seen as a clear warning to them not to cooperate with U.S. forces. Violence surged in Ramadi in April and May. In many weeks, Marines in Ramadi have accounted for one-third to half of all American combat deaths in Iraq. U.S. forces say scores of insurgents have been killed in the same period; no full tally of the civilian toll is known.

U.S. forces have called in repeated strikes by air and by artillery on the heart of Ramadi. Marines defend a five-block area of downtown that holds the local government, now a sniper's alley where U.S. forces move at a run to elude insurgent guns.

Marines have temporarily suspended new embedding of journalists in Ramadi. Time magazine, U.S. News & World Report and the Associated Press, all with embedded reporters already in Ramadi last week, quoted both officers and the enlisted Marines at sandbag firing positions as saying that Ramadi had to have reinforcements to do more than fight insurgents to a draw around the town hall. Time quoted officers as estimating it would take three brigades, up from one.

Marine officers on the ground have been open for more than a year now about needing more troops in Anbar, whose Sunni population, remoteness and comparative lawlessness have made it a stronghold for the insurgency. Anbar borders Syria, a conduit for some of the weapons, money and fighters.

In Ramadi, people describe themselves as under siege. The fighters are moving to enforce the strictest form of Islam on the city, requiring head scarves for women and banning shorts and jeans for men, residents said.

DOJ_NMG_0030145

Insurgent groups, calling themselves "Promoting Virtue and Banning Vice" regiments, have threatened households that have Internet service and warned that they will monitor rooftops for satellite dishes turned toward European satellites, said Imad Mohammed, a resident.

"Is it possible that the U.S. Marines are able to control only the government buildings, while al-Qaeda is walking freely in the streets and in the buildings with no one to deter it?" Mohammed asked. "Until the Arab fighters start to interfere with the daily, smallest and personal details of our lives?"

Residents say basic services have fallen, with electricity, water and schooling interrupted and the university closed for long periods. The imported Shiite police force, they say, has collapsed, and many doctors, professors and other professionals are fleeing.

"The city has gone back to the 14th century, if not further," said Akram Fadhil, a 40-year-old man with seven children and no job.

Rumors routinely circulate of a Fallujah-style clearing operation in Ramadi. Residents say they both hope for it and fear it. The November 2004 operation in Fallujah, a largely Sunni Arab city about 35 miles west of Baghdad, involved a major deployment of troops and sometimes intense fighting with insurgents.

"The city has become an unburnable hell," said Abdul Salam Ahmed al-Rawi, owner of a now-shuttered ice cream shop in Ramadi.

"We hope this will end soon, and that Americans will clean the city," Rawi said early last week. "But first they have to change the troops here now, and bring in more, better troops, just like a year and a half ago in Fallujah."

"For I expect if these troops were given the orders to launch a military campaign, many civilians will fall," Rawi said. "The Marines in Ramadi now are considering the whole situation as a matter of a challenge, or revenge, because of the daily strikes they get. It makes them put civilians and the al-Qaeda men all in one category."

Number Of Brigades May Fall, But Troops To Stay At 133,000 (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

U.S. troop levels in Iraq will likely stay around the 133,000 mark in the coming months even if an Army brigade or two is cut from the current number of 15 total combat brigades, defense officials say.

The officials said Army Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, may decide he does not need a replacement brigade for one going home. Yet the overall force level will likely stay the same because new training teams are entering the country to embed with units of the Iraq Security Force (ISF).

Gen. Casey is also periodically tapping an Army "call-forward" brigade of about 4,000 soldiers in Kuwait for periodic duty in Iraq, most recently in Baghdad. Such moves, when coupled with the influx of trainers, also increases the overall force level.

Still, Pentagon planners hope to see the actual combat brigade numbers decrease from 15 in the coming months. Even though the force level would remain the same, such a trade-off means fewer American troops are in direct combat and more are in the training mission.

"The broad message is the numbers are going to fluctuate even if the brigade numbers come down," one senior official said. "Brigades will likely continue to come down, but it won't mean all the numbers will come down. The bottom line is fewer brigades means less direct combat for American troops."

The 15 combat brigades are down from 20 during Iraq's elections last year, and about 6,000 U.S. military personnel embedded with Iraqi units.

The big question is whether Gen. Casey sometime this summer will recommend to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and President Bush a larger troop reduction, which could begin this fall. Officials said Gen. Casey had not made that recommendation as of last weekend.

The command has been waiting for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to name a unity government before recommending any drawdowns. That task is now nearly completed. But the new government is not yet fully able to deal with the security issues because the key posts of defense and interior ministries remain vacant.

Gen. Casey's planning staff constantly reviews force levels. They look at the timetable for when Army and Marine units are due to leave to see whether that is an appropriate time to replace it.

"Casey is mindful of when units are supposed to rotate in," said the official. The source said Gen. Casey might conclude this summer that "I don't think we need to send a replacement in right away."

That's just what happened in April, when the general decided to put on hold a brigade in Germany that was preparing to come to Iraq.

The withdrawal plan is contingent on the 260,000-strong ISF taking over more counterinsurgency missions.

A new test awaits the emerging force: the restive town of Ramadi in Anbar province, which is not fully in control of the coalition and is becoming a new safe haven for terrorists.

The U.S. command has decided it will be the ISF, not U.S. forces, who will lead a campaign to retake the city.

"It isn't a situation that we can resolve. ... The Iraqis have got to take the lead in solving this one," said Brig. Gen. Carter Ham, the Pentagon's deputy director for regional operations.

U.S. Lawmakers Urge Iraqis To Agree On Key Security Posts (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, May 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Democratic and Republican legislators urged the nascent Iraqi government to reach agreement on key security posts and respect human rights Monday as they made a Memorial Day visit to U.S. troops in Baghdad.

A bipartisan delegation including Rep. Robin Hayes, R-N.C., had lunch with troops at the U.S. Embassy in the heavily fortified Green Zone before a planned meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, said the goal was "to ensure a strong, independent and sovereign Iraq that can stand on its own two feet and protect its people."

"It is very important for the two remaining ministries to be appointed. That will make a very important statement to the American people," she added.

Iraq's parliament debated the deteriorating security situation in the capital and some of its outlying provinces, but failed to set up a commission to deal with the problem because of al-Maliki's failure to appoint ministers of defense and interior.

Hayes, whose district includes Fort Bragg, home of the Army's Special Operations Command, said he would encourage the prime minister to promote unity among the country's myriad religious and ethnic groups.

"This is an Iraqi government ... everyone would like for the process to happen immediately and we certainly want them to be successful. You can't rush the process too quickly," he said. "The new government promoting unity ... is how security will be established."

The legislators also stressed the importance of respecting human rights amid a wave of sectarian killings after the February bombing of a Shiite shrine.

"They lived under a totalitarian regime for many years ... and any government that is formed here, if it is going to succeed, they're going to have to respect all Iraqis," Republican Rep. Jeff Miller of Florida.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., welcomed an investigation into allegations that Marines shot and killed unarmed civilians in the western city of Haditha after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine.

"We are continuing to watch the investigation unfold," she said. "I think that is a big difference with the U.S. and most of the coalition forces is that we do thorough investigations and if somebody is found guilty of a violation that they are held accountable."

The delegation traveled to Iraq after visiting a training center for Iraqi forces in Amman, Jordan. They also met with Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, as well as the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Anti-U.S. Rioting Erupts In Kabul; At Least 14 Dead (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030147

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 29 — A deadly traffic accident caused by a United States military convoy quickly touched off a full-blown antiAmerican riot on Monday that raged across much of the Afghan capital, leaving at least 14 people dead and scores injured.

Witnesses said American soldiers fired on Afghans throwing stones at them after the crash, though the United States military said only that warning shots had been fired in the air.

But the crash tapped into a latent resentment of the American military presence here, and violence radiated quickly through the city as rumors circulated that the crash might have been deliberate. Gunfire rang out as Afghan police officers and army soldiers tried to contain rioters who rampaged through the streets for about six hours, burning and looting a dozen offices, cars and police posts. By the end of the day at least 14 people were dead and more than 90 injured, hospital officials said. It was the bloodiest day in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in late 2001.

The Interior Ministry announced a nighttime curfew for the city for the first time in four years, from 10 p.m. until 4 a.m., and President Hamid Karzai called for calm on national television. "This country has been destroyed for years by rioters," he said, "and they are using this traffic incident as an excuse."

The speed and magnitude of the unrest was such that hundreds of police officers and soldiers struggled to contain the violence. The Afghan government and the American military authority issued statements promising full investigations of the accident.

It became clear the American military and the Afghan police and army had used their weapons to try to disperse the crowds. Scores of people were treated in hospitals for gunshot wounds.

A 7-year-old boy was among the dead, and two more schoolchildren were badly wounded, said Dr. Amin, the duty doctor at Khair Khana Hospital in the northern part of Kabul, who like many Afghans uses only one name. Four people died at the hospital, he said, and 60 wounded people were given first aid before being transferred to other hospitals.

Although the sudden explosion of violence may have been a reaction to the five deaths in the crash, it is a sign that Afghans are losing patience with the government and the foreign military presence in Afghanistan, residents said.

Ali Seraj, a businessman and a descendant of the Afghan royal family, contended that the American military showed a careless attitude toward human life that was becoming a growing problem, whether it was the bombing of villages in counterinsurgency activities in southern Afghanistan or car accidents in the capital.

"This type of attitude has created a great deal of mistrust and hatred," he said.

Just last week, President Karzai ordered an investigation of an American airstrike on a village near Kandahar in the south that killed at least 35 civilians. In another episode, the United States military said last month that it would investigate the killings of seven members of a family in an airstrike in Kunar Province in the east during an operation against insurgents.

On Monday, clashes began early in the morning when a truck leading an American military convoy smashed into 12 cars in rush-hour traffic as it went down a long hill from the Khair Khana pass just north of Kabul. Five civilians were killed and more injured in the multiple crash, a statement from Mr. Karzai's office said.

The United States military said in a statement, "A large cargo truck apparently experienced a mechanical failure." The statement continued, "This was a tragic incident, and we deeply regret any deaths or injuries resulting from this incident."

An angry crowd gathered and began stoning the American convoy, and the Afghan police when they arrived. "There are indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd," the United States military statement said. "We will determine the facts regarding the incident and cooperate fully with Afghan authorities."

Demonstrators and townspeople said the American troops had fired into the crowd as people gathered and started throwing stones.

One demonstrator, called Ahmadullah, was still shouting, "Death to Karzai!" and "Death to America!" hours after the initial event.

Demonstrators and townspeople also asserted that the American truck driver had deliberately rammed vehicles as he led the convoy from Bagram Air Base through outlying villages and then into the city. "The Americans came all the way from Bagram to Kabul and killed about 20 people along the way," said Fraidoon, a youth who was among the demonstrators.

He and other bystanders said up to a dozen demonstrators had been shot by guards as they tried to break into a British security company's compound in a downtown area.

Other protesters tried to reach the United States Embassy across town but were prevented by armed blockades of Afghan police officers and soldiers. Others attacked buildings in the commercial center of the city, and some marched on Parliament in the city's southwest, attacking a television company and pizzeria nearby.

By late afternoon the crowds had dispersed, leaving people to count the casualties and put out fires. The offices of the aid organization CARE International and the French nongovernmental organization known by the acronym Acted, a pizzeria, a Chinese guesthouse and a post office were among the buildings that were gutted by fire and ransacked.

Ground-floor windows of the newly opened Serena Hotel, Kabul's first five-star hotel, were smashed, and traffic police officers sat outside burnt roadside police posts. NATO troops evacuated diplomats and staff members from a European Commission compound downtown.

Mr. Karzai blamed opportunists and rioters for the violence. "Wherever you face these elements, do not let them destroy our home once again," he said.

In a sign of the political implications the event has for the government, the president promised to investigate the circumstances of the crash and to see that the Americans involved were punished if found to be guilty. He added that he had received a visit Monday afternoon from the United States ambassador, who had expressed his "deep regrets."

The demonstrators — overwhelmingly young men, even schoolchildren, carrying sticks and stones — were angry at the reports of deaths, but some also expressed frustration with the government, the police and the generally poor standard of living.

"Most of the demonstrators are people who have lost their jobs, and the government cannot provide the people with the basic necessities," said Mukhtar Ziayee, 33, a real estate salesman. "The people are disappointed."

But others were armed and intent on violence and robbery, residents said. Mohammed Arif Safajoy, the owner of the pizzeria that was attacked, estimated the rioters had done $50,000 damage there.

"This was just a demonstration in name," he said. "They were looters, these people who came to my restaurant." Among them were students from a nearby high school, and they carried off electric fans, dishes and antique ornaments, he said.

Riots Breach Kabul 'Island' (CSM)

By Rachel Morarjee

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Hundreds of demonstrators rampaged through the Afghan capital Monday, torching foreign aid agencies and looting businesses in a wave of violence that killed at least 14 people and wounded another 142.

The riots brought the unrest, which has racked southern Afghanistan in recent months, within the gates of Kabul - hitherto seen as an island of stability.

The protest was sparked early Monday when a US military convoy was involved in a traffic accident with a cargo truck that had experienced a mechanical failure. The resulting 12-car pileup killed at least one person, the US military said in a statement. US soldiers fired warning shots over the top of the crowd that had gathered around the accident. However, it remains unclear whether the five people who were killed at the scene were shot by the US military or by Afghan police who arrived to control the crowds.

A survey of the city's hospitals found that at least 11 more people were killed over the course of the day's rioting, which caused millions of dollars of damage and left a trail of destruction along the route the protesters traveled.

With violence in southern Afghanistan at its worst levels since the fall of the Taliban, the Kabul riots reflect a growing nationwide resentment about the foreign military presence in the country and the glacial pace of reconstruction, say analysts and residents.

"There is a large reservoir of discontent and people are now just looking for a reason to vent their rage," says a Western diplomat who requested anonymity.

Demonstrators set the offices of CARE and other foreign aid agencies ablaze, but also torched a Chinese brothel and Afghan businesses as the demonstrations escalated into looting.

DOJ_NMG_0030149

"Many people hate the NGOs [nongovernmental organizations] because they see all this money coming into the country and they have not been able to get jobs. They were waiting for a day like today," says Ehsan, an Afghan security officer.

The road accident Monday morning follows a bloody two weeks of fighting around the country that has left nearly 400 people dead. Around 30 civiliarns were killed in an airstrike in southern Afghanistan last week during a battle with the Taliban, stoking public resentment already inflamed by the way Coalition forces drive around the country.

"The US use force in the street with their cars. When Americans are in a hurry they cut people off and they don't care how they drive. We all have to wait in line behind them," says an Afghan UN employee who asked to remain anonymous. Coalition forces often move quickly as a safety precaution.

It remains unclear whether the riots were orchestrated by Islamic militants or were a spontaneous eruption of unrest.

"There was organization behind the demonstrations. They have literally been biding their time and waiting for a catalyst from Coalition forces," says a Western security source, who added that demonstrators were carrying maps with a marching route already marked. The protesters started in the north of Kabul, went through the center of the city, passed by the major hotels, the US Embassy, and the main NATO base, and ended up in the western part of the city. There were other spontaneous demonstrations around the capital.

However, diplomats and many eyewitnesses said the demonstrations have been used by criminals as a window of opportunity for looting and theft.

"Those people on the outskirts of Kabul have always been bandits and they are still thieves. They were waiting for a chance to take stuff from houses," says Rauf, a shopkeeper along the protesters' route who goes by one name.

As the demonstrations subsided, police resumed patrols but were hassling any groups of men they saw standing in the open, punching people with no explanation and shoving them into cars. Questions will now be asked about why the police were unable to contain the riots and protect businesses and aid agencies. The riots lasted a full eight hours.

Kabul Riot Targets Aid Agencies (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

About 1,000 demonstrators rampaged through the Afghan capital on Monday, setting alight the offices of foreign aid agencies and looting businesses in a wave of violence that killed at least 16 people and injured another 142.

The unrest was the worst to sweep through Kabul since 2001 and reflects growing resentment towards the foreign military presence in the country and the slow pace of reconstruction. The US has 23,000 troops and Nato a force of about 9,000 in Afghanistan.

The protest was triggered by a collision between a US military convoy and a cargo truck that caused a 12-car pile-up, the US military said in a statement.

A crowd quickly swelled around the accident in the northern Shomali district of Kabul and turned hostile, surrounding the US vehicles.

Shots were then fired either by the US military or by Afghan police who had arrived on the scene.

“There are indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd,” Colonel Thomas Collins, US military spokesman, said, adding that an investigation had begun.

Five people were killed during the accident and the shooting which followed, said a statement from the Afghan presidency.

A survey of Kabul’s hospitals found that at least 11 more people were killed during the day’s rioting. Protesters left a trail of destruction, burning down almost every police guard post they came across. Demonstrators set the offices of CARE and other foreign aid agencies ablaze, and also set civilian businesses on fire.

A group of European Union diplomats was escorted to safety by British Royal Marines after they had requested evacuation from their compound in central Kabul.

The main protest, composed mostly of young men, spawned smaller riots at other locations across the capital. “There is a large reservoir of discontent and people are now just looking for a reason to vent their rage,” said one western diplomat.

DOJ_NMG_0030150

The road accident followed an air strike by the US during a battle with the Taliban in southern Afghanistan last week, in which about 30 civilians were killed.

Opinion remains divided over whether the disturbance was orchestrated by Islamic militants or was a spontaneous eruption.

“The riots were organised,” said a western security source working with Afghan police. “They have been waiting for a catalyst from the coalition forces and biding their time.”

He added that he had seen demonstrators carrying maps with a route drawn out. “They are after martyrdom. They are calling the people who got killed in the accident martyrs,” he said.

However, diplomats and eyewitnesses said the demonstrations had been used by criminals as an opportunity for looting and theft.

“They were thieves. They were waiting for a small opportunity to steal and loot from the houses,” said Jan Ali, a 50-year-old shopkeeper in downtown Kabul.

As the streets of Kabul grew calmer, police started to resume control and were harassing groups of men standing in the open.

An Afghan reporter said: “Soldiers are picking up groups of people in the street, punching people with no explanation and shoving them in cars.”

Traffic Accident Sparks Kabul Riots (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Violent anti-foreigner protests raged across the capital yesterday after a U.S. military truck crashed into traffic, touching off the worst rioting since the Taliban's ouster in 2001. At least eight persons died and 107 were injured before Kabul's streets calmed.

Chanting "Death to America," rioters stoned the U.S. convoy involved in the accident, then headed to the center of town, ransacking offices of international aid groups and searching for foreigners in a display of rising resentment over civilian deaths in the war against insurgents.

Gunfire, at times intense, rang out across Kabul as hundreds of young men looted shops and set fire to police cars and station houses. Some people said U.S. and Afghan troops fired on the crowds.

The U.S.-backed Afghan government decreed a nighttime curfew, and the city quieted before sunset. Yousuf Stanizai, an Interior Ministry spokesman, warned that anyone found outside between 10 p.m and 4 a.m. would suffer "serious measures."

President Hamid Karzai went on television yesterday to decry the outbursts, branding the rioters as troublemakers who should be resisted and linking their violence to the long years of conflict that wrecked Afghanistan.

"We will recognize as the enemy of Afghanistan these people who do these things," Mr. Karzai said. "You should stand up against these agitators and not let them to destroy our country again."

Patience with the 23,000 U.S. soldiers and other foreign troops in Afghanistan is fraying amid recent civilian deaths, including at least 16 persons killed by an air strike targeting Taliban fighters in a village last week.

The civilian deaths have come during some of the fiercest fighting since a U.S.-led coalition drove the Taliban religious militia from power at the end of 2001, after the regime refused to hand over terror leader Osama bin Laden and close al Qaeda camps after the September 11 attacks.

Much of the bloodshed is in the south, where officials reported a battle yesterday killed six militants and wounded five Canadian soldiers. Elsewhere, warplanes of the U.S.-led coalition bombed a suspected Taliban meeting late Sunday and dozens of militants were reported killed, Afghan authorities said.

Although most Afghans support the presence of foreign troops to stabilize a country devastated by a quarter century of war and civil conflict, many also harbor resentment at the outsiders.

DOJ_NMG_0030151

Those feelings have surfaced with increasing regularity in the past year, during violent protests over accusations that the Koran was desecrated at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the publication in European newspapers of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad.

"We don't want Americans in our country. They don't care about poor people. They killed innocent people today, and this is not the first time," said Abdul Shakoor, a 28-year-old who joined in the protests after yesterday's traffic accident. "They do it all the time, and in the end, they say it was a mistake. It's not acceptable to us anymore."

The U.S. military expressed regret for the crash, which it said occurred when a mechanical malfunction sent a large cargo truck careening into about a dozen vehicles at an intersection. The military was investigating the incident.

The U.S.-led coalition said at least one person was killed and six injured in the crash, while Afghan authorities gave higher but differing tolls. A statement from Mr. Karzai's office said five died in the accident. Police said three were killed and 16 were injured.

"This was a tragic incident, and we deeply regret any deaths or injuries resulting from this incident," a U.S. military spokesman, Col. Thomas Collins, said.

Kabul Police Chief Sher Shah Usafi said another person was killed when U.S. troops fired into a crowd of stone-throwing protesters soon after the crash. U.S. military officials said they couldn't confirm that.

Abdullah Fahim, a Health Ministry spokesman, said eight bodies were delivered to hospitals in Kabul and 107 Afghans were treated for injuries. He had no details on how the casualties occurred, and it wasn't clear whether the toll included people from the traffic accident.

General: Desertions Plague Afghan Army (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, May 29, 2006

Desertions from Afghanistan's U.S.-allied army have dropped sharply, but more than 10 percent of the troops still go AWOL, a U.S. general said Monday.

Maj. Gen. Robert Durbin, who heads the effort to train Afghan soldiers and police, said a focus on replacing unfit commanders has cut desertion rates from their peak a few months ago, when almost a quarter of all Afghan troops absconded for varying periods.

"Where you have higher AWOL rates is where you have weaker leaders," Durbin told The Associated Press during a visit to Dubai. "We're trying to trade out those weaker leaders."

More than 2,500 Afghan soldiers are still absent without leave. The army has a total of 35,000 forces, including those in basic training.

In January, a top-level committee headed by Afghan Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak began enforcing a plan to cut desertions by replacing commanders whose units suffered high AWOL rates and by improving food and living conditions.

U.S. and Afghan officials have said soldiers desert for several reasons, including a reluctance to fight alongside foreigners against countrymen and a need to earn money for families in remote villages.

The desertion rate dropped from as high as 25 percent in January to about 13 percent now, Durbin said. The goal, he said, is to cut desertions to below 10 percent.

"Perhaps that is alarming by international standards," said Durbin, 52, of Connellsville, Pa.

But, he said, Afghan fighters traditionally have joined militias that permitted long periods of leave. Many return after unexplained disappearances, and those who do not are scrubbed from active-duty rosters.

Durbin compared the concept to American militiamen who returned home at harvest time during the Revolutionary War.

"That behavior wasn't looked down upon," Durbin said. "But that's different from what you have in a professional force."

Afghan army recruiters employing pressure tactics — including reporting deserters to religious and community leaders — have persuaded 1,120 deserters to return to their bases, Durbin said.

The U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, said last week during a visit near Kabul that the Afghan army had two tasks.

DOJ_NMG_0030152

"One is the fight. The second is to be an enduring symbol for the people of Afghanistan of national unity," he said.

But that army will require U.S. and NATO support for years to come, said Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"The numbers still remain very, very low relative to the size of the country and size of the mission," Cordesman said. "They're simply too small to deal with Afghanistan's security problems."

Durbin, who took command of the training mission in December, said Afghan government troops were taking far fewer casualties than their adversaries — former Taliban militias and opium traffickers — in heavy fighting in the south.

More than 350 people, mostly anti-government rebels, have died in less than two weeks of heavy fighting, according to Afghan and coalition figures. U.S. airstrikes have killed many of them. A May 21 airstrike killed 16 civilians, U.S. and Afghan figures show.

Durbin said the heavy fighting in the south is related to Afghan security forces' efforts to assert control in a region outside the government's orbit.

"In my mind it's a sign of progress but, unfortunately, it will result in casualties on both sides," Durbin said.

Neo-cons Question Bush's Democratisation Strategy (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

President George W. Bush has likened the "war on terrorism" to the cold war against communism.

Addressing military cadets graduating from West Point, Mr Bush reaffirmed at the weekend that the US "will not rest until the promise of liberty reaches every people in every nation".

But as the US struggles to assert itself on the international stage, the president's most radical supporters now dismiss this as mere rhetoric, and traditional conservatives are questioning the wisdom of a democratisation strategy that has brought unpleasant consequences in the Middle East.

Administration officials speak privately of a sense of fatigue over the worsening crisis in Iraq that has drained energy from other important policy issues. Senior officials are leaving – not so unusual in a second term, but still giving the sense of a sinking ship run in some quarters by relatively inexperienced crew.

Neo-conservative commentators at the American Enterprise Institute wrote last week what amounted to an obituary of the Bush freedom doctrine.

"Bush killed his own doctrine," they said, describing the final blow as the resumption of diplomatic relations with Libya. This betrayal of Libyan democracy activists, they said, came after the US watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the "Cedar Revolution" in Lebanon, abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents and started considering a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea.

The neo-conservatives offered no explanation for desertion of the doctrine, other than a desire to make quick but transitory short-term gains. "The president continues to believe his own preaching, but his administration has become incapable of making the hard choices those beliefs require," they wrote.

But the ranks of the neo-conservatives are also being depleted. In his new book, America at the Crossroads, Francis Fukuyama, perhaps the movement's most outstanding intellectual force, confirms his defection from the brand concepts of "pre-emption, regime change, unilateralism and benevolent hegemony as put into practice by the Bush administration".

"It seems to me better to abandon the label and articulate an altogether distinct foreign policy position," he writes.

Advisers to the White House say it would be premature, however, to write off the doctrine of pre-emption, which was restated in the National Security Strategy released in March. But on Iran, for example, they believe the Bush administration is moving towards a cold war-style strategy of containment and deterrence with as broad an international coalition as possible.

Graham Fuller, former diplomat and intelligence officer, suggests the US is suffering from "strategic fatigue" brought on by "imperial over-reach".

DOJ_NMG_0030153

"The administration's bark is minimised, and much of the bite seems gone," he writes in the Nixon Center's National Interest journal. "Has superpower fatigue set in? Clearly so, to judge by the administration's own dwindling energy and its sober acknowledgment that changing the face of the world is a lot tougher than it had hoped."

Short-term economic costs of the empire have been bearable, says Mr Fuller, but long-term indicators show it is not sustainable – massive domestic debt, growing trade imbalances, an extraordinary gap in wealth between rich and poor Americans, the growing outsourcing of jobs.

More immediately, the unprecedented unilateral character of the US exercise of global power has proved its undoing.

Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, has tried to redress this in Mr Bush's second term, but key allies – Britain's Tony Blair, for example – are also suffering from weakened credibility.

In contrast, Russia, which Mr Bush saw as a declining power when he came to office in 2001, is asserting itself on the international stage. So is China.

Neither wants to declare itself explicitly at odds with the US, but they share a common agenda and ability to stymie Washington's will. This is seen in their policies towards Iran, North Korea, Syria, the new Palestinian government led by Hamas, and Venezuela.

"In the last few years, diverse countries have deployed a multiplicity of strategies and tactics designed to weaken, divert, complicate, limit, delay or block the Bush agenda through a death by a thousand cuts," says Mr Fuller.

Even some traditional Republicans are challenging the concept that the global "war on terror" is the paramount issue for generations to come.

Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate's powerful foreign relations committee, suggested that "there are a good many who would feel that the possibilities for devastation of countries, including our own, may come much more from our myopia in terms of energy policy than our ability to track down the last of the al-Qaeda cells".

Robert Jervis, professor of international politics at Columbia University, argues in the Washington Quarterly that the US system does not have the commitment to sustain the prolonged efforts required by Mr Bush's "transformationalist" agenda.www.ft.com/us

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy's Lawyer Says Lay Strategy Was Wrong (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Convicted former Enron chief Kenneth Lay was a "dream client" hobbled by a fundamentally flawed approach to his defense, says one lawyer who knows how to defend top executives from criminal charges.

"Ken Lay would have been a dream client," says Donald Watkins, the Alabama lawyer and businessman who last year engineered the acquittal of former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion accounting fraud.

Months ago, before prosecutors from the Enron Task Force had even finished presenting their case against Lay and his co-defendant Jeff Skilling, Watkins predicted the two men were going down. Last Thursday, a Houston jury found Lay and Skilling guilty on multiple charges.

"There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest," Watkins told USA TODAY for a story published March 7. "In this contest, these guys have lost."

DOJ_NMG_0030154

In an interview following the Enron trial, Watkins called Lay's strategy wrong from the start because the former Enron CEO began his defense by hiring a team of big-name trial lawyers. What Lay needed first, Watkins says, was a strategist with a broader view of what was needed to keep such a high-profile defendant out of prison.

"Lawyers are technicians," Watkins says. "They're like painters, plumbers and sheet-rockers."

In the Scrushy case, Watkins' strategy was to attack and harass the government at every turn, while building up Scrushy's stature as a civic and religious leader in Birmingham, Ala.

For an entire year leading up to the HealthSouth trial, Scrushy hosted a religious TV show each morning on a local Birmingham station, bringing in a variety of local ministers to discuss the Bible.

Scrushy's media campaign was so powerful that the U.S. attorney complained to the judge about it. "The government tried to get a gag order against us," Watkins said. "The U.S. government said it could not get a fair trial."

In Lay's case, when it became clear that he was the target of a criminal investigation, he didn't launch a massive public relations campaign. Instead, he adopted the posture that most lawyers recommend: silence. After Enron collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001, and Lay was forced out of his job a month later, the former CEO clammed up, asserting his Fifth Amendment right to keep silent at a congressional hearing, and circling the wagons with his legal team.

For Lay, whose civic and charitable contributions to the Houston community dwarfed Scrushy's good deeds in Birmingham, the early silence was a blown opportunity, Watkins says.

"The first trial is always in the court of public opinion, and it comes down to community support and good will. If you've been a pillar of the community for decades, you've got to energize that."

Once you've set the overall strategy for fighting the government, Watkins says, then you can prepare for the trial. That's when you hire lawyers, he says.

In Scrushy's case, Watkins wanted two attorneys with different skill sets. He brought a former prosecutor, Art Leach, on board, to serve as the "designated objector" to everything the government tried to do.

Then, just three months before the HealthSouth trial began, Watkins hired Jim Parkman, a country lawyer whose previous clients were much more likely to be those accused of being drunken drivers and petty thieves than prominent businessmen. Watkins says he wanted someone who could "connect" with jurors.

Finally, Watkins says, Lay should not have testified. "You never, ever put the CEO on the witness stand," Watkins says.

"When you do that, you're leaving it to him to save himself. That telegraphs that everything you have done has failed."

Enron Case A Grueling Trial For Its Lawyers (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 29, 2006

With No Key Evidence, Skill Was at a Premium

HOUSTON, May 28 -- The unyielding preparation, the sleepless nights spent in a dingy room far from his wife and four children, whom he visited only twice in six months, all came down to this: a few hours of questions in the case of a lifetime.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston strode briskly into the courtroom with his eyes on a man he had pursued with unusual intensity for more than two years, former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay.

The Southern California prosecutor, who has a compact build and a gleam in his eye, squared his shoulders and steeled himself for a fight. In the hour that followed, including a court break in which he maintained his focus by doing push-ups in his office, Hueston, 42, accused Lay of contacting witnesses during the four-month trial in an effort to "get your story straight."

Hueston's chilly persistence left the once-genial corporate chieftain, who had been expected to flash his charm like a get-out-of-jail card, stammering and angry, drawn for the jury in a few quick strokes as a micromanager who thought he could talk his way out of trouble with a handful of well-placed phone calls. Jurors said that "controlling" attitude stuck in their minds as they found Lay guilty of a half-dozen conspiracy and fraud charges Thursday.

A smiling Hueston appeared before camera crews at an outdoor news conference after jurors handed up their resounding decision, saying that Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, who was also found guilty, had sealed their fates with lie after lie. The following day, Hueston flew home to California and took his children go-karting, leaving behind the sign in his temporary Houston office that urged him: "Play like a champion today" -- a University of Notre Dame invocation.

The trial, the capstone of the government's efforts to hold corporate executives accountable for fraud that occurred while they were in charge, required both sides to be at the top of their games. In a case that featured no smoking-gun documents or "gotcha" moments, the skill of the advocates on both sides took on special importance, said experts who followed the trial.

The single-minded pursuit of Lay and Skilling ended in success for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. But the four-year drive was not without conflicts over strategy and personal style for lawyers on both sides of the monumental effort, one of the most complicated corporate cases in history.

The government team stayed on course largely under the guidance of task force director and Chicago prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz, a marathon runner who turned 39 two days after the verdict. Colleagues call Berkowitz unflappable, and he behaved true to form, even when government projection specialists stumbled and failed to find documents quickly as he cross-examined Skilling. Berkowitz parceled out key witnesses to members of his team without considering his own ego.

He was the man who also made peace among squabbling colleagues and delivered the final -- and, according to jurors, the convincing -- rebuttal argument in a smooth baritone, snapping his fingers for emphasis. Paraphrasing a line from the Jack Nicholson character in the film "A Few Good Men," Berkowitz told the jury that Lay and Skilling resorted to falsehoods because "Enron couldn't handle the truth."

Berkowitz, who pokes fun at his bald spot and rides motorcycles in his spare time, overrode the occasional interpersonal conflicts over resources and speaking roles among the team of nine lawyers, 15 agents, five paralegals and six others. He pushed -- despite opposing views -- to strike a plea deal only weeks before the trial with former Enron accounting chief Richard A. Causey. That helped slash more than a half-dozen witnesses from the case and also deprived Skilling and Lay of a scapegoat to blame if things started to go sour.

The government victory was by no means a sure bet. Skilling's lead defender, Daniel M. Petrocelli, an entertainment lawyer from Century City, Calif., appearing in his first criminal trial, outtalked everyone else on his side of the courtroom, including highly touted and far more experienced advocates hired by Lay, according to lawyers who watched the trial. Petrocelli, 52, emerged as a clear leader of Skilling's defense as he marshaled help from more than a dozen junior lawyers, three law partners and a team of paralegals and support staff, including Skilling's wife Rebecca Carter, his younger brother Mark and his longtime assistant Sherri Sera. A separate unit of three document specialists set up an aluminum table bearing laptop computers directly outside the courtroom and often raced in with papers and opposition research to help the lawyers in the middle of the action.

Surprisingly to Houston's legal community and trial watchers who had mostly underestimated him, Petrocelli's command of the facts equaled his theatrical style, as he rattled off arcane measurements of financial risk and accounting rules without glancing at notes. He left the eight-women, four-men jury smiling -- and left a series of government witnesses withering under his strong-armed attack. Juror Doug Baggett said that during much of the case, he felt like a "Ping-Pong ball," as his opinions vacillated back and forth after incisive questions by the defense team.

A man who keeps his salt-and-pepper hair and his fingernails as carefully manicured as some of his movie-star clients', Petrocelli won praise from hard-bitten U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, who is not known for being a fan of defense lawyers. Government witness Ben F. Glisan Jr., Enron's former treasurer, acknowledged Petrocelli's talent even as the defense lawyer sought to rip apart his testimony. Even jurors who ultimately convicted Skilling on 19 of 28 criminal charges against him praised Petrocelli, who walked out of the courthouse looking ashen and shell-shocked after the verdict. Inside the building, however, elementary school principal Freddy Delgado told reporters that if he ever ran afoul of the law, he would hire Petrocelli, "if I had the money." His fellow jurors erupted with laughter.

Petrocelli's law firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, received a $23 million retainer from Skilling, but the defense lawyer said the defense spent many millions of dollars more, though he would not say how much. He received crucial support from partner M. Randall Oppenheimer, 53, whose most visible courtroom role involved questioning accountants and technical experts but who performed important strategic work behind the scenes. Oppenheimer, a gray-bearded private pilot and the son of a film director who once visited the trial, combined razor-sharp intellect with a mild-mannered, dignified delivery. His understated manner won him respect from the government team and greater leeway from the judge, who coined "the Oppenheimer rule," which allowed lawyers in the long trial to get in "just one more question" after their opponents' objections.

Perhaps the O'Melveny team's greatest accomplishment was keeping in check the mercurial temper of its client. Skilling, 52, followed his lawyers' advice and generally remained cool over eight days on the witness stand, in the face of expectations that his emotions might detonate and come back to hurt him with the jury.

As they maintained control of Skilling, his defense lawyers also successfully cultivated an important alliance with Lay's team, which resisted the temptation to blame Skilling for Enron's misfortunes. That O'Melveny picked up the tab for experts and other pricey legal bills likely helped preserve goodwill between the defense teams. But it also took no small amount of Petrocelli's persuasion.

If Skilling's legal team rose above expectations, Lay's failed to live up to them. Lead lawyer Michael W. Ramsey, 66, armed with a string of victories in murder and public-corruption cases in his four-decade career, sat on the bench for nearly the entire defense case after doctors implanted stents to open his clogged arteries. But Ramsey, who received $2 million from Lay, had run into trouble even before his health deteriorated.

In his opening statement Jan. 31, Ramsey twice called on securities lawyer and fellow Lay defense lawyer Bruce Collins to confirm facts in the case. The judge took Ramsey to task for asking the government's first witness irrelevant questions, prompting Lay to pull him aside during a courtroom break. And in his cross-examination of former chief financial officer Andrew S. Fastow, Ramsey shouted when Fastow, who has a hearing problem, said he could not understand the lawyer's inquiries. Jurors and spectators flinched at the spectacle. Ramsey later told reporters that he was worried he had had a heart attack during the Fastow episode.

With Ramsey out of the game, the Lay defense was in chaos and eventually settled on appellate lawyer George "Mac" Secrest to lead the questioning of Lay. That decision was made only a few days before Lay's turn on the witness stand, the most important turning point in the trial. Lay, who kept firm control of his legal team, balked when Secrest asked him to talk about his personal finances and other issues, once asking his own lawyer, "Where are we going with this, Mr. Secrest?"

After news reports criticized the performance, Lay's daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a lawyer who sat next to him every day and helped coordinate his defense, told reporters Secrest had done a "fabulous" job. Vittor did not question any witnesses in the trial and instead appeared to serve as a behind-the-scenes advocate for her father, who had amassed $100 million in debt in 2001, the year Enron filed for bankruptcy, and who spent less on his legal defense than Skilling.

It remains unclear whether Ramsey's presence would have helped Lay. During cross-examination, prosecutors used some of Ramsey's negative comments from earlier in the trial about government witnesses against Lay. And there is little doubt that Lay's strong emotions about Hueston, whom he has accused of leading a vendetta against him, would have boiled over when the two men faced off anyway. During closing arguments, Chip B. Lewis, a young, goateed defense lawyer for Lay who could fill a doorway with his solid frame, stood over Hueston and bellowed, "Don't come to Houston, Texas, and lie to us."

In the end, in a contest of will between prosecutors and defendants Skilling and Lay, the jury found the government more believable.

As Berkowitz confronted Skilling with evidence that one of his investments violated Enron's ethics code, Skilling shot back: "What does this have to do with fraud at Enron?"

The prosecutor was ready with a potent answer: "When we started this testimony, we agreed, that the one thing, the most important thing the jury had to rely upon here was your word."

Enron Verdicts Good For Investors (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, May 30, 2006

NEW YORK — The bedrock of free markets — trust, confidence, integrity — that was undermined by the fraud that led to Enron's 2001 collapse, took another step toward rehabilitation with the conviction of the energy company's two former CEOs, Wall Street experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0030157

To be sure, last week's guilty verdicts against disgraced Enron executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling in Houston do not rule out the possibility of future corporate fraud cases, or erase the financial and emotional pain of shareholders and employees hurt by the scandal.

But the convictions did mark a symbolic end to an era of corporate malfeasance that flourished in the aftermath of the 1990s stock market bubble and resulted in many regulatory reforms, such as the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act. More important, it sent a key message to investors: Corporate crooks will pay for their crimes.

The verdicts will "add to investor confidence," says Gary Gensler, former undersecretary of the Treasury who was a senior adviser to Maryland Sen. Paul Sarbanes during drafting of the law. "Too often, investors have reason to believe the market is not fair. Fortunately, this one went the right way."

Many Wall Street watchers say that had Lay and Skilling been acquitted, it would have resulted in huge damage to investors' psyches and reinforced the belief that the system is rigged against the little guy.

"Had it been not guilty, oh, boy, I don't think it would have gone over well," says Henry Herrmann, chief investment officer at Waddell & Reed. "There would have been a public outcry. The markets would probably have gotten beaten up for a day or two."

Instead, the verdict coincided with a nice two-day rally on Wall Street, which helped halt a skid that began May 10 and knocked stock prices down across the board. The Dow Jones industrials gained a combined 161 points Thursday and Friday, finishing up 1.2% for the week at 11,279.

"The markets were relieved that these two powerful, wealthy corporate leaders wouldn't be able to walk away from such a big scandal," says Michael Chasnoff, CEO of wealth management firm Truepoint Capital. "There was a little bit of relief to know that there is accountability in the financial markets system."

But Chasnoff adds that the psychological boost to the market will be short-lived, as investors refocus their attention on corporate earnings, interest rates and inflation.

Short-Lived Lessons From An Enron Short (WSJ)

By Jim Chanos

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The convictions of Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are less than a week old, and yet conclusions are already being drawn about whether "corporate wrongdoing" is a thing of the past. As someone with more than a passing interest in the Enron story -- I was, to quote Ken Lay's bizarre testimony, one of the "short-sellers that were organized and working together and conspiring together" against Enron -- I feel a need to examine what lessons those of us who slog it out daily in the corporate trenches might gain from Enron's spectacular collapse. I propose to offer the top 10 lessons from Enron that executives, investors and lawyers will soon forget:

1. The Enron scandal shows a need for a standards-based accounting system, rather than a rules-based one.

Wait a minute, you must be saying -- in the wake of Enron, don't we need more accounting rules to cover every possible situation, not some mushy "standards"-based guidelines?

No. It is precisely our "check-the-box" accounting rules that get written for every type of transaction that helped create the financial monster that was Enron. By having armies of clever bankers and lawyers pretzel-twist uneconomic deals into profit sources that conformed to GAAP ("Generally Accepted Accounting Principles," or "Good As Actual Profits" as it's sometimes known), dishonest management teams always hide behind the disclaimer that their accounting has been blessed by their auditors. The problem is, I can think of no major financial fraud in the 25 years I've been on Wall Street that did not have audited financials that conformed to GAAP! Yet reasonable independent auditors and audit committees, using the "standard" of economic common sense, would have unmasked most of the financial chicanery that became apparent at these companies only after their collapse.

2. Mark-to-Market accounting was not the problem at Enron, Mark-to-Model was.

Many casual observers of the Enron saga have pointed to the shortcomings of the Mark-to-Market (MTM) method of accounting that Enron used for its trading assets (i.e., the act of recording the price or value of a security, portfolio or account to reflect its current market value rather than its book value). But MTM is entirely appropriate -- and necessary -- for trading assets held at financial firms. How else would one handle valuation for assets that trade on verifiable exchanges and/or electronic networks?

In Enron's case, however, non-exchange traded assets and illiquid private deals were treated similarly, with today's "prices" derived by computer models that estimated future prices and volatility. The "estimates" in these models were helpfully provided by . . . Enron itself! As any capable financial economist will point out, today's market prices offer only a starting point for estimating future prices and volatility, which are, by definition, unknowable. In an MTM system with no independent source of current prices, when one feeds the "unknowables" of future prices and volatility, and the "probable" of time, into a computer, a "certain" current price is calculated! Neat, huh?

3. Off-balance-sheet deals and entities are "off" the balance sheet for a reason.

One would think that this concept would be pretty obvious, given the LJM, Jedi, Chewco, Deathstar, Jabba the Hut (OK, I made that last one up) monikers used to describe off-balance-sheet entities at Enron. One would be wrong. Yet it is my experience, pre- and post-Enron, that such accounting is used by companies to hide things they don't want investors to see. Pre-Enron saw silliness such as the Coca-Cola/Coca-Cola Enterprises "two-step," while today one can ponder the off-balance-sheet "land banking" that exists at the publicly traded U.S. homebuilders. If a company is determined to keep a significant aspect of its business off its books, investors should simply ask why.

4. Wall Street analysts don't "do" complex.

Isn't that what securities analysts are for, you might ask? Silly reader . . . analysis is for kids! Literally. At most large Wall Street firms, the tedious job of constructing financial models and answering client accounting queries is handled by the junior analyst on the team. It still shocks me today that when meeting with a team of "sell-side" Wall Street analysts from a firm to discuss a particular company, the senior analyst invariably concedes the answer to a complex financial question to a junior analyst working for him.

In a post-Eliot Spitzer world, how can this be? Simple. Senior analysts still spend most of their time on the road making client presentations. That is, of course, if they aren't playing golf with the CEO or organizing the menu at the next investor conference in Las Vegas. The recent attempts by certain companies to discourage hard-hitting independent research will only serve to maintain the chasm between those that "do the numbers" and those with, hopefully, the experience to know what the numbers mean.

5. The rating agency system breaks down when most needed. Rely on it at your own peril.

Time and again, when confronted with negative financial "surprises" by corporate issuers during the last decade, the "independent" ratings agencies fell down on the job. This kept slow-on-the-uptake investors dancing on the decks of numerous financial Titanics, while those heeding other signals (such as the burgeoning market for credit-default derivatives) prepared to man the lifeboats.

Whether it was the hubris of not wanting to precipitate a run on the bank (as if it wasn't happening already!), or the incompetence of one ratings agency analyst admitting to not having read the company's SEC filings, the shortcomings of an analyst-based ratings agency system became apparent in the Enron fiasco. Market-based price-discovery agents, such as short sellers in the equity market and purchasers of credit-default insurance in the bond/derivative markets, supplanted the Big Three ratings agencies as accurate predictors of Enron's financial distress.

6. Beware of, and question, unexpected executive resignations.

This lesson should seem obvious, but cognitive dissonance assures that it isn't. When Jeff Skilling resigned abruptly after six months as Enron's CEO, alarm bells should have been going off on Wall Street, as they were in Houston. But mindful of the still-bountiful fees Enron promised the Street, virtually every analyst covering Enron told his/her clients "all was well"! Didn't anyone find it disconcerting that despite claiming (the still undisclosed) "personal reasons" for his resignation, Mr. Skilling admitted on the front page of this newspaper the next day that if Enron's stock price had stayed up, "I don't think that I would have felt the pressure to leave"?

By asking the right questions, investors in August 2001 (with Enron's stock still at $40) might have been able to deduce that Enron's stock was not just a barometer of its financial health, but was also an actual component (through the investor-guarantee mechanism in the Fastow partnerships) of its health, as this newspaper's reporters would so convincingly point out two months later. Mr. Skilling hid the road map to Enron's future collapse on the front page of The Wall Street Journal, but few noticed.

7. Whistleblowers aren't whistleblowers if they blow their whistles inside the company walls.

Someone should inform Time magazine's Person-of-the-Year Department that writing a "cover-your-behind" memo to your boss about financial irregularities within the firm is not "whistleblowing." Having the guts to risk your job and reputation, by bringing evidence of those irregularities to the proper financial authorities, is. Enough said.

8. Special investigations by corporate boards are almost always a waste of time/money, and often prove highly misleading.

As a corollary to Lesson No. 7, when questions are raised internally about possible financial improprieties, corporate boards often hire counsel to conduct investigations on their behalf. This is done foremost for their own protection ("We investigated once we knew!"), and only incidentally to uncover unpleasant facts that such boards, charged with oversight as a duty, should've known about already. Many boards, in a wonderful example of willful blindness, simply don't want to know. In fact, one well-regarded Washington law firm forensic accounting SWAT team, headed by a former SEC enforcement director, managed to not find much wrong at either Enron or Tyco, despite abundant internal documents at their disposal. Such incompetence is highly rewarded in future corporate assignments. Rely on these reports at your own risk.

9. Character cannot be compartmentalized.

This lesson may be the most important of all. Investors and outside advisors often seem preoccupied with analyzing the formal propriety of specific corporate transactions, and the associated financial accounting. Questionable deals and disclosures are analyzed discretely, and not as part of any disturbing pattern of dubious corporate policies. Yet one had only to read the history of Ken Lay's involvement in the Valhalla energy-trading scandal at Enron in 1987 to detect a harbinger of scandals yet to come. That bad guys have a pattern of dishonest behavior should seem obvious, but it's not.

And, finally, 10: Friends do not let (possibly guilty) friends take the stand in criminal trials.

Let's face it, the Enron trials of Lay and Skilling had it all; greed, arrogance, an incompetent defense strategy (oh, how I wish short sellers had the power that Enron's defense team claimed we have!) and, of course, larger-than-life corporate villains. One would assume the high profile nature of the trial itself might underscore this observer's list of lessons learned from Enron's spectacular collapse. But thankfully, I'm pretty confident that they will be forgotten soon.

Mexico's TV Azteca Owner Seeks To Settle SEC Suit (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Ricardo Salinas Pliego, the billionaire Mexican businessman who for more than a year has parried U.S. Security and Exchange Commission efforts to bring him to court, is seeking to settle what was the first lawsuit brought against an executive of a foreign company under the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law.

Mr. Salinas Pliego and his co-defendant in the case, Pedro Padilla, have presented a proposed settlement with the SEC, according to a statement last night by Mr. Salinas Pliego's flagship television company, TV Azteca SA, of Mexico. The proposed settlement came after discussions with the SEC, which TV Azteca expects will respond to the overture within 90 days, the statement said. Under it, Messrs. Salinas Pliego and Padilla would pay all fines personally, precluding a financial burden to TV Azteca.

SEC officials couldn't be reached to comment. A TV Azteca spokesman declined to disclose details, such as the terms of the settlement.

The SEC filed civil suit against Mr. Salinas Pliego early last year, accusing him and Mr. Padilla of fraud by hiding their role in a debt transaction that netted Mr. Salinas Pliego $109 million at the expense of shareholders in a cellphone company Mr. Salinas Pliego controls. The two have denied doing anything improper. The SEC got involved because Mr. Salinas Pliego's television company, a major stockholder in the cellphone company, traded on the New York Stock Exchange at the time.

At stake for the SEC in the case is its ability to reach across international borders to enforce its rules. Since the lawsuit, Mr. Salinas Pliego has delisted the shares of all of his companies from U.S. exchanges, and swapped dollar debts into pesos, in order to remove himself from SEC jurisdiction. International treaties, and the chaotic bureaucracy of Mexican courts, frustrated many SEC attempts to serve Mr. Salinas Pliego with a summons in the case, which had stagnated.

Mr. Salinas Pliego has much at stake. Like many Mexican businessmen, he is seeking to expand his business into the U.S. and tap the spending power of the increasing U.S. Hispanic middle class. TV Azteca has television stations in 46 major U.S. Hispanic markets -- including Houston, New York, Miami, and has a plan to double its market share to 10% in 18 months. The SEC case puts a wrench in the works. The lawsuit prevented Mr. Salinas Pliego from traveling to the U.S., because he was concerned that he could be forced into court by U.S. Marshals.

The proposed settlement is a turnaround for Mr. Salinas Pliego, who had vowed never to reach a deal with the SEC on the grounds that the U.S. had no jurisdiction over a Mexican. Mr. Salinas Pliego, whose personal fortune is estimated at around $1 billion, controls banks, retail shops and cellphone companies that serve the working class, an often overlooked market. His business practices have earned him a tough reputation. In 2002, he sent armed commandos to occupy a rival television station during a contract dispute.

CRIMINAL LAW:

How The Jefferson Search Put Bush In A Bind (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff, Holly Bailey And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, May 29, 2006

President George W. Bush's intervention in the dispute between Congress and the Justice Department over the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's office infuriated many senior law-enforcement officials. Bush's directive to temporarily remove the documents from FBI custody was an implicit rebuke not just of FBI Director Robert Mueller but of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales—both of whom signed off on the search of Jefferson's office before it took place. "What is he [Bush] saying? His own Justice Department was wrong?" said one senior law-enforcement official who, like other senior officials NEWSWEEK spoke to, asked not to be identified because of the political sensitivity of the case. "People are livid about this." FBI officials say the search was undertaken only after the Louisiana Democrat failed to turn over records subpoenaed by a federal grand jury nine months ago. The bureau was seeking material relating to an African business deal Jefferson allegedly helped promote in exchange for bribes—including $90,000 apparently stuffed in his freezer. Once it became clear Jefferson would not comply—reportedly on Fifth Amendment grounds—federal prosecutors got the green light from Gonzales to seek a search warrant. A lawyer for Jefferson called the search "outrageous" and said his client "has consistently maintained his innocence."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert erupted in fury over the search, demanding that the FBI return the material. "I've never seen Denny Hastert as mad," said a senior Bush aide, declining to be named. Hastert twice complained directly to Bush that the FBI search of a congressman's office was unprecedented and an unconstitutional violation of the separation of powers. When Dick Cheney chief of staff David Addington backed Hastert, tempers flared. DOJ officials floated the idea that Gonzales and Mueller might even resign over the issue. That put Bush in a bind—either to back up his old friend Gonzales or placate a speaker the White House badly needs on immigration reform and other matters. To cool passions, Bush ordered the seized materials transferred to the office of Solicitor General Paul Clement. "The White House was looking to give Hastert some cover," said one administration official, requesting anonymity. The official said Hastert's position was "out of sync" with a public increasingly fed up with corruption. In talking points distributed to GOP House members last week, Hastert and other House leaders conceded the perils of their position. "Is this a smart battle for Congress to fight?" the talking points asked. "Perhaps not. Defending Constitutional principles—particularly those related to institutional balances of power—is often not politically expedient and often results in bad publicity."

Time, May 28, 2006

The battle between the FBI and Congress over documents seized in a raid on the office of Congressman William Jefferson, a Democrat from New Orleans, turned Washington upside down last week. The FBI, which has long been investigating allegations that Jefferson accepted money in exchange for helping businessmen secure deals in Africa, says it had already found $90,000 wrapped in foil in the freezer of Jefferson's apartment and had a videotape of him allegedly accepting $100,000 in bribe money. But when federal agents, who had been trying to get documents from Jefferson for nine months, obtained a warrant and searched his Capitol Hill office, they found an unlikely adversary: House Speaker Dennis Hastert. The Illinois Republican argued that the search violated the separation of powers between the Legislative and Executive branches and demanded that the FBI return the seized documents.

Hastert grew even angrier when ABC News, quoting unnamed federal law-enforcement officials, reported that Hastert was being investigated in another corruption case, involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The Justice Department denied the story, but Hastert, suspicious of the report's timing, accused the FBI of trying to "intimidate" him.

As Hastert led congressional appeals to the White House, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller made clear that they would not comply with any presidential order to return the seized materials--and were willing to risk being fired for their defiance, says a law-enforcement source. So the President instead ordered the FBI to hand over the documents to the Solicitor General's office, which is not involved in the probe. The documents will be sealed for 45 days while Congress and the Administration seek agreement on what prosecutors may view.

Bush's order didn't totally calm a jittery Capitol Hill. Two other corruption investigations by the Justice Department could implicate members of Congress: the Abramoff case and a probe of defense contractors' ties to several lawmakers. The FBI says it's just doing its job. "We go where the evidence takes us," says a senior official. "Why should a Congressman be off limits?"

U.S. News and World Report, May 29, 2006

In case you haven't heard, Washington's been hit by a Category 5 constitutional crisis. No, it's not over domestic eavesdropping or those secret CIA prisons. This one's so big, it's got Democrats embracing Republicans like long-lost cousins and both parties pillorying the White House for--hold on to your hats--infringing on the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches. Heavy stuff. A bit of history: Way back in 1642, King Charles I launched his considerable person upon the House of Commons with the foul purpose of arresting five of its members. Thereupon followed, in right short order, the English Civil War. So impressed by these facts were the framers of our own Constitution (never mind their aggravation over the infernal meddling of George III's colonial governors), they enshrined the separation-of-powers doctrine prominently in the hallowed document.

Well. The instant cause for last week's constitutional kerfuffle was a tad more pedestrian, having to do with a congressman who found a novel use for some Tupperware and several Glad freezer bags. Turns out the things are just dandy for hiding stacks of $100 bills in the deep freeze. Who knew? FBI agents discovered the greenbacks, $90,000 worth, in the icebox of a Louisiana lawmaker named William Jefferson. The constitutional issue arose when the FBI decided to take a peek and see what other things of interest might be lurking in Jefferson's congressional office. That's when, as the saying goes, all hell broke loose.

Folks who should know say the whole constitutional thing is overblown, if not arrant nonsense, but that didn't stop President Bush from entering the fray, ordering the papers taken from Jefferson's office stashed in a neutral safe for 45 days so everyone could cool off. It was that kind of week in Washington, crazy. The president, appearing with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, even admitted to having made a passel of mistakes in Iraq. Not to be outdone, Blair fessed up to some of his own pratfalls there. Neither man, though, said a single thing about Charles I.

Frist Breaks With Others In G.O.P. Over Raid (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030162

WASHINGTON, May 28 — Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, on Sunday defended the raid by federal agents on a Democratic lawmaker's Capitol Hill office, breaking with senior House Republicans who had said the search was unconstitutional.

Mr. Frist, Republican of Tennessee, said agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation had acted appropriately when they searched the office of the lawmaker, Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, as part of a bribery investigation.

The House speaker, Dennis J. Hastert, Republican of Illinois, criticized the raid last week and demanded that the F.B.I. immediately return the materials from Mr. Jefferson's office. Mr. Hastert even issued a rare joint statement with Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, saying that F.B.I. officials had not notified them before the raid and that the search violated the constitutional principle of the separation of powers.

Mr. Frist disagreed, shifting his position from last week when he had expressed concern about the search.

"No, I don't think it abused separation of powers," said Mr. Frist, who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008, during a "Fox News Sunday" appearance. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

Mr. Frist said that "nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," and that federal agents had gone through appropriate procedures to obtain a search warrant for Mr. Jefferson's office.

During the raid on May 20, F.B.I. agents carried away computer records and files as part of the bureau's inquiry into whether Mr. Jefferson accepted bribes in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa.

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert, on Sunday reiterated the House speaker's opposition to the raid.

"Clearly there is a difference between what the Congressional leadership think and what Senator Frist thinks about what is and is not constitutional," Mr. Bonjean said.

After lawmakers angrily denounced the raid last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III; and other senior law enforcement officials told associates that they were prepared to resign if the White House ordered them to turn over the seized evidence.

Instead, President Bush ordered that all the records taken from Mr. Jefferson's office be sealed for 45 days — an effort to ease tensions over what had been developing into a constitutional crisis.

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate, said Sunday that the raid was the first time that the F.B.I. had searched a Congressional office. He said, however, that federal agents in the past had searched a judge's chambers.

"So it appears that there's been some precedent for this," said Mr. Durbin, who also appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Both Mr. Frist and Mr. Durbin said the Senate should begin examining the exact authorities the executive branch has to carry out such searches, to reduce the chances of another constitutional dispute. And Mr. Bonjean said House leaders were working with the Justice Department to determine proper procedures for any future searches.

Some House Republicans have not backed off their opposition to the F.B.I. raid. Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., a Wisconsin Republican who is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said Sunday that Congress must be able to do its job "free of coercion from the executive branch."

"I don't think that it would be right for a House committee to issue a subpoena to the president's office and send the Capitol Police rummaging through files, taking everything, and then deciding what wasn't relevant by themselves and returning it to the president," Mr. Sensenbrenner said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press."

Mr. Sensenbrenner's committee plans to hold a hearing this week about the constitutionality of the F.B.I. search.

Frist Backs Search Of Congressman's Office (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP2, May 30, 2006

In a break with his counterparts in the House, the Senate's leader said Sunday the FBI was within its right to search the office of a congressman under investigation in a bribery case.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said.

Frist, R-Tenn., was responding to the search conducted May 20-21 in the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La. FBI agents carted away computer and other records in their pursuit of evidence that Jefferson accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa.

It was the first time that a warrant had been used to search a lawmaker's office in the history of the Congress.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded with a rare joint statement, protesting that the FBI had not notified them and that the search violated the Constitution's separation of power protections.

Frist said he examined the provision closely and talked the issue over with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Frist said on "Fox News Sunday.

"I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, which plans a hearing Tuesday on the constitutionality of the search, said the FBI overstepped its authority. Rep. James Sensenbrenner compared the search of a congressman's office to a Capitol Police raid of the Oval Office.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Sensenbrenner said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "He cannot use the constitutional immunity of Congress to shield himself from that or any evidence of that. But it is about the ability of the Congress to be able to do its job free of coercion from the executive branch."

Hastert complained directly to President Bush and demanded that the FBI return the materials. Bush struck a compromise Thursday, ordering that the documents be sealed for 45 days until congressional leaders and the Justice Department agree on what to do with them — a move that Frist said he supported "to let things settle down."

Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, said there needs to be "hard look" at whether the FBI violated the Constitution. But he said the FBI has raided judge's chambers before, so there is precedent for crossing branches of government for searches.

He also said he wasn't sure the "speech and debate" protections in Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution were violated, as some of have argued.

That section states that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

"I'm not sure that you can stretch it to apply to this situation," Durbin said. "In the next several weeks, we ought to take a hard look at it. I'm not going to rule it in or out at this moment."

Before Bush's compromise, the showdown last week led the House leaders to threaten budgetary retaliation against the Justice Department, a senior administration official told The Associated Press on Saturday. Justice officials, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, raised the prospect of resigning if the department were asked to return documents that FBI agents took from Jefferson's office.

Frist Defends Raid On Hill Office (WT)

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday broke with the two top House leaders, asserting that the FBI was within its right to search the office of a congressman under investigation in a bribery case.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," the Tennessee Republican said. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

In the overnight hours last weekend, FBI agents seized computer records and other documents from the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. It was the first time in U.S. history that an elected federal official's Capitol Hill office was subject to a warrant.

The FBI filed documents last week asserting that Mr. Jefferson was videotaped accepting money in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa. In a search of the congressman's home, agents found $90,000 in his freezer.

House SpeakerJ. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, a Republican, and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded with a rare joint statement, protesting that the FBI had not notified them and that the search violated the Constitution's separation of power protections.

Mr. Frist said he examined the provision closely and talked the issue over with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Mr. Frist said on "Fox News Sunday."

But the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, which plans a hearing tomorrow on the constitutionality of the search, said yesterday the FBI overstepped its authority. Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. compared the search of a congressman's office to a Capitol Police raid of the Oval Office.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Mr. Sensenbrenner, Wisconsin Republican, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Raiding Capitol Hill (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

With the separation of powers, the Founders created a system with inevitable tension between Congress and the executive. Congress has been the biggest offender in stealing power from the executive in the modern era, but the May 20 FBI raid on the legislative office of William Jefferson (D., La.) seems a case in which the Justice Department has gone overboard, and even been insubordinate.

Both Republican and Democratic leaders in the House have protested, prompting media clucking that Members aren't "above the law." Having spent years trying to get Congress to live by the laws it imposes on the rest of us, we couldn't agree more. However, Congress is uniquely protected in one vital sense -- in its act of legislating, under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution. In the most obvious case, this protects Members as they consider legislation on the House or Senate floor. This also arguably includes papers and other material in Member offices that are related to legislating.

In the case of Mr. Jefferson, Justice clearly had reason to consider a search. The Congressman is suspected of taking bribes, individuals have already pleaded guilty to paying him and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, and a search of his home found $90,000 in his freezer. Mr. Jefferson says he has done nothing wrong, but we doubt he has found the miracle of an icebox that pays interest on deposits.

Yet with all of this evidence in hand, the question is why prosecutors also felt the need to raid Mr. Jefferson's office in the middle of the night -- the first such raid in the history of Congress. They surely knew the raid would prompt embarrassing headlines, and for ambitious prosecutors that motive can never be ruled out. With Congress currently low in opinion polls, Justice officials may also have felt they could indulge in this kind of intimidation. If they really believe Mr. Jefferson is running a criminal enterprise out of his Capitol Hill office, they could always negotiate the parameters of such a search with House leaders.

Justice also hasn't helped its case with its bullying behavior after Speaker Denny Hastert denounced the raid. Someone leaked to ABC News that Mr. Hastert was himself a target of a Justice probe, and while it was quickly and officially denied, this kind of media ambush is typical of prosecutorial payback.

Someone also leaked that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Deputy AG Paul McNulty had threatened to resign if President Bush returned material confiscated in the raid. So here we have someone at Justice trying to intimidate not just the House Speaker but also President Bush. If we were Mr. Bush, we'd have accepted both resignations on those grounds alone.

One of the sillier criticisms is that Mr. Bush is out of line for having intervened in this dispute. He has decided to seal the confiscated materials for 45 days while Justice works out a compromise with House officials. Federal prosecutors work for the President, and if there is ever a case where the White House should intervene it is one that involves a Constitutional clash between the branches. It's revealing that the same media voices that want Congress to limit the President's war powers also want to limit his ability in this case to control federal prosecutors. They seem to want a feeble Presidency.

Another, and related, bad argument is that the FBI raid was kosher because it was approved by a judge. But judicial warrants can never trump core Constitutional powers -- whether they are the rights of Congress under the Speech and Debate Clause, or the executive's ability to conduct warrantless wiretaps against al Qaeda under Presidential war powers. This willingness of modern liberalism to confer vast new authority on the judiciary is itself a violation of the separation of powers. The Founders designed a system in which each branch had to defend its own prerogatives, not one in which some local or district court judge was the final arbiter in such disputes. Congress and the President are ultimately accountable to the voters, while judges are not.

Mr. Bush's sensible decision to seal the Jefferson evidence has had the useful effect of calming this dispute down. If it turns out that Justice has to prosecute its case without evidence obtained from Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office, so be it. Prosecutors have to work around such limitations all the time. Congress's right to legislate without being intimidated by the executive is a core element of the Constitution, and bullying prosecutors shouldn't be allowed to violate it.

Jefferson's Alleged Misdeeds May Strand Louisiana Yet Again (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Days before the official start of this year's hurricane season, an ill wind hit New Orleans. Not another massive storm like the one that devastated the Big Easy nine months ago. This one was no act of Mother Nature. It was man-made.

And the man who made it, federal investigators contend, is Rep. William Jefferson, the Democratic congressman whose New Orleans district was the epicenter of the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina last year.

Jefferson, Louisiana's most prominent black politician, is the target of a federal criminal investigation. Though he has yet to be charged with a crime, the FBI said in an affidavit used to get a warrant to search his office that the eight-term congressman engaged in widespread criminal conduct. The 83-page document accuses Jefferson, among other things, of fraud and attempting to bribe a foreign official.

The G-men claim to have secretly tape recorded and videotaped some of Jefferson's alleged bad acts.

As a member of the House of Representatives' powerful Ways and Means Committee, Jefferson is well positioned to help the mostly black residents of his congressional district, many of whom have been forced out of their homes — and out of New Orleans — by Katrina's floodwaters. But if the FBI's accusations are true, Jefferson spent a lot of time before and after the hurricane struck New Orleans trying to feather his own nest.

The FBI's account

In the affidavit, the FBI recounts how Jefferson was recorded negotiating an increased share of the expected profits of a company he was helping to establish in Nigeria and Ghana.

While scribbling several figures on a piece of paper during a dinner meeting on May 12, 2005, with the woman who controlled the firm, whom the FBI identified only as a "cooperating witness," Jefferson allegedly revealed his criminal intent.

"I make a deal for my children. It wouldn't be me," Jefferson said as he pushed the woman to give a larger share of her Nigerian business venture to Global Energy & Environmental Services, LLC, a firm owned by his children and run by a son-in-law.

All of this convinced a federal judge to give the FBI a warrant to search Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, an extraordinary action that has enraged both congressional Democrats and Republicans. The search, they say, tramples upon the separation of powers doctrine.

Last week, President Bush ordered the Justice Department to seal the documents seized from Jefferson's office for 45 days to give federal lawyers and lawmakers a chance to avoid a constitutional crisis.

Silence, for now

Jefferson has refused to discuss the facts surrounding his case. "There will be an appropriate time and forum when that can be explained and explicated," he said last week at a news conference.

But that's not good enough.

Jefferson is accused of using his elected office for criminal purposes. The FBI said they have videotape of him accepting a $100,000 bribe last July. They said they later found $90,000 of that money hidden in the freezer of his Washington apartment.

Then in September, five days after Katrina hit, Jefferson had the Louisiana National Guard take him through the flooded streets of New Orleans so he could recover some items from his home, which the FBI had searched earlier. Whether this had anything to do with his criminal investigation is unclear.

But this much is certain: Jefferson owes the voters of his district an explanation. And he should speak up before they go to the polls in November to fill the congressional seat he holds. If he chooses to remain silent, then he should quit the race.

The people of Louisiana, especially those in his district, are still reeling from the lingering effects of Katrina. What they need now is a tireless champion. What they have instead is Jefferson, whose effectiveness has been severely damaged by bad judgment and, possibly, criminal conduct.

Senate Leaders Profess Less Outrage On FBI Raid (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, May 29, 2006

Unlike House Officials, Frist and Durbin Say They See No Breach of Constitution in Jefferson Inquiry

After a week of bipartisan outrage over an FBI raid on a congressman's office, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist weighed in yesterday, saying that he was "okay" with the search and saw no constitutional problems with it.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," Frist said of the search of the office of William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who has been accused of bribery.

Frist (R-Tenn.) said on "Fox News Sunday" that he had studied the provision in the Constitution regarding the separation of powers, and consulted with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately when it used a warrant to search the office of a sitting lawmaker for the first time in history.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Frist said. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

Eight days ago, FBI agents angered many members of Congress when they took from Jefferson's office records and a computer as they investigate whether Jefferson illegally took money for brokering business deals in Africa. The raid threw Washington into tumult last week, inflaming congressional leaders on both sides of the aisle, and reportedly prompting Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III to threaten to quit if the documents were returned.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded in a show of unity, jointly protesting that the search was illegal, and complaining that they were not notified before the raid. Hastert complained to President Bush, who weighed in by ordering the Justice Department to seal the materials for 45 days until congressional leaders and the department can agree on the next step.

"I think the president handled it well, because we had tempers flying," Frist said. "We don't need to be doing that. And so the president came in and put a pause . . . to let things settle down."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), assistant minority leader, also took a measured view of the raid, questioning whether the "speech and debate" protections in the Constitution were violated, as critics say. "I'm not sure you can stretch it to apply to this situation," he said. He noted that the action was not without precedent. He said that the FBI has raided the office of a federal judge before, so there is a history of branches of government crossing each other with regard to a search warrant. "In the next several weeks, we ought to take a hard look at it. I'm not going to rule it in or out at this moment."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who called a hearing tomorrow on the constitutionality of the search, said yesterday that the FBI overreached.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Sensenbrenner said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "He cannot use the constitutional immunity of Congress to shield himself from that or any evidence of that. But it is about the ability of the Congress to be able to do its job free of coercion from the executive branch."

Target Of F.B.I. Raid Had A Hard Path To Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Robert Pear

The New York Times, May 29, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 27 — Representative William J. Jefferson has always liked to talk about growing up in an impoverished farm community, picking cotton for $3 a day and hitting the books hard enough to win his ticket out — a scholarship to Harvard Law School.

But even as Mr. Jefferson built a reputation as one of Louisiana's brightest, most effective leaders, a less flattering view began to emerge, one signified by his nickname in political circles, "Dollar Bill."

Early in his career, as a state legislator, he was criticized for enriching his law firm with contracts from state and local agencies. He also ran stores that rented appliances by the month to poor residents, owned dilapidated apartment buildings and was sued by federal regulators over a defaulted loan.

Now, with the Federal Bureau of Investigation raid on his Capitol Hill office on May 20, Mr. Jefferson, a 59-year-old Democrat, is under investigation for possibly turning his efforts to promote trade with Africa into another sideline worth hundreds of thousands of dollars — and has become the central figure in a political drama consuming Washington.

The unprecedented raid has set off a huge institutional showdown, with Republican leaders including J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the speaker of the House, challenging the White House and criticizing the F.B.I.'s actions. Democratic leaders have also stood by the speaker's side.

President Bush has stepped into the fray, ordering the F.B.I. to seal any records it seized and calling for a 45-day cooling-off period to allow time to resolve the crisis.

The raid on Mr. Jefferson's office took place barely a week ago. But in a sense, the questions circling him have long resonances in his career, which was shaped by a remarkable ascent from the deepest poverty and a quest for the comforts his family never had.

In a 95-page affidavit released after the raid, the F.B.I. accused Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term lawmaker, of demanding more than $400,000 in bribes to help iGate Inc., a technology company based in Kentucky, obtain lucrative contracts in Africa. The bureau said it had also videotaped him accepting a suitcase with $100,000 in cash and later found $90,000 of it in his freezer.

Though the details were blacked out, the affidavit also said the F.B.I. had "evidence linking Congressman Jefferson to at least seven other schemes" in which he "sought things of value in return for his performance of official acts."

Mr. Jefferson has vigorously denied wrongdoing and has not been charged with a crime. "I certainly did not sell my office," Mr. Jefferson said in a recent statement. "The government seems inclined to view the facts in the worst possible light, and to characterize events that could be explained, or are exculpatory, in ways that tend to incriminate."

Whether his actions were criminal or not, several people who have long known Mr. Jefferson said he had often seemed driven by a desire to escape his spartan roots.

"There was always a feeling among those who knew him as Dollar Bill that having grown up as poor as he did, his hunger for wealth always burned," said Allan Katz, a New Orleans political consultant.

DOJ_NMG_0030168

Mr. Jefferson, a taciturn man who began his career as a favorite of good-government groups, has built a political empire in New Orleans, winning re-election by wide margins and helping his sister, one of his five daughters and many allies win public offices.

Standing outside a new post office that Mr. Jefferson helped bring to his district, one voter, Joyce F. Smith, said that if the accusations were true, "I'd be very disappointed because he's been a very good congressman."

But many people here have been joking about his "frozen assets" and "cold cash." And Ms. Smith added, it is "hard for me to believe" that he would have stashed legitimate earnings in frozen-food containers and aluminum foil.

Mr. Jefferson was raised, along with eight brothers and sisters, on a small farm in northeast Louisiana, where, he said earlier this year, "our whole life revolved around that cotton field." His father left school after second grade, and his mother attended only through eighth grade.

As a child, Mr. Jefferson was such a good shot, his father once said, that when it came time to bag dinner, "if I wanted one rabbit, I'd give him one shell; and if I needed two rabbits, I'd give him two."

After he graduated from Southern University in Baton Rouge in 1969, Mr. Jefferson has said, he won his mother's blessing to go to Harvard Law School — she had never heard of it — only by explaining that it had been John F. Kennedy's college.

Mr. Jefferson has credited his parents with pressing the value of hard work. Elizabeth Brannum Trass, one of his high school teachers, said in an interview that he had always had the seriousness of purpose that helped catapult him onto a much faster track.

A clerkship with a United States district judge brought Mr. Jefferson to New Orleans in 1972. He got into politics as a campaign aide for Ernest N. Morial, who became the city's first black mayor in 1978 and gave Mr. Jefferson the Dollar Bill nickname.

Friends of both men said the mayor thought Mr. Jefferson had tried too aggressively to collect legal fees for helping Mr. Morial win the election. But after Mr. Jefferson became a state senator in 1979, his political rivals began to use "Dollar Bill" to refer to his expanding financial ventures.

His rental business — which leased television sets and other appliances to people who could not afford to buy them — appeared on the delinquent list in a city sales-tax scandal in the 1980's. And a day after he was elected to Congress in 1990, the Resolution Trust Corporation, which was trying to clean up the mess from the collapse of savings institutions, sued him for $160,000 over an apartment-building loan on which he had quit making payments. He later settled the suit, with friends saying his investments had been hurt by a faltering economy.

Still, once Mr. Jefferson became a close ally of President Bill Clinton, and then won a seat on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, he was able to provide "absolute A+" support for city projects, said Marc H. Morial, one of Ernest Morial's sons and the mayor of New Orleans from 1994 to 2002.

Mr. Jefferson also became known as a strong advocate of freer trade and made at least nine trips to Africa to promote it, including one with President Clinton. He championed a 2000 law that extended trade benefits to sub-Saharan Africa. "Africa is a reservoir of opportunities for American businesses," he said then.

Over the years, Mr. Jefferson has received campaign contributions and free travel from individuals and companies seeking business in Africa, including iGate.

Campaign finance records show he received a $1,000 contribution as early as 2001 from Vernon L. Jackson, the chief executive of iGate, which makes technology to transmit high-speed Internet service across the wires used in some African nations. Mr. Jackson pleaded guilty this month to bribing Mr. Jefferson with more than $400,000 in cash and millions of shares of iGate stock.

Government documents show that Mr. Jackson told the F.B.I. that when he met Mr. Jefferson in late 2000, the congressman voluntarily helped promote iGate's products — a normal and legitimate action for a government official involved in trade issues. But according to the F.B.I. documents, in early 2001, the congressman's actions became improper when he said he would continue to use his influence on iGate's behalf only if Mr. Jackson made payments to a company, the ANJ Group, run by the Jefferson family. The iGate payments were disguised as consulting fees, the F.B.I. said.

Mr. Jefferson says these were private business dealings that had nothing to do with his work on the House committee.

DOJ_NMG_0030169

But as part of a 2003 deal to distribute iGate's products, a Nigerian company, Netlink Digital Television, agreed to pay the congressman $5 per subscriber, the F.B.I. affidavit said, "in return for Jefferson's official assistance if the deal was successful."

House records show that in February 2004, Mr. Jefferson led a business delegation to Nigeria and Cameroon as a co-chairman of the Congressional Nigeria Caucus and the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus. The trip, which cost $16,313, according to the records, was paid for in part by iGate.

In 2005, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson wrote to the vice presidents of Nigeria and Ghana, and traveled to Ghana, seeking approval for iGate projects. Within a week after returning, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson used his influence to help a Virginia woman, Lori Modi, who had invested $3.5 million in the Nigeria project. He introduced her to officials at the Export-Import Bank of the United States and urged them to provide financing for the project.

But by then, Ms. Modi had asked the F.B.I. to investigate the deal.

Investigators said that in negotiating the deals, Mr. Jefferson had often cited his desire to provide for his five daughters, three of whom also have degrees from Harvard Law School.

From December 2004 through June 2005, the F.B.I. said in its affidavit, Mr. Jefferson increased his demands for equity in one Nigerian company, to 30 percent, to be split among his daughters. He also told an investor that one of his daughters had to be retained to do legal work, according to documents in the case.

Then, on July 30, 2005, when Mr. Jefferson met Ms. Modi at a Ritz-Carlton hotel, the F.B.I. said it supplied her with a briefcase with $100,000 in marked bills. Mr. Jefferson had told her the money would be needed to bribe Nigerian officials, the affidavit said.

As the F.B.I.'s video cameras zoomed in on him, the bureau said, Mr. Jefferson drove off with the briefcase on the seat of his Lincoln Town Car. And when agents raided his home four days later, $90,000 of the money turned up again, in the kitchen freezer.

Corruption Crackdown (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - In Lynchburg, Va., mayor Carl Hutcherson on May 2 was convicted, among other crimes, of stealing cash from Social Security disability recipients to pay for a stereo, a mattress, and cable television.

In Oklahoma City, three US Army soldiers on April 25 pleaded guilty to taking bribes to transport cocaine while in uniform - bringing to 13 the number of current or former military personnel ensnared by the FBI undercover investigation Operation Tarnish Star.

In West Palm Beach, Fla., city commissioner Raymond Liberti on May 8 was charged with fraud in federal court after allegedly harassing two local massage parlors in return for a $2,000 TAG Heuer watch and $66,000 in cash.

Jack Abramoff, you're not alone. Federal corruption cases are on the upswing all across America, as the FBI devotes more resources to pursuing those who abuse the public trust.

Over the past two years, FBI investigations have led to corruption convictions for more than 1,000 government employees, according to bureau figures. Corruption indictments are up 40 percent.

At times, critics say, this push has gone too far - witness the current legal standoff over documents seized by agents from Rep. William Jefferson's office. But other experts applaud the attempt to curb bribery and other misdeeds - especially in Washington, nexus of money, lobbyists, and power.

"I think it's great," says Melanie Sloan, former federal prosecutor who now heads Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). "It's overdue."

The FBI's latest strategic plan lists "combat public corruption on all levels" as the bureau's highest-ranking criminal priority, ahead of such things as fighting transnational crime organizations (read "the Mafia") and white-collar crime.

Over the past 18 months, some 200 agents have been added to the 400 already working on public corruption cases, according to FBI data.

This new emphasis is due to the fact that "public corruption is different than other crimes," said FBI director Robert Mueller in a May 11 speech in San Diego. "It does not just strike at the heart of good government - it can strike at the security of our communities and our nation."

A recent Arizona-based investigation found serious corruption along the US southern border, noted Mr. Mueller. Fifty current and former soldiers and law-enforcement officers pleaded guilty to accepting cash to smuggle drugs and illegal immigrants into the US from Mexico.

"For the right price, would they ... help terrorist operatives cross the border?" said the FBI director.

Not that the stakes are always so high. A recent election fraud case in West Virginia centered around the trading of votes for gravel, which the voters in question needed for their gravel roads, said James "Chip" Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division, at an April press conference.

The FBI and federal prosecutors have broken some big corruption cases outside of Washington. Former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, for instance, was convicted of a pattern of fraud while in office.

Abramoff, for one, has admitted to conspiring to bribe public officials, plus mail fraud and tax evasion, as a result of one of the widest-ranging such probes in recent history. So far, the Abramoff investigation has ensnared three former congressional aides - the latest being Neil Volz, an ex-lobbyist and ex-aide to Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio, who pleaded guilty to fraud May 8.

In addition, former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R) of California last year admitted taking $2.4 million in return for helping defense firms get Pentagon contracts. The Cunningham case is still threatening to engulf others, too, such as a former high CIA official named Kyle "Dusty" Foggo. Mr. Foggo was a friend of an unindicted co-conspirator who figured in Cunningham's schemes, and agents searched Foggo's Langley, Virginia office on May 12.

Then there's Rep. Jefferson (D) of Louisiana. The FBI says it has a videotape of him accepting $100,000 in bribes, and that it found $90,000 of that cash stuffed in his home freezer. Last week, a former Jefferson aide, Brett Pfeffer, was sentenced to eight years in prison for aiding and abetting the bribery of a public official.

The current spate of bribery investigations involving Congress is "extraordinary," notes John Fortier, a research fellow and governance expert at the American Enterprise Institute.

Given President Clinton's own legal problems while in office, his administration wasn't interested in allowing the FBI to go after corruption in the GOP- controlled Congress, she added. But now, "political gloves are off," says Sloan.

How To Do Nothing, Washington-Style (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The Gulfstream II had everything a congressman getting a free golf trip to Scotland could want. "State of the art entertainment center," boasted a description of the jet's elegant appointments. "Complete bar service. . . . Rich mahogany woodwork . " For the $91,465 charter, lobbyist Jack Abramoff got his money's worth -- or, as was his style, other people's money's worth: in this case, two Indian tribes and a Russian vodka distributor.

The charter details were part of the evidence introduced last week during the trial of David Safavian at the federal courthouse in Washington. A former General Services Administration official, Safavian is accused of lying to investigators about whether Abramoff had business before the agency when he invited Safavian along for the ride. Also on board, and shown to the jury in a photograph that captured him reading the newspaper in a plush captain's chair, was Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

A few blocks away, the purveyors of business as usual known as the United States Congress were killing lobbying reform in the way Washington does best: with the silent stiletto of procedure.

The latest lethal jab took the form of appointing Senate members of a conference committee that is supposed to blend the inadequate Senate version of lobbying reform with the even more feeble House proposal.

And guess who's not coming to conference: The chairman, Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), and ranking Democrat Sen. Joseph Lieberman (Conn.), of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which shares jurisdiction over the subject with the Senate Rules and Administration Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0030171

Collins and Lieberman had backed much tougher lobbying reform -- especially an independent ethics enforcement office -- than the Senate ultimately passed. No wonder Senate leaders didn't want them anywhere near the conference.

Yes, one member who serves on both panels is a conferee, but if you think Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) will be a champion of lobbying reform against the feckless House, I've got a bridge to nowhere to sell you. If you're counting on Rules Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) to be as tough as Collins and Lieberman, I'll throw in a railroad to nowhere, too.

This is the way the push for lobbying reform ends, not with a bang but a maneuver -- indecipherable to outsiders but quietly effective. As for the House, the leadership there considers the matter so pressing that it hasn't yet gotten around to naming conferees.

Washington has many ways of avoiding action while pretending the opposite. Nearly all of them have been deployed in the cause of evading effective lobbying reform:

· Run out the clock. Remember the frantic push for lobbying reform in the weeks after Abramoff's guilty plea? The anti-reform forces were betting you wouldn't.

· Avoid the subject . One of the cushiest perks that lawmakers get is flying the corporate skies at cut-rate prices. When they borrow a corporate jet, they only have to pay the company the price of a first-class ticket.

But both houses managed to avoid the unpleasantness of having to vote on proposals to require lawmakers to pay full freight. In the Senate, a bipartisan cabal led by Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) cut off debate before such an amendment could be offered. Asked about that during a visit to The Post last month, Reid said such flights were a complicated topic that required hearings -- this after Rules and Homeland Security had just finished lobbying reform hearings.

· Rig the rules. This subset of "avoid the subject" is a specialty of the House. Under the version of democracy practiced by House Republicans, votes are permitted only when the conclusion is pre-ordained; real consideration of alternatives is forbidden; and troublesome amendments, even from party members, are disallowed.

On lobbying reform, Republicans refused to permit floor votes on establishing an independent ethics office, on corporate flights, and on increasing the waiting period for lawmakers to lobby their former colleagues. A simple up-or-down vote on the Democratic alternative was entirely off the table, of course.

· Stack the deck. See discussion of Senate conferees, above.

· Show no shame. This is an essential element of the effort to con ordinary citizens into thinking that something has been accomplished. In January, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) demanded an end to privately subsidized congressional travel and free meals and other goodies from lobbyists. Last month, after the House passed a measure that met neither of those goals, Hastert was unabashed about patting himself and his colleagues on the back.

Congress has left town for its Memorial Day recess, but the Safavian trial continues. Today, Neil Volz, the former Ney chief of staff turned Abramoff lobbyist turned admitted felon, is to take the stand to describe, among other things, the Scotland trip.

But don't count on that -- or a lawmaker's freezer stuffed with cash, or a congressional Rolls-Royce underwritten by a defense contractor -- to produce the real change that Congress is so doggedly resisting.

Congressman Questions Cost Of Hoffa Search (AP-Y2)

By Joseph Altman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, May 30, 2006

A Michigan congressman on Monday questioned the cost of the FBI's search for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

"The FBI might be better off establishing a budget and some kind of timeline, because what new information do they have now, 31 years later?" said Rep. Joe Knollenberg, whose district is near the search site.

Monday marked the 13th consecutive day that agents have worked at Hidden Dreams Farm in Milford Township, 30 miles northwest of Detroit.

The Republican told The Associated Press he has not asked the FBI for an explanation but may do so this week.

DOJ_NMG_0030172

"It seems to be a no-holds-barred move on the part of the FBI to do all this sifting and digging and searching," Knollenberg said. "It's purely a question of cost at this moment. ... It's the taxpayer that has the voice here, too."

Messages left for FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney were not immediately returned Monday.

The FBI has declined to release an estimate of how much the search will cost but has said it will last a couple of weeks and involve more than 40 FBI personnel, as well as demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

"The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the FBI works, and this one is no exception," the FBI said in a statement last week. "We will not abandon our responsibility to effectively investigate a pending organized crime case simply because it might be termed 'too old.' "

The FBI has said it received a credible tip that Hoffa's body is buried at the farm, once owned by a Hoffa associate.

Hoffa was last seen when he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, who are now both dead.

Little Activity At Hoffa Search Site On Memorial Day (AP)

By Brian Charlton, The Associated Press

AP, May 29, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. (AP) — The FBI's search for Jimmy Hoffa appeared to take a back seat to Memorial Day. But area businesses trying to cash in on the Hoffa hoopla were still at work on Monday.

The FBI for nearly two weeks has been searching a Milford Township horse farm for the remains of the former Teamsters boss.

Sunday marked the 12th consecutive day of the search at Hidden Dreams Farm 30 miles northwest of Detroit. But on Monday, only a few agents were on the site, and they appeared only to be guarding it, not actively searching.

FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said that despite appearances, agents were working at the site Monday.

"There might not have been a lot of digging that you could see visually, but they're still working out there," said Clenney, who declined to elaborate. "There's a lot of investigating still going on that might not be visible."

The search would continue Tuesday, she said.

A few miles away, ClubHouse Golf employees encouraged customers to "whack" Hoffa.

The golf shop challenged customers to hit a ball into a picture of Hoffa that was placed 8 feet away. The names of those who successfully complete the task are entered into a drawing. The winner will take home a golf bag packed with items that include a shovel and DVDs of "The Sopranos" and "The Godfather."

"I've kind of grown up with the whole Hoffa thing. I was a little paranoid at first, but we figured it's kind of an urban legend now," said ClubHouse Golf owner Corky Davis.

The streets of Milford were lined Monday for the annual Memorial Day parade.

In an effort to show respect to veterans, the Milford Baking Company removed its Hoffa cupcakes from a store display case and substituted red, white and blue cupcakes.

"We thought this day should be dedicated just to veterans, so we just have them in the back," said bakery co-owner Laura Helwig.

The bakery has sold more than 2,500 of the Hoffa cupcakes, which feature a plastic green hand emerging from chocolate-flavored sprinkles and frosting meant to resemble dirt.

Flats Mexican Bar & Grill also was getting in on the Hoffa hype, selling $1 Teamsters Tacos.

Meanwhile, U.S. Rep. Joe Knollenberg questioned how much money the FBI is spending on the search for Hoffa, who was last seen in July 1975.

"The FBI might be better off establishing a budget and some kind of timeline, because what new information do they have now, 31 years later?" the Republican from Oakland County's Bloomfield Township said Monday.

He said he has not yet asked the FBI for an explanation but is considering doing so this week.

DOJ_NMG_0030173

"It seems to be a no-holds-barred move on the part of the FBI to do all this sifting and digging and searching," Knollenberg said. "It's purely a question of cost at this moment. ... It's the taxpayer that has the voice here, too."

The FBI has declined to release an estimate of how much the search at the farm will cost but has said it will last a couple of weeks and involve more than 40 FBI personnel, along with demolition experts, archaeologists and anthropologists.

"The expenditure of funds has always been necessary in each and every case the FBI works, and this one is no exception," the FBI said in a statement issued last week. "We will not abandon our responsibility to effectively investigate a pending organized crime case simply because it might be termed `too old,' nor will we compromise any other ongoing investigation in the process."

The FBI has said it received a credible tip that Hoffa's body is buried at the farm, which at one time was owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster.

Hoffa was last seen when he was scheduled to have dinner at a Bloomfield Township restaurant, about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, who are now both dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories: that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown into a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

Search For Hoffa Eases For Holiday (DEN)

By Lisa Martino, The Detroit News

Detroit News, May 30, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP -- Memorial Day marked a break in the digging for the remains of former Teamsters leader Jimmy Hoffa at Hidden Dreams horse farm, but the FBI remained on hand.

Aside from a typical delivery of hay and authorities guarding the dig site, not much was visible at the farm, but FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said agents continued to work on other aspects of the investigation at the scene.

"They're there on site. You may not see what they're doing, but they're working," she said.

Work crews have demolished a horse barn and have been digging under the foundation for the remains of Hoffa based on a tip from Donovan Wells, 75, an ailing federal prisoner who lived on the Milford Township property in 1975.

Wells is serving time in a prison medical center in Lexington, Ky., for marijuana trafficking.

Hoffa disappeared on July 30, 1975, before a meeting he was to attend at the Machus Red Fox restaurant in Bloomfield Township. Numerous other searches for Hoffa have turned up no leads.

At least 40 FBI agents and other experts have been brought in to work on this search for Hoffa's remains.

Today is the 14th day of the search. It is uncertain how long the search will continue at the site, Clenney said.

Longtime Hoffa Friend Doubts Latest Tip Will Crack Case (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, May 30, 2006

BOCA RATON, Fla. -- Longtime Jimmy Hoffa friend Charles "Chuckie" O'Brien has seen it all before -- the breathless news reports, the stern FBI agents, the digging in yards, the ripping up of floorboards, the endless speculation that maybe, this time, one of America's great mysteries will be solved.

Some think O'Brien may have been involved in the July 30, 1975, disappearance. But he said he highly doubts that a horse farm 30 miles outside Detroit will answer the question of what happened to the former Teamsters president.

"At this point, after 31 years -- I don't know how much longer God is going to keep me on this Earth, but I just don't see it," said O'Brien, now 72. He is retired from the Teamsters and battling numerous health problems. "I just don't think it will ever be solved."

O'Brien said while working as a Teamsters official he knew the tipster, Donovan Wells, who provided new information leading the FBI to Hidden Dreams Farm this month. Wells, now 75, is serving time at a federal prison in Lexington, Ky., on a drug conviction.

"If he had to get on a truth meter, he would go down the tubes," O'Brien said during an interview with The Associated Press at a swimming pool in his Boca Raton condominium complex.

O'Brien said he views Hoffa as a father figure. He was a child when Hoffa took him in, along with his mother. He has been questioned about the disappearance at least a dozen times by FBI agents. Most recently he was in the news in 2001 when the FBI matched a hair to Hoffa that was found in a car that O'Brien was driving the day Hoffa disappeared.

The car belonged to the son of reputed Mafia figure Anthony Giacalone, whom Hoffa was supposed to meet at a restaurant along with New Jersey Teamsters boss and mob associate Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano. Hoffa phoned his wife to say neither man showed, and that was the last anyone ever heard from him.

O'Brien adamantly denies having any role in whatever happened to Hoffa, or knowing anyone who did. He keeps a photograph on his desk of Hoffa and his wife during one of their visits to Florida in the early 1970s.

"It's very frustrating. I have so much inside, my love for him and his family," O'Brien said. "How long can you keep talking to people and being honest with people?"

Hoffa was Teamsters president from 1957 to 1971. The FBI has said his disappearance was probably connected to his attempts to regain power in the union. O'Brien said it also was known that Hoffa intended to testify before the special U.S. Senate investigative panel, known as the Church Committee, about Mafia involvement in U.S.-backed plots to assassinate Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"I think a disappearance is very hard. If somebody doesn't want you to be found, you won't be found," O'Brien said.

The Michigan farm investigation is only the latest in a series of high-profile efforts to find Hoffa. A backyard pool in Michigan was excavated in 2003, floorboards were ripped up in a Detroit house in 2004 and ground-penetrating radar was used by a television show to check for remains underneath Giants Stadium in New Jersey.

"It's gone into another circus. I wish they would find something so there could be closure for the family," O'Brien said.

The Teamsters as a union, O'Brien said, never recovered from Hoffa's disappearance. Now led by Hoffa's son James P. Hoffa, the Teamsters recently broke away from the AFL-CIO as a rift grows within labor unions about their future. About 12 percent of U.S. workers are union members, down from about 20 percent in 1983.

"This tragedy hurt everybody who grew up with the Teamsters. We lost the spirit, and they are paying a heavy price for it," O'Brien said.

O'Brien himself was banned from contact with the Teamsters for alleged links with organized crime, which he denies. But he said the ban has made it difficult for him to even attend funerals of his former union associates.

"I've been taking a beating because of people who are not legitimate people," he said, referring to prison inmates whom he contends provide authorities with false information. "My family gets the brunt. ... I'm trying to say it's not true, it never happened."

Dixon's Bribery Trial Starts Today (KNOXNS/AP)

By Lucas L. Johnson Ii, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), May 30, 2006

Ex-senator's lawyer hopeful about verdict from 'Waltz' sting

NASHVILLE - The federal bribery trial of former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon begins today, and his attorney says he's optimistic about the outcome despite the charge against his client.

"It's going to be tough," Coleman W. Garrett said by phone from his Memphis office on Monday. "But you just tell yourself you're going to prevail."

Dixon was arrested along with four sitting lawmakers a year ago in the Tennessee Waltz sting, which focused on an FBI front company, called E-Cycle Management, that supposedly wanted to buy and resell used government computers.

Dixon, who represented Memphis in the Legislature for 22 years before he resigned in 2005, is the first lawmaker indicted in the case to go to trial. He is charged with accepting $9,500 in bribes as part of the public corruption case.

At least two state senators and a member of the governor's cabinet have received subpoenas to testify at Dixon's trial. Dixon was at the Capitol with a woman serving the legal summonses as last Wednesday's session began, according to Senate sergeants at arms.

DOJ_NMG_0030175

Lt. Gov. John Wilder, D-Mason, and Sen. Jeff Miller, R-Cleveland, both told The Associated Press they received subpoenas.

Miller has been investigated but not charged in the public corruption case. He has acknowledged accepting $1,000 from a lobbyist who pleaded guilty as part of the undercover probe but has said the money was a campaign contribution.

On Friday, state Finance Commissioner Dave Goetz told WSMV-TV that he, too, had been subpoenaed.

He declined to comment about the case, and Wilder and Miller said they don't know why they were subpoenaed.

Garrett said five people were subpoenaed.

Prosecutors say undercover agents acting as E-Cycle representatives bribed lawmakers and local government officials while pretending to set up business in Tennessee.

Two of the indicted lawmakers, Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga and Kathryn Bowers of Memphis, are in the Senate and have pleaded not guilty. Defendant John Ford resigned from the Senate after his arrest and has pleaded not guilty.

Chris Newton, a Republican from East Tennessee, pleaded guilty and resigned from the state House. He is now in prison serving a one-year sentence.

Former Tennessee State Senator Roscoe Dixon Prepares For Corruption Trial (WREG-TV)

WREG-TV, May 30, 2006

Memphis - It has been a year of preparation for former State Senator Roscoe Dixon and his attorneys. Tuesday they take their defense to federal court and Dixon hopes it is enough to keep him a free man.

It was a year ago that the foundation of Tennessee politics was shaken with a statewide rumble. It was then that Roscoe Dixon's name became entwined with the investigation called the Tennessee Waltz. No one knew what to make of it, and the former Senator didn't have much to offer.

"Everything is okay. I just want my constituents to know that I appreciate all the support they have given me and let's let this unfold." said Dixon, last year, when the investigation was revealed.

As details came out, it became clear that Roscoe Dixon has trouble ahead. Dixon would be charged with extortion and accepting 95-hundred dollars in bribes from representatives of the fictitious FBI created company called E-Cycle. It seems he introduced a bill on behalf of the company. It became a dark cloud over 22 years of public service, in both the House and Senate.

Dixon decided not to plea bargain, but to fight the charges against him. "In all my discussions with the senator regarding his position with respect to the trial and what you have, it's been that he is not going to consider entertaining any negotiated plea in this case." said Coleman Garrett, Dixon's attorney.

Dixon's attorneys have subpoenaed several of his state government colleagues in his trial. We may very well see more prominent people called to the stand and many will be watching on the sidelines to see the fallout from this big dance and what it may indicate for the other lawmaker who waltz in next.

Other 5 Defendants Looking For Strategy (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 30, 2006

Like a canary in a coal mine, Roscoe Dixon is the focus of great anxiety.

When he stands trial Tuesday on federal bribery and extortion charges, the former state senator will be watched, studied and fretted over by five other Tennessee Waltz defendants who've refused to deal with prosecutors.

Advertisement

They're anxious to see if Dixon goes down with a guilty verdict or if he can flit away on acquittal, stirring hope that they, too, might survive the reams of undercover FBI tape shot in the two-year corruption sting.

It's a high-stakes challenge for Dixon, 56, a beloved 22-year veteran of the General Assembly who was both revered for his constituent service and criticized for suspected self-dealing.

"Everybody's watching just to see what will happen," said Michael Scholl, defense lawyer for former state senator John Ford, who's seen on one covert tape stuffing cash from an undercover agent into his pocket.

Scholl won't discuss his legal strategy, but it's clear Ford, Dixon and four other remaining Waltz defendants hope to poke holes in a government case built on some 3,000 hours of undercover audio and video tapes.

Unlike most criminal cases, in which the majority of defendants plead guilty, seven of the 10 Waltz defendants statewide have opted for jury trials. One of the seven -- ex-Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton -- was convicted by an East Tennessee jury in February and sentenced to three years in prison.

Defendants found guilty at trial generally receive stiffer sentences than those who plead, yet all but one of the six Memphis defendants plan to go to trial.

All the Memphis defendants are black, and race already has begun to play a role in defense strategies.

"This is a different animal," said Steve Farese, defense lawyer for indicted County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., explaining why so few of the Waltz defendants have copped pleas.

"You have overtones of entrapment, overtones of a suspect group of people."

Dixon's lawyer, Coleman Garrett, unveiled the race defense this month when he unsuccessfully asked U.S. Dist. Judge Jon McCalla to toss out charges, alleging selective prosecution.

Noting eight of 10 Waltz defendants are black, Garrett argued that the FBI ignored white targets -- an allegation prosecutors deny and one McCalla found no evidence to support.

Yet in watching a star-studded trial where potential witnesses include Lt. Gov. John Wilder and other big names in Tennessee politics, defense lawyers will be on the lookout for miscues.

Scholl said he wants to see if more comes to light on the government's star witness, FBI informant Tim Willis. Farese will watch for anything he may borrow to score points with jurors.

"It's always good to see what the government's perspective will be in trial," he said. "Lawyers are basically thieves. We'll steal good ideas from others."

One potential -- yet dangerous -- defense is entrapment, in which a defendant contends he was illegally enticed by undercover agents. To do it, a defendant must admit taking a bribe, and, in turn, the government can put on evidence of any past corrupt practices.

Charged with sharing $9,500 in bribes with a bag man, Dixon hinted in a pretrial motion he might use the entrapment defense. Prosecutors say they're ready if he does.

A study of his 22 years in the House and Senate reveals two sides of Dixon, who grew up disadvantaged in South Memphis and rose to be an outspoken advocate for the poor, yet couldn't shake talk he mixed his public and private interests.

"I always liked Roscoe. He always seemed to be reasonable," said Rusty Siebert, former bureau chief for TennCare, the state's health program for the poor. TennCare met hostile resistance in 1995 when it tried to ax Access Medplus, a black-owned managed care organization, yet Siebert recalls Dixon as a voice of reason in the debate.

"Roscoe was very well-liked, period," agreed Rep. Mike Kernell, who recalls his fellow Memphis Democrat working long hours and speaking up for his constituents.

Yet whispers often surrounded Dixon. Like Ford, Dixon listed his occupation as a consultant, yet didn't disclose how much he was paid or who he worked for on conflict-of-interest forms.

Some were surprised in 2003 to see Dixon waging a lawsuit for control of publicly funded Memphis Health Center, but not Gregory Grant, his rival in the tussle. When Dixon called Grant "a shady character" who should be ousted from the multimillion-dollar clinic for the poor, Grant responded, "He's as slick as grease himself."

Dixon often helped community groups navigate state bureaucracy, and he once helped land a $75,000 state grant for another nonprofit organization he controlled. Records show lawmakers added language in a 1997 appropriations bill to give $75,000 to the Hamilton Community Initiative, a South Memphis organization set up to improve neighborhoods around Hamilton High School, where Dixon graduated.

The organization's 2001 Internal Revenue Service return lists Dixon as controlling its financial books, and he's named in another as executive director.

Dixon declined comment for this article, and two calls to his attorney went unreturned.

How much the FBI studied Dixon's past isn't known, but it's clear he was among the first approached when agents set up a fake company called E-Cycle Management that passed cash to lawmakers in exchange for their help landing state contracts.

Agents got to Dixon through his friend, now-confessed bag man Barry Myers, 39, who's expected to testify against him. It started with a 2002 probe of then-Shelby County Juvenile Court Clerk Shep Wilbun's office, where Myers worked.

First, agents got to Willis, 35, a political consultant paid more than $30,000 in still-unexplained fees from Wilbun's office. Joining the FBI in February 2003 as a $72,000-a-year informant, Willis began recording conversations the next month with Myers, and before long Willis was recording Dixon, too.

By that August, Dixon participated in eight conversations secretly recorded on video or audio, court records show. By then, the FBI set up a mini-sting that preceded the Waltz. Prosecutors say they'll present evidence that Dixon and Myers took $6,000 that July and August from agents posing to represent a dental clinic in search of TennCare funds.

By January 2004, with the Waltz in full swing, Dixon introduced Senate Bill 2500 on behalf of E-Cycle -- a firm ostensibly in the computer parts-recycling business -- to create financial incentives for reusing electronic waste. Prosecutors allege Dixon and Myers were paid for introducing the bill and again for pulling it to make way for a stronger bill -- $9,500, in all, between February and May 2005.

Immunity keeps them out of jail, not hot water

Two of the top prosecution witnesses testifying in the City Hall hiring trial admitted they broke the rules while taking part in an alleged crooked hiring scheme.

But the former city employees are not at risk of going to prison for their deeds.

That's because Mary Jo Falcon and John Kosiba testified over the last two weeks with letters of immunity, meaning they can talk about breaking the law without worrying about criminal prosecution, unless they gave false testimony.

Yet they're not completely in the clear, the Chicago Sun-Times has learned.

Falcon and Kosiba, both lawyers, are now at risk of losing their law licenses because of their testimony against Robert Sorich and three other former city employees. Sorich, Timothy McCarthy, Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan are charged with manipulating the city's hiring system to award politically connected candidates with jobs and promotions. Prosecutors argue that's a violation of a 1983 federal decree that aims to keep political influence out of hiring decisions. The trial enters its third week Tuesday.

No word on disciplinary inquiry

"The bottom line here is immunity has no meaning in our system," said James Grogan, chief counsel for the Illinois Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission. "The Illinois Supreme Court has long held that a grant of immunity has absolutely no impact in terms of lawyer discipline."

Grogan would not comment on whether the commission has opened an investigation on Kosiba and Falcon. But lawyers can get in trouble for fraudulent behavior even if it had nothing to do with legal work, he said.

"We do regularly monitor alleged attorney misconduct when it comes to our attention in the terms of a criminal case," Grogan said. "This agency can generate an investigation based on media reports."

Grogan said the commission has taken action against other lawyers even though they were testifying for the government with a grant of immunity. That happened quite a bit in the Operation Greylord investigation that took place in the late 1980s and early 1990s and depended to an extent on the immunized testimony of lawyers.

Notorious Greylord case

Most notorious among those witnesses was Robert J. Cooley, a mob lawyer who admitted to taking bribes and fixing a number of criminal cases before he started working for the government. His cooperation helped bring down judges and lawyers. The Illinois Supreme Court disbarred Cooley in 1994.

Falcon is a former director of personnel at the city's Sewers Department. She left in 2005 when part of the expanding Hired Truck investigation delved into political hiring at City Hall. She soon began cooperating with federal investigators.

In her testimony at trial, Falcon admitted she falsified scores on rating forms so politically connected candidates won city jobs. Falcon said she rigged it so the names provided to her by Sorich or McCarthy could win the jobs. Sorich and McCarthy worked in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. Falcon acknowledged changing interview rating forms without telling the men.

Meanwhile, Kosiba, a former sewers commissioner, conducted hundreds of interviews and said he evaluated candidates so IGA selections won the jobs.

"Did interviews for most positions even matter while you were there?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Barry Miller asked.

"No," Kosiba said.

Kosiba said he knew he was supposed to rank candidates based on their qualifications when he interviewed people.

"Did you do that?" Miller asked.

"No," he said flatly.

FBI Questions Another Masilotti Land Deal (PALMBEACHP)

By Dwayne Robinson, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), May 30, 2006

The FBI issued yet another subpoena late last week in its investigation of land deals by Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti.

The latest federal subpoena to the Village of Royal Palm Beach on Thursday relates to a $7 million sale of up to 50 acres in 2004 from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Palm Beach to prominent Broward County builders GL Homes.

PBC Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with a government land purchase in Martin County.

As early as 2001, Royal Palm Beach sought approximately 15 acres at the site for a public park before leaning on its county commissioner for assistance when a sale to another buyer seemed imminent.

"I would appreciate your support in ensuring that a significant portion of that parcel be committed to public recreational space by the potential purchaser," Village Manager David Farber wrote to Masilotti on March 6, 2003, according to village records. "Any help you can provide regarding this matter would be greatly appreciated."

Masilotti, a former Royal Palm Beach mayor, never responded to the request, Farber says.

Royal Palm Beach offered to prchase the property at $42,000 an acre in 2001. According to court records, GL Homes forked over $7 million, or roughly $140,000 an acre, in 2004.

GL Homes constructed single-family homes and townhouses, ranging from $360,000 and up, at what is now the Nautica Lakes subdivision.

Masilotti could not be reached for comment. The FBI would not comment on the subpoena. And spokespeople from the diocese and GL Homes could not be reached for comment.

On the same day the federal subpoena was issued to Royal Palm Beach, the South Florida Water Management District also was ordered to hand over documents relating to a complicated 2003 land deal that enriched Masilotti's family.

The Palm Beach Post first reported in April that Masilotti's family made as much as $1.3 million in connection with the district deal, through a secret land trust and a tangled series of real estate transactions.

Royal Palm Beach has no records relating to Thursday's subpoena, Farber said. The subpoena asks for records relating to the sale of the diocesan property between 2001 and 2006 to the village, but no such sale occurred.

"I guess the response to the subpoena is there are no documents," Farber said. "I don't know what they're searching for. Someone needs to expand to us what they want."

BE ON GUARD, JUNIOR (NYPOST)

By Steve Dunleavy

The New York Post, May 30, 2006

EXCLUSIVE

THE feds have told John "Junior" Gotti that a threat has been made on his life.

The FBI captured the threat on tape during an ongoing investigation and immediately passed the chilling information on to Gotti and his camp, sources said.

If Junior's people are scared, they certainly aren't showing it.

"I have pretty good sources, too," Gotti's lawyer, Charlie Carnesi, said yesterday. "This is just another ploy by the prosecution to muddy the waters around this case."

The death threat was made on April 5, which was before a blizzard of subpoenas were sent out to Gotti associates and family members as part a new sweeping grand jury probe of the Gambino crime family that came after the second Gotti trial ended in a mistrial.

Carnesi has complained to Judge Shira Scheindlin that some of those subpoenas came with a message from the FBI: "You can thank Gotti for this."

"How disingenuous can the government be?" Carnesi asked yesterday.

The FBI has a legal and ethical obligation to convey the threat to Gotti, but his camp believes the feds are trying to give a perception to dangerous wiseguys that Junior has sold them out.

And that makes the Gotti camp hopping mad.

"That is stark insanity," one source said. "If he had sold anyone out, John would not have been facing 30 years in jail and $25 million in fines. He would not have been facing a third trial after flatly rejecting every deal the prosecution has offered him. Gotti has turned his back on the life."

The latest twist follows Thursday's arraignment of Junior when Judge Scheindlin broadsided the prosecution for bringing a third trial after two earlier juries failed to return a verdict.

"Does the government get to have endless trials until they get it right? The fourth, fifth or sixth?" Scheindlin asked as Gotti was arraigned on new witness-tampering and money-laundering charges.

Carnesi is definitely pleased with the way his case is going, because he believes the feds' constant use of turncoat mobsters as witnesses sends out a dangerous message.

"I am absolutely thrilled at the turn of events," Carnesi said. "The government is giving out a message, from prosecution witnesses Joey D'Angelo and Mikey 'Scars' DiLeonardo that it's OK to murder and you can get away with it.

"The real message is from John Jr. He had been in the life and it was full of treachery and it sucked."

From Mob Boss To Devastating Informant – The Life Of 'Little Al' D'Arco (SDUT/AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, May 30, 2006

NEW YORK – The killers put the dead canary in the freezer. Later, their work finished, they placed the bird inside the mouth of the equally deceased Bruno Facciola.

The August 1990 mob hit followed a tip from two corrupt NYPD detectives that the Luchese family capo had turned government informant. Facciola was stabbed, shot through both eyes and shot again in the head. Then came the bird. Message: Speak no evil.

The slaying was orchestrated by a diminutive thug known to fellow Mafiosi as "Little Al." Few embraced the mob ethos more fervently than Alphonse D'Arco, a hard case from the cradle.

"I was a man when I was born," Little Al once bragged. He committed every crime except pimping and pornography, which he deemed beneath his dignity. Murders? He committed eight while rising through the Luchese ranks.

He especially despised informants. "Rats," he'd spit. He did a three-year heroin rap without opening his yap. So when word came that Facciola was singing, D'Arco arranged for his demise.

And for the canary.

Four months later, D'Arco became the Luchese boss, though not for long. His reign abruptly ended, but not in the fashion he expected: on the wrong end of a jury verdict. Or maybe a bullet.

Instead, D'Arco – disgusted by the loss of mob honor, double-crossed by men he had respected – became in 1991 what he most abhorred: a rat.

And not just any rat. Over the last 15 years, he has brought down mob bosses, underbosses, consiglieres. And he's still making inmates out of ex-accomplices today.

Little Al may be the most devastating mob informant ever.

3 Plead Guilty To FEMA Fraud; Feds Charge 4 In Separate Cases (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, May 30, 2006

Three Louisiana residents pleaded guilty and four more were indicted in Baton Rouge federal court this week on violations related to Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds.

According to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Office, those who pleaded guilty are Jenny L. Lowery, 22, of Baton Rouge, Whitney Paul, 19, of Donaldsonville and Sharon D. Dalcourt, 45, of Baton Rouge.

Both Lowery and Paul were charged with making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster relief benefits. They each face a maximum sentence of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine or both.

Dalcourt pleaded guilty to making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency regarding damages incurred as a result of Katrina. She also faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine or both, the news release said.

Also this week, Leonard Jackson, 54, Mary Johnson, 51, Anthony Parker, 21, and Edward Parker, 20, all of Baton Rouge, were charged in two-count indictments with making a false and fraudulent claim for disaster assistance benefits and illegal conversion of government property (a check from FEMA for expedited disaster assistance), a second news release said.

The cases were investigated by the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, which includes members of the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Postal Inspector's Office, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and other federal agencies.

The total number of defendants charged in Baton Rouge federal court with violations related to hurricane relief stands at 58, the news release said.

Feds Charge 26 In FEMA Fraud (BRAH/AP)

By Associated Press

The Bradenton Herald, May 30, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - A grand jury has indicted 26 Orlando area residents on charges of making fraudulent claims for federal assistance after the two hurricanes that struck the Gulf Coast last year.

Federal prosecutors said on Thursday that the defendants collected a total of $150,000 in emergency assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, even though they didn't live in the areas affected by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Because so many people were affected by the storms, FEMA provided a streamlined process to quickly get at least $2,000 to those who needed disaster assistance. People whose primary residence was damaged could apply in person or via the Internet or a toll-free telephone number.

Those indicted Wednesday made fraudulent claims for amounts ranging from $2,000 to more than $100,000, federal prosecutors said. The indictments were a result of an investigation federal officials called Operation ``Storm Chaser."

Charges include conspiracy, submission of a false claim to a governmental agency, theft of government property, mail fraud, wire fraud, and making a false statement to a government agency.

The counts carry prison sentences ranging from five to 20 years.

"In the aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, our nation came together to support the people whose lives were devastated by those disasters," U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez said in a statement Thursday. ``As we enter a new hurricane season next week, we will aggressively pursue anyone who attempts to take advantage of a natural disaster to defraud FEMA or anyone else."

Three In Mobile County Indicted On FEMA Fraud Charges (AP)

AP, May 27, 2006

MOBILE, Ala. (AP) — Three Mobile County residents have been indicted on charges of making false FEMA disaster claims related to Hurricane Katrina.

Silas J. Jackson, 53, of Mobile, Dianna Denise McMillian, 35, of Grand Bay, and Penny Sue Byrd, 35, of Citronelle, were each charged in multiple-count indictments, the U.S. attorney's office announced Friday.

Jackson received $23,529 through a scheme to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency by sending an altered fire marshal report in support of his application for disaster assistance, according to the indictment.

McMillian was charged with falsely claiming to reside at a residence from which she had moved several months prior to Katrina and defrauding FEMA of $13,498.

Byrd was charged with defrauding FEMA of $2,000 by falsely claiming to have resided in a travel trailer and mobile home at the time Katrina hit Aug. 29.

The maximum penalty for making false claims to the government is 5 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Mail fraud and wire fraud each carry maximum penalties of 20 years and a $250,000 fine.

U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes in Mobile said the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force investigations continue.

Man In The Middle (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball, Jamie Reno And Evan Thomas, Newsweek

Newsweek, May 29, 2006

As a corruption probe heats up on Capitol Hill, the spotlight falls on a California defense contractor with some powerful friends.

During World War II, the Royal Hawaiian, a grand pink palace on Waikiki Beach, was reserved mainly for officers and men in the U.S. Navy's Submarine Service. It was understood that the sailors who took the greatest risks—about a quarter of the submariners never came back—deserved to be pampered while they waited to go back out on war patrols. More recently, the most frequent guest in the Royal Hawaiian's tony King Kamehameha Suite was a man with close ties to the military who also took risks, though of a different kind.

Brent Wilkes has flown in a private Gulfstream jet, lived in a huge house (once occupied by former San Diego Chargers quarterback Stan Humphries) in a gated community, smoked expensive cigars on the best golf courses and sponsored good works and charities, like the "Tribute to Heroes Gala," which raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for a children's hospital and a military charity called the Air Warrior Courage Foundation.

What paved the road to riches and beneficence for Wilkes? Once a lowly CPA in southern California, Wilkes became a fabulously successful defense contractor. He carefully cultivated friends in high places, personally handing out some $800,000 in campaign contributions, not counting the donations of a political action committee controlled by his company. He was a Republican "Pioneer," which means he raised at least $100,000 for the GOP. And he has long been known for showering favors on congressmen and national-security officials, playing poker with them at fancy Washington hotels and flying them in a jet he partly owned.

There is nothing unusual or illegal about a defense contractor with an open checkbook for campaign fund-raisers and seats to fill on a corporate jet. But federal prosecutors want to find out more about how Wilkes tapped into what may be one of Washington's sweetest post-9/11 honey pots—secret defense and intelligence contracts that are often awarded without competitive bids or oversight but with plenty of congressional meddling. Wilkes appears to be at the center of a Washington scandal that has the potential to shake Capitol Hill and the Pentagon.

Wilkes has protested his innocence, and indeed, his friends say he appears cheerful and confident he will be vindicated. But his lawyers have confirmed that he is the man identified as "Co-conspirator No. 1" in the charges against former congressman Randy (Duke) Cunningham, the former Navy air ace who pleaded guilty to taking bribes. In one prosecution document, "Co-conspirator No. 1" agreed to give Cunningham $525,000 in return for $6 million in government contracts. Wilkes is also a close friend of one of the more colorful characters to fall from a top government job, Kyle (Dusty) Foggo, the former executive director of the CIA who resigned three weeks ago, just before his house and office were raided by federal agents. According to The San Diego Union-Tribune, high-school classmates Wilkes and Foggo served as best men at each other's weddings, named their sons after each other and shared a wine locker at Washington's Capital Grille restaurant, a favorite lobbyists' hangout.

According to Foggo's lawyer, Bill Hundley, the Feds are operating on the theory that Foggo helped Wilkes get CIA contracts in return for Wilkes's paying for vacation trips for Foggo. According to Hundley, Foggo claims that he paid for some of the trips before Wilkes became a wealthy contractor, though he concedes Wilkes may have picked up the tab later on. The details of how Wilkes procured contracts remain murky, but the Feds appear to be particularly interested in contracts that seemingly offered little or dubious value for high prices. Wilkes's lawyers have repeatedly denied that he engaged in any wrongdoing.

In one case, described in prosecution documents, a Wilkes company was awarded a $9.7 million contract to electronically scan Panama Canal Zone documents dating back a century to the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, even though the Pentagon reportedly wanted to use the money for more-urgent projects. Wilkes allegedly lobbied Cunningham to press the Pentagon to award the contract anyway.

According to published reports and congressional and law-enforcement sources who did not want to be identified discussing a sensitive investigation, the Feds are also reviewing Wilkes's ties to other powerful House leaders. Former GOP majority leader Tom DeLay, Armed Services Committee chairman Duncan Hunter and Appropriations Committee chairman Jerry Lewis all reportedly had dealings with Wilkes. None has been accused of any wrongdoing; a spokesman for Lewis said the congressman had not seen Wilkes for 10 years. Hunter's spokesman said his boss urged the Pentagon to ignore congressional pressure on contracting, and DeLay's lawyer had no immediate comment.

Wilkes himself is said to be a bluff man who likes to burst into show tunes and shout out expressions like "boom shaka-laka," "God loves a working man" and "Yeah, baby!" after the Austin Powers movies. Though he owns custom-made suits, he generally prefers khakis and golf shirts. A former linebacker, he is said to be tough and unyielding, not the sort to easily crack under the pressure of prosecutors. Raised as a Mormon, he is described by acquaintances as a loyal friend who is very close to his children.

His life is getting lonelier. He has been dropped by charities; his office building is for sale; his federal contracts are drying up. Once a ubiquitous figure in San Diego politics, Wilkes might as well have ceased to exist. Former San Diego congressman Brian Bilbray, a Republican who was in the House until 2001 before retiring to become a lobbyist, is running for Duke Cunningham's vacated seat. Bilbray told NEWSWEEK, "I may have met Brent once or twice, but I really do not remember." Bilbray did discover that Wilkes had donated $7,000 to his campaigns, but the candidate has given the money to charity. "I wouldn't know Wilkes if I saw him in the street," said Bilbray.

Sniper Jury To Sift Conspiracy Theory (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Early in his more-than-three-hour closing statement, convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad laid out the heart of his defense against six murder charges stemming from the 2002 sniper shootings: He and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo were framed.

"My case is based on one thing. It is very simple. They lied on two innocent men," Muhammad said Friday, before launching into a rambling speech in which he said government agencies, including the CIA, worked to falsely imprison him.

But as Montgomery County jurors begin deliberations today in Muhammad's second trial in the shootings, they will weigh this conspiracy theory -- for which he offered little proof and no motive -- against the four weeks of testimony and evidence presented by prosecutors.

Witnesses reported seeing Muhammad and his Chevrolet Caprice near scenes of the shootings.

Forensic analysts said his DNA was on evidence that included parts of the Bushmaster rifle found in the Caprice when he and Malvo were arrested.

Ballistics analysts matched the .223-caliber bullets used in the killings to the rifle.

Jurors also heard dramatic testimony from Malvo, whom Muhammad still referred to as "my son" even though his former protege took the stand to say Muhammad planned and carried out most of the shootings.

The jury of seven women and five men also likely will consider their personal impressions of Muhammad, who defended himself.

He came to Montgomery County from Virginia's death row, convicted by a jury that heard most of the same evidence in 2003.

Muhammad showed he has learned a lot about lawyering -- he seemed comfortable with courtroom procedure, asking the "court's indulgence" when he wanted more time to prepare his thoughts. He cross-examined government witnesses, seizing on inconsistency in reports, looking for holes to suggest he was set up.

Prosecutors urged jurors not to be fooled by Muhammad's courtroom demeanor. It was a facade, Assistant State's Attorney Vivek Chopra said in his closing.

"Scrub away that veneer that covers this man and see him for what he is," Mr. Chopra said, labeling Muhammad "a heartless, soulless, manipulating murderer."

Ten persons were killed and three were wounded during the three weeks of shootings in October 2002.

Victims were shot at gas stations, in parking lots, and a 13-year-old boy was struck by a bullet outside his Bowie middle school. The randomness sowed pervasive fear among people, who were afraid to pump gas, go out or send their children to school.

Muhammad and Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002, as they slept in the Caprice at a Western Maryland rest stop. Behind the back seat was the Bushmaster. Authorities discovered a hole bored in the trunk of the Caprice, allowing a shooter to lie inside to fire.

DOJ_NMG_0030184

A Virginia jury convicted Muhammad of a shooting at a Manassas gas station, and Malvo was given a life term for a shooting at the Home Depot in Falls Church. Montgomery County prosecutors say their case is insurance in case Muhammad's Virginia conviction is overturned.

The two men also are suspected in earlier shootings in Maryland, Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

The composition of Montgomery County's jury may be key to whether Muhammad is convicted.

Most candidates said during jury selection that they vividly remembered the shootings and knew that he had been convicted in Virginia.

Some of the jurors selected said they thought Muhammad was guilty, but they agreed to put that opinion aside and focus on the evidence.

Technology And Easy Credit Give Identity Thieves An Edge (NYT)

By John Leland And Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

PHOENIX — In a Scottsdale police station last December, a 23-year-old methamphetamine user showed officers a new way to steal identities.

His arrest had been unremarkable. This metropolitan area, which includes Scottsdale and Phoenix, has the highest rate of identity theft complaints in the nation, according to the Federal Trade Commission. Even members of the Scottsdale police force have had their identities stolen.

But the suspect showed officers something they had not seen before. Browsing a government Web site, he pulled up a local divorce document listing the parties' names, addresses and bank account numbers, along with scans of their signatures. With a common software program and some check stationery, the document provided all he needed to print checks in his victims' names — and it was all made available, with some fanfare, by the county recorder's office. The site had thousands of them.

The data were not as rich as some found in stolen mail or trash bins. But for law enforcement officials here, this was another turn in a cat-and-mouse game in which criminals have outpaced most efforts to stop them.

"We're trying to keep up with the technology," said Lt. Craig Chrzanowski, who runs Scottsdale's property crimes division, including a computer crimes unit started two years ago. "But they're getting a lot better."

In an economy that runs increasingly on the instantaneous flow of information and credit — aggressively promoted by banks and credit card companies despite the risks — Phoenix and its surrounding area provide a window on one of the system's unintended consequences.

According to a Federal Trade Commission survey in 2003, about 10 million Americans — 1 in 30 — had their identities stolen in the previous year, with losses to the economy of $48 billion. Subsequent surveys, by Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research company, found that the number of victims had declined to nine million last year but that the losses had risen to $56.6 billion.

In Arizona, one in six adults had their identities stolen in the last five years, about twice the national rate, according to the Javelin survey.

Arizona officials have responded with a preventive mantra: shred all documents and avoid giving Social Security numbers or bank account numbers to strangers over the telephone or the Internet. The State Legislature has passed tougher penalties for people caught stealing or trafficking in stolen identities.

But the real problem, many officials and consumer advocates say, lies elsewhere. In recent years banks have campaigned energetically to extend more credit to more people with fewer hassles, and retailers and consumers have embraced instant, near-anonymous access to credit.

Last year a group of prosecutors, law enforcement officers and security executives from banks and credit card associations met to discuss ways of curbing identity theft. The group had plenty of ideas, including PIN numbers or fingerprint verification for all credit card purchases and a ban on mailings that include blank checks.

But all ran counter to the promotional campaigns of banks and, banks say, to the desires of consumers.

"There's a disconnect between corporate leadership at financial institutions and their security departments," said Brad H. Astrowsky, a former prosecutor who was part of the group. "Marketing people are ruling the day in banking. They can do things to fix the problem, but they have no incentive and motivation to do it. Preventing something from happening is a cost. What's the benefit? It's hard to quantify."

A Hot Spot for Thieves

Several factors converge to make Arizona a hot spot for identity theft. Maricopa County, which includes Phoenix, is one of the fastest-growing counties in the nation, according to the Census Bureau, and its growth exaggerates trends that exist in many communities: a mobile population and high numbers of immigrants and retirees. It also has a heavy traffic in methamphetamine.

Methamphetamine users, whose binges keep them up for days in a row, have the time to sort through trash or old mail for Social Security numbers, bank account numbers or other identifying information, said Andrew P. Thomas, the county attorney. Dealers trade drugs for stolen identities that they use to launder their profits. Nearly half the identity theft cases in Mr. Thomas's office have a connection to methamphetamine, he said.

At the same time, he added, "More than half of the illegal immigrants entering the U.S. come through Arizona," creating a market for fraudulent Social Security numbers and driver's licenses.

Though Arizona passed the nation's first identity theft law in 1996, law officers say they are fighting a crime that is as swift and adaptive as the economy it exploits.

The newest wave of thefts here involves copying the magnetic strip from a victim's credit card onto the back of another. When thieves use the doctored cards, the transactions are charged to their victims' accounts. "Even if the cashier asks for my driver's license, the name on the front is going to match," said Todd C. Lawson, an assistant attorney general in Phoenix who specializes in identity theft prosecutions.

The machine to copy the magnetic strip, Mr. Lawson added, is the one nearly every hotel in America uses to recode room key cards.

And the county's Web site, which earned a place in the Smithsonian's permanent research collection on information technology innovation, has made Social Security numbers and other information, once viewable only by visiting the county recorder's office, accessible to anyone with an Internet connection. Police officers and prosecutors in Phoenix knew of just two cases involving public records, but most victims do not know how their identities are stolen.

For local law enforcement, pursuing even low-tech, small-time thieves is often complicated and expensive. The victim could be in Arizona, the thief in another state and the transactions spread all over the world. "If someone goes on the Internet and buys goods from Bangladesh, do you call witnesses from Bangladesh?" asked Barnett Lotstein, a special assistant county attorney.

Mr. Lawson said, "I don't think we prosecute 5 percent of it."

On a recent afternoon, Lt. Russ Skinner, who runs the county sheriff's computer crimes division, hefted three vinyl binders onto a wooden table. For the detectives in his unit, this is what the "crime of the 21st century" looks like: photographs of litter-strewn hotel rooms, and of a 33-year-old woman in various stages of methamphetamine-fueled decline.

When detectives caught up with her last August, after nearly three months of investigation, the woman was paying other users to steal mail for her — especially preapproved credit offers — and had parlayed those into credit cards or fraudulent accounts in 46 different names. She had secured housing, utilities and a series of small online loans in her victims' names.

"She wasn't the smartest or the most creative," Lieutenant Skinner said. "She just knew how to get it done."

A Connection to Drug Use

In the past, a drug user who needed money might go into a convenience store with a gun, Lieutenant Skinner said. "They're on the surveillance camera. They might get shot. They might get stopped in the parking lot for having a broken taillight," he said. "Now they can just sit at a computer, no one sees them and they can buy whatever they want."

Officials here began to notice a sharp rise in identity theft about five years ago, said Paul K. Charlton, United States attorney for the District of Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0030186

"The first tip-off was that we started to see a lot of mailbox break-ins by tweakers," Mr. Charlton said, referring to methamphetamine users.

When police officers raided home methamphetamine laboratories that were then proliferating on the outskirts of town, they found stacks of stolen mail or notebooks filled with credit card information. They also found thieves were using acetone, an ingredient used in methamphetamine production, to "wash" the ink off checks, a simple means of identity fraud.

These small laboratories lend themselves to identity theft rings, said John C. Horton, a White House aide in the Office of National Drug Control Policy. In a laboratory, one or two people typically have some technical knowledge, and others specialize in procuring materials.

Identity theft rings follow the same pattern, with a handful of grunts stealing mail for one person who knows how to turn the information into credit cards or checks, Mr. Horton said. "It doesn't seem to happen with cocaine or heroin because we don't produce heroin and cocaine in this country," he said. "Meth production is to some degree a social activity in the same way as identity theft."

Though the Arizona police have closed many laboratories, the identity theft rings have survived or multiplied.

From its commercial downtown, Phoenix extends in a patchwork of satellite communities, some so new that the highway connecting them does not appear on the maps in the central post office. In the mid-1990's, as Phoenix's population boomed, the Postal Service created cluster mailboxes that served whole housing developments. Like other conveniences associated with the city's rapid growth, the boxes have proved a boon for identity thieves.

"You can jimmy one open and get everyone's mail at the same time," said Mr. Lawson, the prosecutor. After numerous break-ins, the Postal Service has spent $12 million on reinforced mailboxes, but many communities here still have the old ones.

Some thieves drive around neighborhoods with their laptops until they find a resident's unsecured wireless Internet connection. If the police investigate a fraudulent purchase, they will trace it to the customer with the connection, not to the thief who placed the order.

Since 1994, a Phoenix security officer named Bob Hartle, frustrated by his own experience with identity theft, has led an often lonely campaign for tighter controls on organizations that handle people's data, and curbs on the way credit card companies, banks and stores grant credit.

Data breaches in the last year have exposed the personal information of more than 80 million Americans, according to the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit organization that follows identity theft. On May 3, a thief stole computer disks holding the names, Social Security numbers and other information of 26.6 million veterans from the residence of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee who had taken the data home without authorization. In most states, organizations are not required to tell consumers if their identities have been compromised.

"It's the sharing of data without necessary safeguards that enables this crime to grow as it has," said Torin Monahan, an assistant professor of justice and social inquiry at Arizona State University. "The response is always 'protect yourself, go to these workshops, get a shredder.' That diverts attention away from the extent to which these are systemic problems."

Seventeen states have passed "credit freeze" laws enabling consumers to prevent banks or credit agencies from issuing new accounts in their names.

But here, as in other states, businesses have successfully opposed such legislation.

"They're fighting us tooth and nail," said Mr. Hartle, who runs ID Theft Services Inc., a nonprofit organization that provides free help for victims.

"Banks, credit card companies, retailers want to make it easy to buy," Mr. Hartle said. "They write off identity theft as a cost of doing business. So whenever legislation comes up that's going to cost them money, they throw themselves against it."

Nessa E. Feddis, senior federal counsel for the American Bankers Association, said freezing credit could create problems for consumers, especially if they needed to get a new cellphone or change residences in a hurry.

"A credit freeze is one of those things that sounds like a good idea, but people don't realize how often they need to use their credit report," Ms. Feddis said. "There's a balance between security and convenience."

She continued, "We all want fraud to go away, but we don't want to take 20 extra minutes every time we do online banking. We like buying airline tickets online, but there's a risk."

DOJ_NMG_0030187

Though consumers worry about identity theft, Ms. Feddis said, banks absorb most of the losses.

Credit card companies point to new monitoring systems that have reduced loss from fraud as a percentage of overall transaction volume. At Visa, fraud accounted for 7 cents per $100 in transactions, down from 18 cents per $100 in 1990. "We could have a system reducing fraud to zero basis points, but it wouldn't meet what consumers are demanding," said Rosetta Jones, a Visa spokeswoman. "We need to deliver what consumers want in a way that is secure."

Fritz M. Elmendorf, a spokesman for the Consumer Bankers Association, described a chess match with identity criminals. For example, banks now protect prescreened credit card offers with address-matching technologies that make it harder for thieves to have cards sent to a drop address, Mr. Elmendorf said.

"There are more tools today than ever to ascertain the identity of a credit applicant," he said. "And the industry can point to a lot of things — some of which they won't talk about in detail — to validate people."

In the community of Chandler, southeast of Phoenix, Bobby Joe Harris questioned the efforts of businesses and banks to protect his identity.

Mr. Harris, 60, is a retired police chief. His wife, Judy, is a retired bank manager. Last December, Mrs. Harris was shopping at a Sam's Club store when a cashier said their membership had been canceled. When Mr. Harris tried to reactivate their membership in January, he learned that the store had issued a new credit card on their account to a woman who had said she was the couple's daughter.

"I don't have a daughter," Mr. Harris said. "I told the lady, 'I don't think so.' "

In two phone calls, possibly working with a store employee, the thief had raised the Harrises' credit limit to $10,000 from $3,500 and then to $15,000, and had run up charges of $11,093. No one had called them.

"It was only by luck that we found out," Mr. Harris said.

Seeking Protection

Though like most consumer victims the Harrises did not have to pay the bogus charges, they now pay $220 a year to LifeLock, a protective service that started last September in Phoenix.

The company's core service is simple: Whenever a bank or other business requests to look at a LifeLock subscriber's credit history, the company gets a fraud alert asking to confirm that the customer applied for credit. Federal law empowers consumers to get these alerts on their own, but they must reapply regularly to one of the three companies that issue credit reports.

Other companies offer different protections. None has had to prove that its services are effective.

When the Maricopa County recorder's office began posting records online in 1997, it was one of the first in the country to do so. Since then, legislatures in other states, including New York and Florida, have wrestled with whether — or how — to make their information available online.

A law in Florida requires that all Social Security and financial account numbers be stripped from online records by 2007, although new legislation may delay that another year.

In Phoenix, the county recorder's office posts 8,000 to 10,000 documents a day. Most are innocuous, but some, including divorce decrees and tax lien records, have sensitive information.

"I'm not insensitive to people's fear," said Helen Purcell, the county recorder. "I have the same fear. My information is out there, too." But it is far too late to start editing Social Security numbers or other data from the county Web site, she said. "We have 100 million documents out there now."

In the absence of full security, Arizonans cling to what protections they can. On a recent morning in Ventana Lakes, a development of older residents northwest of Phoenix, Lois Owen and Joan Schanks joined a small procession of neighbors to a community "shredathon" organized by the attorney general's office and AARP. Since the first shredathon last fall, residents around the state have carted 12 tons of paper to the mobile machines, in many cases supplementing the shredding they do at home.

"It's a big relief," Ms. Schanks said as she watched 20 pounds of old bank statements disappear. Yet even with the shredding, the residents here cannot begin to estimate how many people have their personal information, or how tempted any of those individuals may be to sell that information, Mr. Lawson, the prosecutor, said.

"You can take all the precautions you want," he said. "But everyone's exposed to a certain extent."

Insanity's Legal Fall From Grace (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, May 30, 2006

In the National Gallery of Art in Washington hangs a cherished Rembrandt titled Abraham's Sacrifice.

It is an etching of Abraham about to slay his son, Isaac, upon the orders of God, to show his faith. The scene from Genesis 22:1-12 is repeated in stained glass windows, paintings and other displays worldwide. It is also a scene being repeated in real life by demented individuals who believe that they have been given divine instructions to slay their loved ones.

In the past few months, the nation has found itself again in the middle of one of the law's greatest quagmires: how to define insanity, and when it should be a defense.

Last month, the U.S. Supreme Court heard argument in the case of Eric Michael Clark of Flagstaff, Ariz., who at 17 was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia in June 2000 when he killed a police officer whom he thought was an alien. The case might determine whether there is a constitutional basis for the insanity defense.

While Clark allegedly believed he was fighting aliens, many murder defendants in insanity cases believe they're acting on orders from a higher authority:

• In San Francisco, Lashaun Harris is on trial in the murder of her three kids, whom she allegedly threw into the frigid waters of San Francisco Bay in October. Harris believed that God wanted her children as a sacrifice, police said.

• In Houston, a new trial has been ordered for Andrea Yates, a suburban housewife who has admitted to drowning her five children — ages 7 years to six months — to save them from Satan. Despite a long and documented history of schizophrenia and postpartum depression, Yates was found sane and guilty in the first trial.

• In McKinney, Texas, Dena Schlosser was tried for a second time and found not guilty by reason of insanity (after a first jury deadlocked) in the killing of her 10-month-old daughter, Maggie, on orders from God.

• In Lamar, Colo., Rebekah Amaya was tried after telling police she killed her two kids upon orders from a spider. She was found insane.

• In Tyler, Texas, Deanna Laney was found insane after she crushed the skulls of her three children; she believed she was given instructions, like Abraham, from God.

The Hinckley precedent

These, and other recent cases, show a disturbing lack of consistency among the states on the insanity defense.

Much of this confusion can be traced to the acquittal of John Hinckley on the grounds of insanity after he wounded President Reagan and three others in 1981. It was too much for state legislators, who proceeded to drastically narrow the insanity defense.

Four states — Idaho, Kansas, Montana and Utah — have eliminated any defense that one is insane. Many states, such as Arizona, allow insanity to be used as defense only when defendants could not understand that their conduct was wrong.

Many people might know or suspect that an act is wrong but are unable to resist the impulse or stop themselves from doing the act. Indeed, they might believe that an otherwise "wrong" act is justified by divine instruction.

As for Abraham, he would have made an even worse defendant than Yates does. Abraham recounted how he was told by God, "Take your son, your only son, Isaac, whom you love, and go to the region of Moriah. Sacrifice him there as a burnt offering on one of the mountains I will tell you about."

Abraham, if he had not been stopped at the last second by an angel, would have been toast in Arizona. Genesis 22 shows Abraham displaying complete control and even subterfuge in bringing his son to the place of slaughter. Shortly before the planned killing, Abraham told his servants to hold back and allow him and Isaac to go forward alone.

Abraham took the wood for the burnt offering and placed it on his son Isaac, and he himself carried the fire and the knife. As the two of them went on together, Isaac spoke up.

"Father?"

"Yes, my son?" Abraham replied.

"The fire and wood are here," Isaac said, "but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

DOJ_NMG_0030189

Abraham answered, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son." And the two of them went on together.

Notably, in discussing the story of Abraham and Isaac, churches uniformly emphasize that, as one Internet site called rationalchristianity.net explains, "God's command to Abraham was not wrong, for God has the right to take human life and therefore had the right to command Isaac's death."

God's intervention

For defendants such as Yates, Schlosser, Laney and others, killings were compelled by the same motivation as Abraham's, albeit because of delusions of divine direction. They didn't have an angel who "called out ... from heaven, Abraham! Abraham!' ... 'Do not lay a hand on the boy.' ... 'Do not do anything to him. Now I know that you fear God."

From a defense standpoint, the angel was truly godsend. The convergence of religion, the law and insanity makes for the most difficult cases. Even so, just as religion teaches that we must obey the command of the Almighty even in killing a child, the law must recognize that troubled persons may be acting under the delusion of such orders.

When states fail to recognize the difference between a premeditated and delusional act, they commit an act every bit as immoral as disobeying the command of God.

CIVIL LAW:

Legal Help For Veterans (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

In a political twist, two conservative Republicans are trying to drum up more business for lawyers.

Sens. Larry E. Craig (Idaho) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) introduced a bill this month that would allow lawyers to represent veterans applying for disability pay and other benefits from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

The bill would overturn protections for veterans that date to the Civil War, when some lawyers siphoned money away from veterans while "helping" them obtain pensions, reenlistment awards or other payments. Congress put the kibosh on that by capping lawyers' fees at $5 (later upped to $10).

In 1988, Congress got rid of the fee limit when it created the Court of Appeals for Veterans Claims. But veterans may not hire a lawyer until their cases go through a lengthy administrative process to a VA appeals board, although lawyers may offer their services free.

Craig, chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, said in a written statement that the VA bureaucracy is so onerous that denying the nation's 24 million veterans the ability to retain legal representation hurts more than it helps.

"I suppose that some would still warn that lawyers are not to be trusted, but the reality is that the laws are complex and I want veterans to have the option of hiring an attorney," he said.

Graham said in a statement that "this overdue change will significantly improve [veterans'] access to the VA and expedite just outcomes."

The idea has support on the other side of the aisle. Rep. Lane Evans (Ill.), the top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, and Rep. Shelley Berkley (Nev.) are sponsoring a companion bill in the House.

Richard J. Hipolit, an assistant general counsel at the VA, said the department has not taken a position on the legislation. The claims process is not adversarial, he said. "We have a duty to assist, to help the veteran develop their claim."

Indeed, veterans have not exactly been left to decode the bureaucracy all by themselves. For years, veterans service organizations have provided free assistance in applying for benefits and rectifying problems.

The American Legion, for instance, has specially trained representatives -- most of them non-lawyers -- stationed at local VA offices to assist veterans, said Steven Smithson, the organization's deputy director for claims services.

DOJ_NMG_0030190

"They have access to the VA system. They are right there with the people who make the decisions," Smithson said. "Just because a person is an attorney doesn't mean they are going to be an effective representative."

Smithson said his group opposes letting lawyers in but wants the legislation to include safeguards such as fee limits and training requirements.

"Adding attorneys to the mix isn't necessarily going to fix things like staffing problems, quality of work, consistency, training deficiencies in the VA," he said. "This isn't going to make the system perfect."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Debating The Bugs Of High-Tech Voting (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The already-cantankerous debate over high-tech voting machines, which have been installed in great numbers in recent years, is growing more intense and convoluted as primaries get underway and the midterm election nears.

A coalition of voting rights activists and prominent computer scientists argues that some of the machines are not sufficiently secure against tampering and could result in disputed elections, while voting machine vendors and many election officials say that view is exaggerated.

The latest dispute occurred several weeks ago after it was discovered at a test in Utah that someone with a reasonable knowledge of computer code could gain access to and tamper with the system software on a popular brand of voting machine manufactured by Diebold Election Systems. The developments prompted California and Pennsylvania to send urgent warnings to counties that use Diebold's touch-screen voting systems to take additional steps to secure them.

But the vastly differing assessments of the severity of the problem offered by computer scientists, Diebold and election officials made clear that four years after Congress passed a law to improve the reliability of elections, Americans still lack definitive word on whether the nation's voting machines are secure.

In California, David Jefferson, a computer scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory who consults with the state on its elections, said he was "stunned when he found out" about the vulnerability identified in the Utah test and agreed with the "frequently expressed opinion that this is the worst vulnerability that we have ever seen."

But Diebold spokesman David Bear said it was a "functionality" that company engineers had built into the voting machines so their software could be easily updated, and it only becomes an vulnerability if an unauthorized person gains unfettered access to the machine, and there are safeguards against that happening.

State officials tried to strike a middle ground. "There certainly are potential security vulnerabilities that have arisen," said Jennifer Kerns, a spokeswoman for California's secretary of state. "But you have to be realistic about it: When you're administrating elections, there's a very low risk of any" tampering.

By passing the 2002 Help America Vote Act and spending more than $2 billion to upgrade voting machines nationwide, Congress hoped to avoid this kind of exchange. HAVA was a response to the contested 2000 presidential election in Florida, which had brought the use of old punch-card voting machines into focus.

The newer technology, such as touch-screen and optical scan systems, held the promise of making voting more secure, transparent and accessible. But as the new technology was implemented, voting rights activists raised questions about whether vendors had paid enough attention to security. Activists pushed for the use of technology that still provided a paper record.

Many of the criticisms of voting technology were originally dismissed as exaggerations promulgated by partisans displeased with election results. But the criticisms have been viewed with increasing gravity as prominent computer scientists have rallied behind them. Although it has not been shown that an election was compromised by a security flaw, several elections since 2000, including in this year's primaries, have experienced problems with the technology that have delayed results.

The federal Election Assistance Commission, which was created to help states implement HAVA's wide-ranging requirements, says it is in the midst of strengthening the process of federal certification for election systems. States and localities also have their own procedures.

DOJ_NMG_0030191

But voter groups have been unimpressed. They have pursued legal action to try to stop states from using the equipment, including in Arizona, California and New Mexico. Activists are also considering suits in Colorado, Florida, Missouri and Pennsylvania.

Unlike many colleagues in his field, Michael I. Shamos, a computer science professor at Carnegie Mellon University who has worked on election issues for about 20 years, has not generally been seen as a friend of the activists.

In 2004, they assailed Maryland's decision to buy Diebold touch-screen machines and asked a court to stop the state from using them. Shamos testified that with a few additional steps, the machines could be used without problem, and the court agreed.

Now, Shamos wonders. He is confident in his testimony and believes most security holes can be plugged. But he wonders whether Diebold cares enough about security and the sanctity of elections.

"There's a broader philosophical question that's been worrying me more and more lately," Shamos said. "What are these companies really doing? They don't seem to have embraced the seriousness with which people in this country take their elections. It's been kind of an adversarial thing where companies want to make profits, and they just haven't spent enough time and energy designing secure systems."

Bear says that is not true, and he repeats a frequent refrain about why the security concerns are overblown: "It's based on the premise that you have some nefarious or evil election official that's willing to commit a felony and break the law."

To which Shamos responds: "You don't want the success or failure of an election to be based on the individual."

Block The Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

In a country that spends so much time extolling the glories of democracy, it's amazing how many elected officials go out of their way to discourage voting. States are adopting rules that make it hard, and financially perilous, for nonpartisan groups to register new voters. They have adopted new rules for maintaining voter rolls that are likely to throw off many eligible voters, and they are imposing unnecessarily tough ID requirements.

Florida recently reached a new low when it actually bullied the League of Women Voters into stopping its voter registration efforts in the state. The Legislature did this by adopting a law that seems intended to scare away anyone who wants to run a voter registration drive. Since registration drives are particularly important for bringing poor people, minority groups and less educated voters into the process, the law appears to be designed to keep such people from voting.

It imposes fines of $250 for every voter registration form that a group files more than 10 days after it is collected, and $5,000 for every form that is not submitted — even if it is because of events beyond anyone's control, like a hurricane. The Florida League of Women Voters, which is suing to block the new rules, has decided it cannot afford to keep registering new voters in the state as it has done for 67 years. If a volunteer lost just 16 forms in a flood, or handed in a stack of forms a day late, the group's entire annual budget could be put at risk.

In Washington, a new law prevents people from voting if the secretary of state fails to match the information on their registration form with government databases. There are many reasons that names, Social Security numbers and other data may not match, including typing mistakes. The state is supposed to contact people whose data does not match, but the process is too tilted against voters.

Congress is considering a terrible voter ID requirement as part of the immigration reform bill. Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, introduced an amendment to require all voters to present a federally mandated photo ID. Even people who have been voting for years would need to get a new ID to vote in 2008. Millions of people without drivers' licenses, including many elderly people and city residents, might fail to do so, and be ineligible to vote. The amendment has been blocked so far, but voting-rights advocates worry that it could reappear.

These three techniques — discouraging registration drives, purging eligible voters and imposing unreasonable ID requirements — keep showing up. Colorado recently imposed criminal penalties on volunteers who slip up in registration drives. Georgia, one of several states to adopt harsh new voter ID laws, had its law struck down by a federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0030192

Protecting the integrity of voting is important, but many of these rules seem motivated by a partisan desire to suppress the vote, and particular kinds of voters, rather than to make sure that those who are entitled to vote — and only those who are entitled — do so. The right to vote is fundamental, and Congress and state legislatures should not pass laws that put an unnecessary burden on it. If they do, courts should strike them down.

Disgrace Unchecked (WP)

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

WE SAID IT three years ago and it's still disgracefully true: Maryland's treatment of juvenile offenders is one of the longest-running emergencies in state government. The sickening conditions that existed in the detention centers long before Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) denounced them during his campaign for governor still exist. Mr. Ehrlich promised to end the scandals and has talked periodically ever since about plans in the works. Yet independent monitors continue to roll out devastating reports.

Check out these comments last week by Ralph Thomas, who was the monitor from 2000 until last June, on reading the latest report from his successor, Katherine A. Perez: "It's the same thing: overcrowding, understaffing . . . health safety issues . . . child abuse . . . and continued assaults." In appropriately stinging reports, Ms. Perez described spotting a male staff member at the Thomas J.S. Waxter Children's Center in Laurel throwing punches at a girl who was acting up. She also found overcrowding, insufficient staffing and out-of-control behavior at facilities. At the Lower Eastern Shore Children's Center in Salisbury in March, Ms. Perez made an unannounced nighttime visit and, according to the Baltimore Sun, found 31 youths crammed into a facility designed for 24, including youths sleeping in plastic "boats" used as cots in bathrooms as well as bedrooms.

So how has the Ehrlich administration reacted? Ms. Perez, appointed by the governor this year to head the independent monitoring office, came under fire from Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. for issuing her reports. Mr. Thomas, too, said he had been attacked for writing reports that did not sit well with officials. Edward Hopkins, a Juvenile Services spokesman, told the Sun that the governor "has been supportive of everything that we've tried to do to rebuild this system and make it better for kids."

Whatever "everything" means, the response has been pathetic. True, the system was dysfunctional and badly run under Mr. Ehrlich's predecessor, Parris N. Glendening (D). But nearly four years have elapsed and the systemic problems persist. Mr. Ehrlich's opponents should seize on this huge failure with concrete proposals to commit the necessary funds and expertise for a respectable, effective program.

ANTITRUST:

Kinder Morgan In $13bn Management Buy-out (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

Kinder Morgan, the Texas-based midstream energy company, on Monday night received a takeover proposal worth $13.5bn in cash from its management and a group of private equity funds including Goldman Sachs.

If a deal is struck it will be the latest - and largest - in a recent string of proposed "management buy-outs" in the US, where executives offer to take their companies private with the help of private equity firms.

This month, Aramark, the food service and equipment rental company, received a $5.8bn takeover offer led by its management, while Kerzner International, the Bahamas-based casino and leisure group, will be taken private in a $3.5bn deal led by its founders.

The consortium bidding for Kinder Morgan is offering to pay $100 a share for the company, or an 18.5 per cent premium over the company's closing share price of $84.41 on Friday. The proposal may have been driven by a belief that the company's fortunes with public investors had passed their peak. Its shares hit a high this year of $103.45.

As well as Kinder executives Richard Kinder, Mike and Bill Morgan and Fayez Sarofim, members of the consortium include the buy-out units of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank, American International Group, the insurance giant, and US private equity firms Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings.

DOJ_NMG_0030193

The buyers would also take on about $8bn of the company's debt, bringing the total value of the proposed deal near to $22bn - or close to the $30bn Kohlberg Kravis Roberts paid for RJR Nabisco in the largest private equity deal in the late 1980s.

Kinder Morgan is one of the largest US midstream energy companies, operating natural gas and oil pipelines and terminals across North America.

The company expanded into Canada last year with the acquisition of Terasen for $3.1bn. Kinder Morgan also owns the general partnership in Kinder Morgan Energy Partners, one of the largest publicly traded pipeline limited partnerships in the US.

In a statement on Monday night, Mr Kinder, chairman and chief executive, said the takeover offer would benefit the partnership by allowing it to implement a new hedging facility for crude oil, and to acquire at an attractive price the Trans Mountain Pipeline, which connects Edmonton with Vancouver.

A deal to take Kinder Morgan private would represent the latest chapter in one of the more remarkable stories in the US energy industry. Only 15 years ago, Kinder Morgan was a small rural utility. But its assets grew rapidly through a series of acquisitions and its pipelines now serve key regional energy markets such as Chicago and Houston.

Kinder Morgan Gets Proposal To Take It Private (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Top management of Kinder Morgan Inc. proposed to take the oil-and-gas pipeline company private in a $13.5 billion deal that would be the largest management-led buyout in history and one of the largest leveraged buyouts ever.

Kinder Morgan Chief Executive Richard Kinder and other executives are offering $100 a share for the Houston-based company. That's a roughly 18% premium to Friday's New York Stock Exchange closing price of $84.41 but shy of the stock's 52-week high of $103.75.

Under the proposal, Mr. Kinder and others would contribute $2.8 billion of their existing shares to the newly private company, with another $4.5 billion coming from private-equity investors Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, American International Group Inc. and the Carlyle Group and its Riverstone Holdings affiliate.

If the deal is approved, the newly private Kinder Morgan would take on a total of $14.5 billion in debt, giving the transaction a total value of about $22 billion.

The biggest private-equity deal remains Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.'s $25 billion acquisition of RJR Nabisco Inc., completed in 1989. KKR also assumed $5.5 billion in debt as part of the transaction, which was a high-water mark in the deal-making bravado of the 1980s. A generation later, big dollars and ambitions are again reshaping the financial landscape.

The Kinder Morgan deal underscores how powerful private-equity firms have become, snapping up properties ranging from General Motors Corp.'s auto-lending arm to the film library of the MGM film studio. With Wall Street's help, they are issuing torrents of new debt, which remains relatively cheap and easy to sell to investors. Several of the largest private-equity firms have raised war chests exceeding $10 billion.

"Clearly a lot of money has moved into private-equity funds," the 61-year-old Mr. Kinder said in an interview yesterday. "It makes a transaction like this much more doable than it was before."

Mr. Kinder formed Kinder Morgan about a decade ago with roughly $40 million in assets he bought from Enron Corp., which he left in late 1996 after Kenneth Lay, then-chairman of Enron, declined to make him chief executive.

Since 1999, a series of acquisitions in the U.S. and Canada has pushed Kinder Morgan's shares up 155%, compared with a 24% gain for similar stocks tracked by data provider Baseline. Mr. Kinder's 18% stake in Kinder Morgan is valued at about $2.4 billion based on Friday's closing share price.

Mr. Kinder's success in expanding his company, which now has 43,000 miles of pipelines, terminals for distributing oil and gas and oil-sands assets in Alberta, Canada, stands in contrast to the fate of his former Enron colleague. Mr. Lay was convicted last week on several charges of fraud and conspiracy in connection with the 2001 collapse of Enron, and faces up to 45 years in jail. He plans to appeal.

Enron and Kinder Morgan took divergent paths to build their businesses. Enron initially built up its pipeline assets, but eventually embraced a business model based on trading. Kinder Morgan, by contrast, steadily added to its pipeline portfolio.

Today it transports more than two million barrels of gasoline a day, can store some 70 million barrels of oil and chemicals, and handles more than 80 million tons of coal each year.

Mr. Kinder's plans to take his company private are by no means certain. The company is convening a special board committee to review the fairness of his offer, which he called a "very nice top-end-of-the-market premium." In such situations, special committees often ask for, and receive, an improved price from potential buyers as a sign that there is no sweetheart deal in place.

There is also the chance a rival bidder could emerge with a better price and potentially wrest the company away from Mr. Kinder. He acknowledged that is "always a possibility," though it is clear his big stake in the company helps lower his own overall acquisition costs while providing a potential hurdle to interlopers.

Management buyouts can be controversial. The other shareholders sometimes grow skeptical of the motives, wondering if top executives -- with their understanding of the business -- see a long-term opportunity and are trying to grab it for themselves.

Kinder Morgan is tied into three different securities. The buyout target, Kinder Morgan Inc., is generally held by institutional investors. It is the general partner of Kinder Morgan Energy Partners LP, a tax-reducing master limited partnership that attracts primarily retail investors. Kinder Morgan Management, meanwhile, is a separate limited-liability company whose only significant assets are partnership units in Kinder Morgan Energy Partners.

The most valuable of Kinder Morgan's assets is a planned $4 billion pipeline that will extend from the Rocky Mountains to Ohio, and possibly on to Pittsburgh. The pipeline, which is under construction, would be the first major one built in the U.S. since the Alaska pipeline was completed in 1977. Customers have already committed to take up the pipeline's output, lowering the risk of the project.

The private-equity investors in the proposed buyout said they also were emboldened by Kinder Morgan's practice of publicly posting its annual budget each year. "In any deal, we always ask what can go wrong," said Henry Cornell, a managing director in charge of the Americas at Goldman Sachs, who worked on the proposal. "They have proven themselves for a decade, and you take comfort because they are betting their whole ranch," added Mr. Cornell, referring to the fact that the Kinder Morgan management team would roll over their entire holdings in the going-private transaction.

Those involved describe the buyout as a deal with moderate risks and modest potential returns, because it is so expensive and requires such a large equity investment. That's in contrast to recent deals in which buyout firms have bought companies, added substantial debt, and flipped them in a matter of months.

There are some potential pitfalls, though: The main one is whether the debt markets will remain robust enough to allow the financing to be completed.

The proposal comes at a time when private-equity firms are contemplating numerous deals in sectors from media to technology to retail. "It is a benign environment," Tony James, president of the Blackstone Group, told a recent conference. "Borrowing costs are low, the interest costs are manageable, there is a lot of leverage available. You have a rising stock market at your back and a booming economy."

As a result, adds David Rubenstein, co-founder of the Carlyle Group, speaking generally, "nothing is out of favor."

Part of the reason for the frenzy is the fear that the aversion to risk that has begun to assert itself in the stock market might spread to the debt market, damping investors' enthusiasm for financing big private-equity deals. But so far, there has been little sign that the appetite for lower-quality corporate debt has diminished.

A Kinder Morgan deal would represent a success for Goldman, a unit of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which is both a principal and adviser in the deal, at a time when it is being criticized for potential conflicts arising from such dual roles.

Other investment banks have scaled back their commitment to the private-equity business, at least partly in response to complaints from private-equity firms. But Goldman, which closed an $8.5 billion private-equity fund in April 2005, continues to operate in the big leagues, amid concerns from its chief executive that its private-equity arm is wading into takeover situations that may conflict with clients' interests.

Goldman has worked with Kinder Morgan since the company was established, looking for strategic opportunities for Mr. Kinder. Mr. Kinder called Goldman about two months ago with the idea that led to yesterday's proposal.

The proposed buyout, which requires shareholder approval, could close within three to six months.

Gas Giant Gets Offer For Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

A group led by Richard D. Kinder announced a buyout offer yesterday valued at $22 billion for Kinder Morgan Inc., the parent of the pipeline giant he founded in 1997.

The deal, which includes the assumption of about $8 billion in debt, would be the largest leveraged buyout since Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company bought RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion.

The offer by Mr. Kinder, a former president of Enron who was ousted after a dispute with Enron's founder, Kenneth L. Lay, is backed by a group of investors that includes Goldman Sachs, American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings. Mr. Kinder owns about 20 percent of Kinder Morgan.

Under the buyout's proposal, shareholders of Kinder Morgan would receive $100 a share in cash, an 18.5 percent premium over the $84.41 closing price of Kinder Morgan's shares on Friday.

Mr. Kinder; William Morgan, the company's co-founder; and two current directors, Fayez S. Sarofim, the billionaire financier, and Mike Morgan, William's Morgan son, will invest $2.8 billion in the transaction. The other investors will put in $4.5 billion. The group will also raise $14.5 billion to finance the rest of the deal.

After leaving Enron at the end of 1996, Richard Kinder started a pipeline business by buying some of Enron's assets and quickly expanding through a series of mergers and acquisitions.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Kinder said he wanted to take the company private, in part because he thought that investors had "discounted" Kinder Morgan's shares, which have traded as high as $103.75 in the last year.

He blamed the share slump on plans to build a $4 billion natural gas pipeline to link the Rocky Mountain region to the Eastern markets. While calling the offer fair, he said, "Clearly I and the rest of the management team think this has very good value or we wouldn't be doing this."

But the offer is not without risk. Mr. Kinder's bid could put Kinder Morgan in play, opening it to rival offers. Late yesterday, energy investment bankers who were not involved in the deal had started calling clients to evaluate their interest in a competing bid.

A special committee of Kinder Morgan's board has been formed to evaluate the offer. Typically in management buyouts, the buyers are eventually forced to increase their offer from their original bid to fend off counteroffers.

"If someone wants to present themselves, so be it," he said. "As someone once said, 'You're for sale every day on the New York Stock Exchange.' "

After leaving Enron, Mr. Kinder became known for his use of limited partnerships — contractual arrangements giving investors a direct ownership interest in assets and redistributing most of their income each quarter to their shareholders. These partnerships bought stable assets like pipelines that generated steady cash flows and then grew through acquisitions — increasing their payout.

In 1997, when the limited partnership Kinder Morgan Energy Partners was created from the Enron assets, the general partnership had an enterprise value of $325 million, reflecting equity minus debt, and only a handful of assets. The company is now one of the largest publicly traded limited partnerships operating pipelines. According to its Web site, it now has an enterprise value of more than $13 billion.

In 1999, Mr. Kinder engineered a merger between Kinder Morgan Energy Partners and KN Energy, a gas utility in the Midwest, which ultimately created Kinder Morgan Inc. That deal was followed by a number of smaller acquisitions that expanded its holdings in storage terminals, distribution networks and other so-called midstream assets.

Kinder Morgan now operates about 43,000 miles of pipelines of natural gas, oil, petroleum products and carbon dioxide. It also runs more than 150 terminals for gasoline and other petroleum products and provides natural gas distribution service to over 1.1 million customers. Mr. Kinder receives an annual salary of one dollar and receives no bonus, options or restricted stock.

Among its larger assets, Kinder Morgan owns Plantation Pipelines, one of the nation's main transportation networks for petroleum products, carrying gasoline from refineries on the Gulf Coast to markets on the Atlantic Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0030196

Bolstered by high energy prices, Kinder Morgan's latest project is to build a $4 billion, 1,300-mile natural gas pipeline linking the Rocky Mountains to markets in the East. Nicknamed the Rockies Express, the project would be one of the biggest new pipelines constructed in the United States in more than two decades.

Mittal Aims To Thwart Arcelor Deal (WSJ)

By Paul Glader, Jason Singer And Geoffrey T. Smith

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Mittal Steel Co.'s advisers over the weekend continued to seek support among Arcelor SA investors to thwart Arcelor's proposed deal with Russia's OAO Severstal, even as a potential pact involving another Russian steelmaker underscored the consolidation wave sweeping the industry.

In the Arcelor-Severstal white-knight arrangement, Arcelor would purchase the nearly 90% stake of Severstal owned by Chief Executive Alexei Mordashov, plus all of his other steel and mining assets. Mr. Mordashov, in return, would receive Arcelor shares and purchase more with cash, ultimately giving him a 32% stake in Luxembourg-based Arcelor and hefty managerial control. The proposed merger is valued at €13 billion ($16.54 billion).

Mr. Mordashov, 40 years old, would become president of the combined company and co-leader of the board, while Guy Dollé, Arcelor's chief executive, would be CEO.

In a separate potential deal, coal-and-steel producer Evraz Group SA is in talks to sell 40% of itself to Russian tycoon Roman Abramovich, a representative for Evraz's core shareholders said yesterday. The stake is valued at roughly $3 billion by current market values. Following on the heels of Severstal's deal, the Evraz talks show Russian investors could play a key role amid a heatedly consolidating world steel industry.

"Russian producers could now end up driving the process," said Al Breach, chief strategist at Moscow investment bank Brunswick UBS. Severstal's alliance with Arcelor "confirms to the world that Russia has re-emerged as a serious economic player," he said.

Mittal adviser Goldman Sachs Group Inc. continued over the weekend to solicit Arcelor shareholders to sign a letter that would call for an extraordinary shareholders meeting to try to make the deal subject to shareholder approval. The investment bank, along with a law firm, over the weekend had yet to tally at least 20% of Arcelor shareholders, a threshold needed to convene such a meeting, according to people familiar with the matter.

The letter, addressed to Arcelor Chairman Joseph Kinsch, said Arcelor's decision to force the deal through unless shareholders vote it down -- the opposite of how companies typically seek shareholder support by making a deal subject to shareholder approval -- was unacceptable, according to a copy of the letter reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

"Given the significance of the transaction, we would like to have the proposed Severstal combination be proposed to and approved by shareholders in a manner consistent with widely followed procedures across Europe and in accordance with best corporate governance practice," the letter reads. "Specifically, we would propose the approval procedure to consist of a two-thirds majority vote of all shares present or represented at a properly convened extraordinary general meeting of shareholders."

The proposed deal is the latest turn in a long-running drama atop the world's steel industry. Arcelor since January has been trying to repel the advances of rival Mittal, which recently launched a formal offer for the company. Arcelor's deal with Severstal will make it much harder for Mittal to seal a deal, and at least some Arcelor shareholders are expected to object strongly to it.

Wilbur Ross, the New York billionaire investor who sold his steel assets to the Mittal family in 2005 and is now a member of the Mittal board, criticized Arcelor's choice of a partner. "There are serious questions in the minds of Western institutions as to how good it is to have a Russian oligarch in charge of this company. What if [President Vladimir] Putin decides he doesn't like [Mr. Mordashov]? What happens to the company and the steel assets?" Mr. Ross said. "Of course, the oligarchs are not well known for corporate-governance concepts."

Mr. Ross and other Mittal executives said a decline Friday in Arcelor's share price and a rise in Mittal's showed the market supports its side. Yesterday in Paris, Arcelor's shares dropped 25 European cents to €32.80. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Friday, Mittal's American depositary receipts stood at $33.71, up $1.40. And yesterday in Amsterdam Mittal's shares rose 5%, or €1.25, to €26.25.

DOJ_NMG_0030197

Peter Marcus, a partner in World Steel Dynamics, a research firm in Englewood Cliffs, N.J., said in a recent report that the merger makes sense because "the world's other leading steel mills will be more encouraged to join the race to be No. 1" while the Mittal-Arcelor combinations "would have given Mittal Steel an insurmountable lead and, as a consequence, might have dampened the 'urge to merge' enthusiasm by other steel companies." The firm has advised Severstal on the merger and would receive a fee if the merger occurs.

Other analysts and consultants disagree, suggesting Mittal might make a better partner. "Severstal is exactly the kind of company Arcelor complained about Mittal being -- a developing company, a formerly centrally controlled economy company that needs spending," said Chuck Bradford, a New York-based steel analyst with Bradford Research/Soleil.

Separately, Evraz founder and departing Chairman Alexander Abramov and his successor, Alexander Frolov, are preparing to sell as much as half of Crosland Global Ltd., the offshore holding company through which they own more than 82% of Evraz, to Millhouse Capital, the investment company of Mr. Abramovich, the Russian tycoon. Evraz is registered in Luxembourg but has most of its operations in Russia.

Millhouse, which declined to comment, hasn't signaled any intention to be a long-term investor in the steel industry.

FCC Is Set To Take Fresh Look At Media Ownership (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Republicans in the majority at the Federal Communications Commission for the first time in 14 months, the agency is poised to begin tackling a host of contentious issues, including changes to media ownership limits.

Senate confirmation Friday of Republican Robert McDowell to fill an empty commission seat marks the beginning of a more active phase at Chairman Kevin Martin's FCC, which has been idle on several fronts while deadlocked 2-2 between Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. McDowell's arrival is likely to have an immediate impact on one issue: consideration of Time Warner Inc.'s and Comcast Corp.'s deal to split Adelphia Communications' assets. Commission Democrats had hoped to impose several conditions, including tougher Internet protections than those required of AT&T Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. in their respective mergers last year.

Even before Mr. McDowell was confirmed, the FCC chairman had begun circulating proposals among the other commissioners to reopen two issues: media ownership limits and a requirement that cable operators carry multiple channels from local broadcasters after the transition to digital television instead of just one.

A vote to reopen the debate of media ownership limits may occur at the FCC's regularly scheduled meeting next month, agency officials said. The FCC will take a comprehensive look at what changes should be made, but the review isn't expected to be completed this year.

Even the whiff of possible FCC action has been enough to prompt a stir. Mississippi Republican Senator Trent Lott and Democratic Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota last week sent a letter asking Mr. Martin to have the commission address the issue of local broadcast content before acting on new media ownership rules. An FCC task force was created in 2004 to study the issue, but no report has been issued.

Meanwhile, the cable industry is gearing up to oppose Mr. Martin's must-carry proposal, which has been on broadcasters' wish-list for several years.

"The FCC has twice rejected multicasting and Congress also rejected it during the last session, so there's no evidence that it should be approved," said Brian Dietz, a spokesman for the National Cable & Telecommunications Association.

National Parks To Stay Ad-Free (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030198

The national parks will not become a new frontier for American advertisers anytime soon.

Park Service Director Fran P. Mainella upheld tight restrictions on advertising and marketing in the parks this month when she issued new guidelines that did not include changes that would have permitted some employees to solicit donations and give donors the right to slap their names on rooms, benches and bricks.

Another change proposed last year, and recently rejected by Mainella, would have allowed the Park Service to accept alcohol and tobacco company donations for the first time.

"Some level of donor recognition, if tastefully done, is a good idea," Deputy Park Service Director Stephen P. Martin said. "Too much of it, and it can go downhill really fast."

About $100 million in donations and $150 million in entrance fees augment the taxpayer funds that support the national park system, which has an annual budget of about $2.2 billion.

Park rangers and other employees, advocacy groups and environmentalists complained that the proposals would have opened the door to an unseemly amount of commercialization. The guidelines were last set in 1998 and are supposed to be reviewed every five years.

Much of the private support for national parks is contributed through the National Park Foundation, chartered by Congress in 1967. Companies such as American Airlines Inc., Discovery Communications Inc., Eastman Kodak Co. and Ford Motor Co. have each donated $5 million or more.

Alaska The 'poster State' For Climate Concerns (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, May 30, 2006

FAIRBANKS, Alaska — To the untrained eye, Bonanza Creek forest is breathtaking, a vibrant place alive with butterflies and birds, with evidence of moose and bear at every turn.

But look through forest ecologist Glenn Juday's eyes, and you see a dying landscape.

Since the 1970s, climate change has doubled the growing season in some places and raised state temperatures 6 degrees in the winter and 3.5 on average annually since 1950, says Juday, a professor at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks. Drought is stressing and killing spruce, aspen and birch trees.

Alaska has emerged as the poster state for global warming, the worldwide climate effect that many scientists attribute to higher concentrations of "greenhouse" gases — mostly carbon dioxide created by burning fossil fuels — that capture the sun's heat in the atmosphere.

Global warming is a hot topic, especially now. Former vice president Al Gore is back in the news with the release of his acclaimed documentary on warming, An Inconvenient Truth. And President Bush — who has been criticized by environmental groups that say he has been slow to acknowledge the dangers posed by warming — said last week that "people in our country are rightly concerned about greenhouse gases and the environment."

Alaska is important in measuring the effect of global warming on the USA because what happens here soon will be felt in the Lower 48 states, say experts such as Robert Corell, a senior fellow at the American Meteorological Society.

The spruce budworm, aspen leaf miner and the spruce bark beetle, pests once kept in check by winter cold, are flourishing here. Statewide, insect outbreaks have killed more than 4 million acres of forest in a decade and a half, says John Morton, a biologist at the Kenai National Wildlife Refuge in Soldotna.

Fires, long an integral part of the forest ecology here, are burning millions of acres as summers get longer and hotter, says Scott Rupp, a University of Alaska-Fairbanks professor of forestry. And with each wave of fires, trees have a harder time coming back in the increasingly warm and dry landscape.

This great northern forest may end up a grassland. "Soon, people will be coming to the great plains of Alaska," Juday says.

Alaska is ahead of the climate-change curve because polar regions warm the fastest. They had long been kept frigid by vast regions of snow and ice that reflect 70% of the sun's energy back out to space.

But higher temperatures are shrinking that snow and ice cover. In the Arctic, summer sea ice has shrunk 15% to 20% in the past 30 years, according to 2005's Arctic Climate Impact Assessment report.

DOJ_NMG_0030199

And as the snow and ice recede, the sun's rays are hitting more dark ground and water, which absorb most of the heat, reflecting just 20% of the energy away, says Matthew Sturm, a research scientist with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory in Fairbanks.

Lakes and ponds are disappearing as the permafrost, permanently frozen ground that underlies much of Alaska north of Fairbanks, melts.

"It's like pulling the plug in a bathtub," says Peter Schweitzer, an anthropologist who works with the Arctic peoples in Alaska and Russia.

In some areas, as much as 40% of surface water has disappeared, taking with it vital habitat for ducks and other waterfowl, says Juday.

The permafrost that underlies much of the central and north of the state is a relic from the last Ice Age. Some of the frozen ground under Fairbanks is 100,000 years old, says Vladimir Romanovsky, a permafrost expert at Fairbanks. And now, he says, it's starting to get "slushy."

For Ruth Macchione, that meant a more expensive design to her new home after the cabin her husband built in the 1950s sank into the ground. The permafrost under the cabin thawed because the structure wasn't built to keep the ground cold — a key trick in building in frigid regions.

Her new home incorporates piers to allow cold air to circulate underneath it.

"Local engineers are getting worried about higher ground temperatures, so they're specifying more pilings to combat that," says Billy Connor, director of the Alaska University Transportation Center. That will mean higher construction costs across the state, Sturm says.

More heat means longer summers. The growing season in Fairbanks has gone from 80 to 120 days since records were first kept in the 1900s, says John Walsh, director of the Center for Global Change and Arctic System Research at the University of Alaska-Fairbanks.

But those summer days haven't come with any more rain, so plants and trees adapted to short, cool summers grow quickly but then dry out while it's still warm. That's one reason forest fires have become such a problem, he says.

Hotter summers aren't just a problem here. In the Midwest and East, a few extra degrees can bring on higher milk prices. That's because cows don't like it hot. When the mercury gets over 80 degrees, milk production drops.

"Last year, we had herds that were down 5 to 15 pounds of milk per cow, and they'll usually be making 65 to 75 pounds" a day, says Larry Chase, a professor of animal science at Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y.

In the Midwest, the corn belt is shrinking, says S. Elwynn Taylor, a professor of agricultural meteorology at Iowa State University in Ames. Especially at the western edges in Nebraska and the Dakotas, areas that were marginal for corn and soybeans are now unable to economically grow them.

David Lobell, an environmental scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in Livermore, Calif., says that for every 2-degree increase in growing-season temperature, farmers can expect a 17% decline in yield for both corn and soybeans.

Taylor isn't convinced that the warming isn't simply part of a larger climate pattern that has been seen in the Midwest since about 1850.

He is not alone. Other scientists see warming as part of a cyclical climate change, but they are outnumbered by colleagues who say the planet is warming steadily because human activity is adding to the greenhouse gases.

A landmark 2001 report by the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change forecast that the average global surface temperature will increase 2.5 to 10 degrees above 1990 levels by 2100.

In White Mountain, a village of 200 on the western coast of Alaska near Nome, stocking up the larder is harder now for Rita Buck, a native Alaska Inupiaq and health practitioner at the town clinic.

Buck's year used to be a steady flow of work. First came salmon fishing, then harvesting berries. Salmonberries, a type of raspberry, would arrive first, then blueberries, blackberries and finally cranberries. Berries make up an important part of the subsistence diet.

But now, she says, the berries are blooming too early, when frost is still a danger. "It freezes all the berry blossoms and stops them growing," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0030200

Cherry growers in Michigan, the nation's primary grower of tart cherries for pies, are having much the same problem. Spring now arrives seven to 10 days earlier there than in the 1970s, but cold snaps still come when they always have.

The commonly grown cherry variety isn't cold-hardy, so once it comes out of dormancy, it has no resistance to freezing, says Jeffrey Andresen, an agricultural meteorologist with Michigan State University in East Lansing.

"In 2002, early warming brought the tart cherry crop out of dormancy, and then a two-day freeze in April resulted in an almost complete loss for the year," he says.

Growers may have to plant new, more cold-hardy varieties, which won't be cheap, Andresen says. "You can't just pick up the trees and move them somewhere else."

In Alaska, the sea ice that armors the coastline against winter storms is forming a week later than it used to, says David Atkinson, a Fairbanks professor of atmospheric science.

The state accounting office, worried about the cost of moving at-risk communities, estimates that more than 100 coastal villages potentially face danger as winter storms erode their once-protected shorelines. The open water makes for stronger storms. Some areas have lost 30 to 40 feet of beach in a single storm, Atkinson says.

Warmer winters also are creating problems for California farmers of high-value crops such as peaches, plums, nectarines, almonds, pistachios and walnuts, which need a period of cold in the winter to bloom properly.

A series of warm winters has played havoc with fruit production, says Theodore DeJong, a professor of plant science at the University of California-Davis. Farmers may have to switch out their current trees with low-chill varieties, expensive but at least a solution.

But for the trees that grow plums for prunes, that's simply not an option. It would take 10 to 20 years to develop low-chill varieties of these trees, DeJong says.

Packers already are moving some production to Chile. There could soon come a day when California, which grows 95% to 98% of all plums in the USA, is out of the business entirely.

The huge fires that have hit Alaska in the past few summers filled the air with so much smoke and ash that people in Fairbanks at times wore dust masks and doctors told asthmatic patients to leave town until the fires were out.

But it doesn't take a fire to make air unhealthy, says Paul Epstein, associate director of the Center for Health and the Global Environment at Harvard Medical School.

U.S. asthma and allergy rates are increasing in part because more carbon dioxide in the atmosphere is supercharging the production of pollen that can trigger them, he says. When carbon dioxide is doubled, ragweed stems grow 10% more but pollen increases by 60%.

"Pollen counts of 120 used to be cause for alert. We're seeing counts like 6,000 now," Epstein says.

Warmer winters also mean insects can survive and thrive in places where the cold used to keep them in check. Lyme disease is spreading beyond the former winter confines of the tick that carries it. And West Nile virus is spreading farther because spring drought amplifies the cycle of the bird-biting mosquito, Epstein says.

Ten years of change in the Arctic region is a preview of 25 years of change in the rest of the world, says Corell of the American Meteorological Society.

But that's not to say that path is cast in stone. Even researchers such as University of New Hampshire earth science professor Cameron Wake, who tracks phenomena such as the earlier arrival of spring, see a silver lining in this cloud.

"This country is at its best when it has a grand challenge, whether it's World War II or going to the moon," Wake says. "This is the next grand challenge."

Songs From The Wood (NYT)

By Scott Weidensaul

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

I SAT on my farmhouse's back step in the low light of dawn, watching two blackpoll warblers — slim, streaky and hyperkinetic — flit through the new leaves of the maples, which the sun turned into tiny lenses of green.

DOJ_NMG_0030201

My trees were a way station for these birds, moving between their winter home in South America and their destination to the north — the boreal forest, the vast shield of spruce and aspen, of muskeg and marsh, that stretches from Newfoundland to western Alaska. Larger than even the Amazon, North America's boreal zone is one of the biggest intact ecosystems left on the planet, with 1.4 billion acres in Canada alone, most of it still in immense, interlocking tracts that make up a quarter of the earth's remaining original forest.

With its southern fringe running just across the border from northern New England and the upper Great Lakes, the boreal forest is largely unknown to most people in the United States. Its most visible product, however, is now flooding our backyards with welcome color and song. The boreal forest is the continent's matchless bird nursery: some three billion individuals of nearly 300 species breed there, from trumpeter swans to delicate warblers, migrating across the entirety of the United States to return there. In autumn, they scatter to the farthest corners of the hemisphere, leading some scientists to suggest that the boreal has a greater global impact than perhaps any other single ecosystem.

Despite centuries of logging and development, most of the boreal is still intact. But over the next decade, timber, energy and mineral development will accelerate across the region, including a natural-gas pipeline through the heart of the Mackenzie Valley in the Northwest Territories that will speed the extraction of oil from the vast tar-sand deposits beneath Alberta's boreal forests.

Because this region is so huge, though, we have a chance to get it right this time — to upend the typical approach to conservation. Instead of protecting a few patches of natural habitat, we have the opportunity to save immense, functioning ecosystems as the matrix, with islands of carefully managed development in between.

This isn't just a pipe dream. The Boreal Forest Conservation Framework, which calls for protecting fully half of Canada's forest while promoting sustainable development on the remainder, has attracted support from a remarkable array of traditional adversaries. These include territorial and provincial governments, Canadian Indian tribes, environmental groups like the World Wildlife Fund and the Nature Conservancy, and (most important) industrial giants like Suncor Energy and large paper companies like Domtar and Alberta-Pacific Forest Industries.

One reason for this unusual degree of cooperation and farsightedness is simple self-interest. In the case of the Mackenzie pipeline, cooperation may finally lay to rest legal challenges by tribes that have stalled development for more than 30 years. In other cases, American consumers are helping to drive change. Most of the wood pulp from boreal forests, for example, goes into products like tissue paper, catalogs and half the newsprint sold in the United States; Canadian logging companies are signing on to the conservation framework to avoid growing pressure from environmental groups in this country. Tembec, a $4 billion forest products enterprise that was an original signatory for the framework, has pledged to bring all 40 million acres of its timberland into compliance with the development standards set by the international Forest Stewardship Council.

Governments have also begun to recognize the economic importance of a vibrant, healthy boreal forest. A recent study found that the ecological benefits of Canada's boreal forest — including clean water, carbon sequestration and pest control by migratory birds — are worth more than $80 billion annually, two and a half times the extractive value of its resources.

But there is much the Canadian government can still do to protect this incomparable region, in addition to supporting the goals of the boreal framework. It has yet to address the heavy environmental impacts of tar-sand extraction, which range from the strip-mining of immense areas to the use of staggering quantities of fresh water. In the Northwest Territories, one of the most pressing needs is to identify (with the help of the aboriginal groups there) and preserve significant swaths of the most critical natural areas in the Mackenzie Valley before the pipeline is routed and built. The time to draw up a workable — and visionary — plan to safeguard the boreal is now.

Most Americans will never visit the boreal forest, never watch woodland caribou flow over the crest of a hill by the hundreds, never hear the howl of gray wolves echo through the conifers. But the boreal touches us every spring, as the birds it scatters to the world come back again. And if we're wise, we can ensure that it will always be so. Sitting on the porch, I realized the warblers had moved on. They were already feeling the boreal's timeless pull, tugging them north again.

Your Congress At Work (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0030202

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Not a day goes by that our elected representatives don't moan about high energy prices. But faced with an opportunity earlier this month to do something about it, they drilled another dry political hole.

A bipartisan coalition voted to maintain a ban on offshore oil and natural-gas exploration in the 85% of the Outer Continental Shelf that has been off limits since 1981. The ban extends from three miles offshore, where federal jurisdiction begins, to 200 miles, where U.S. territorial waters end. "Our coasts are too valuable to risk this," said New Jersey Democrat Frank Pallone, invoking the usual aesthetic and environmental concerns. The vote on allowing oil and gas exploration was 279 to 141, with 94 Republicans joining nearly every Democrat.

Where to begin? Katrina was the most destructive hurricane in decades, yet it caused not a spill of oil in coastal waters. As for natural gas, it doesn't spill; it's a gas. Yet a separate measure in the Interior Department appropriations bill to allow drilling only for gas was stripped out by a vote of 217 to 203, with 59 Republicans voting to maintain the ban.

As the nearby chart shows, this kind of restriction on U.S. gas exploration has a real impact on prices, and thus on American economic growth. Unlike oil, natural gas is a not a global commodity with a single world price. Unless gas can be transported by pipelines, it must be chilled into liquified form and shipped. Yet only 3% of the world's gas is currently shipped -- which means that gas prices vary based on local supply and demand. So limits on U.S. exploration directly affect U.S. natural gas prices.

Overall natural gas demand has been surging, in part because environmentalists gave it their blessing as a "clean" fuel 20 years ago. American electric utilities use 41% more natural gas than they did a decade ago, and that trend is set to continue. Former Interior Secretary Gale Norton said recently that 90% of the power plants due to come online in the next five years will be gas-fired. This is due largely to a big push to reduce carbon emissions from electricity generation. All of this will put further pressure on prices.

Natural gas is also an important feedstock in cosmetics, plastics, fertilizers and the rest of the chemical industry. That fertilizer is, in turn, used to grow the crops that the bio-mass movement wants to turn into "renewable" fuels. But 90% of the cost of fertilizer is tied to the cost of natural gas, so the U.S. fertilizer industry is moving overseas in search of cheaper raw materials; capacity is down 36% from its highs.

Meanwhile, those exploitative capitalists in Cuba are now exploring for gas in its territorial waters, some of which lie just 45 miles off American shores. But American companies cannot drill on the U.S. side of that line. Canadian companies drill for natural gas in the Canadian waters of the Great Lakes, but once again the American side is off-limits. The absurdities of our current policy go on and on.

Congressman John Peterson (R., Pa.) is sponsoring another bill to lift the moratorium on natural-gas exploration (but not oil) for waters 20 miles or more from shore. That would put any rigs safely out of sight of land. His bill already has more than 160 co-sponsors, and he hopes that removing the aesthetic objection that gas rigs ruin the ocean view will attract more votes. We wish him luck, but on the evidence so far Congress simply isn't serious about expanding American energy supplies.

Energy Shortage (NYT)

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

Sherwood Boehlert, the moderate Republican who will retire this fall, observed on the floor of the House last week that despite polls showing conservation as the "preferred option" among Americans worried about high gas prices and oil dependency, "this Congress has not voted on a single conservation measure since gasoline hit $3 a gallon." At which point his colleagues voted (yet again) to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling in the misguided but apparently unshakable belief that a nation that uses one-quarter of the world's oil while possessing 3 percent of its reserves can drill its way to lower prices.

The legislative outlook is brighter in the Senate, which has before it the Enhanced Energy Security Act of 2006. The bill has impressive bipartisan sponsorship and incorporates the best features of an earlier (and more cumbersomely named) vehicle called the Vehicle and Fuel Choices for American Security Act. Its stated purpose is to reduce oil dependency, but the strategies and technologies it encourages would also do much to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The bill would require the president to figure out ways to cut oil consumption by 2.5 million barrels — 12.5 percent of current use — by 2016, and cut it in half by 2031. It offers a menu of loans, direct subsidies, tax breaks and other incentives that would encourage the production of fuel-efficient cars as well as gasoline alternatives like cellulosic ethanol. It does not mandate specific improvements in fuel economy standards — a Congressional red flag — yet the goal it sets would get us to the same place.

There is also real money here — $1.8 billion for hybrid "plug-in" vehicles, for instance, $1 billion for cellulosic fuels. And while anything is possible in a Congress habituated to pork, the bill is not yet encumbered with the special favors and tax breaks for the oil and gas industry that have disfigured recent energy bills. It would, in fact, repeal some of those breaks in an effort to lessen its cost.

This is a relatively straightforward bill with big ambitions — to reduce the demand for oil, thus reducing America's contribution to global warming while enhancing its national security. President Bush, who has made so much of the dependency issue without offering legislation of his own, would do the country a great favor by getting behind it.

Drug Kingpin's Help Reduces His Sentence (DDN)

By Rob Modic

Dayton Daily News, May 27, 2006

DAYTON — Federal prosecutors were so pleased with the cooperation of a local drug kingpin that they sought a vast reduction in his sentence from the advisory guidelines for federal judges.

As a result, John Raymond "Ray-Ray" Senter was sentenced Friday to six years in prison. He's served a third of it already.

U.S. District Judge Thomas M. Rose said the federal sentencing guidelines recommended 21 years and 10 months to 26 years, 10 months.

Rose, who sealed a transcript of a closed hearing about Senter, said he "has made significant assistance."

Senter's twin, John Benjamin "Benji" Senter, will be sentenced at a later date.

The brothers were at the top of a drug conspiracy that shipped hundreds of pounds of cocaine and marijuana into the Dayton area in the 1990s, according to court documents and an investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and Drug Enforcement Administration.

Senter, 32, told Rose, "Since I was locked up, there has been a change in me. I found the Lord, and I found drugs was a big part of what I have done. Using drugs. It's been a burden to my mother and my kids and loved ones."

The sentence paled in comparison to another "top tier" defendant in the same case, Darnell "No Limit" Collier, 36, who also pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 15 years and six months in prison, the longest imposed on 10 other co-defendants. Only John Benjamin Senter awaits sentencing.

The group was indicted in March 2004 following a July 24, 2003, seizure by IRS and DEA agents of 600 pounds of marijuana at the Wilberforce residence of co-defendant Clifton "Tip Ingles" Ingles. At the time, Russ Neville, agent in charge of the DEA, said the seizure was the largest for marijuana in either Montgomery or Greene counties.

Drug Trafficking Worth 35 Years (SANEWS)

By DARRYL Q. TUCKER, THE SAGINAW NEWS

The Saginaw News (MI), May 26, 2006

BAY CITY -- A Saginaw man is headed to prison for his role in transporting cocaine to Saginaw in a drug operation that sparked a shootout and left two police officers injured and two men dead.

James R. Sylvester, 49, who has no known address, will spend the next 35 years behind federal bars for conspiring to deliver cocaine and trafficking in crack cocaine, cocaine, oxycontin, valium, vicodin and marijuana Feb. 25, 2003.

A jury convicted Sylvester of the drug charges. Jurors also found him guilty of possessing a firearm as a felon and possessing a firearm while using an illegal controlled substance.

U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson sentenced him.

"Armed drug trafficking is a path with no way out other than violence or prison," said U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy.

In 2004, Saginaw County Circuit Judge Fred L. Borchard sentenced Shay S. Irwin, 32, and Anthony J. Watson, 36, to 25 to 50 years in prison for their roles in the shootout at 2207 Jerome. A jury convicted the pair of assault with intent to rob while armed, conspiring to commit that crime, conspiring to possess more than 650 grams of cocaine and possessing a firearm as a felon, plus four counts of possessing a firearm while committing a felony.

Jurors also found Watson guilty of carrying a concealed weapon and carrying a dangerous weapon with unlawful intent.

This year, a state appellate court upheld the convictions and sentences.

Saginaw Township Police Officer Michael Cohee, who was serving as a member of the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team, or BAYANET, suffered a gunshot wound to the abdomen. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Tyler Kruse suffered a bullet wound to the face. Both officers recovered.

Charles R. Aldridge and Erin D. Murrell died in the shootout.

Investigators said Watson and Irwin were involved in a plan to ambush Vicky L. Loos and her boyfriend, Jose Escobar, when the couple returned to their home with 5 kilograms of cocaine they had picked up in Los Angeles. v

Jury Finds Drug-ring Suspects Guilty (DNT)

By John Pirro

Danbury (CT) News Times, May 29, 2006

Three men, one a Danbury resident, face lengthy prison terms after being convicted of participating in what federal prosecutors called a "large scale" powdered and crack cocaine trafficking ring.

A U.S. District Court jury in Bridgeport deliberated for one day before returning guilty verdicts on Thursday against Warren Hawkins of Danbury and Jose Luis Rodriguez and Arcadio Ramirez of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Hawkins, 35, faces up to 30 years in prison, Rodriguez could be sentenced to between 10 years and life behind bars and Ramirez could draw a term of between 5 and 40 years when they are sentenced on Aug. 11.

The three men are the last of 24 people arrested by local police and federal investigators last year when they broke up an drug-selling operation that had been active in the city for several years.

The ring was headed by former Danbury resident Alex Luna, who pleaded guilty to narcotics and firearms charges in March. Luna is scheduled to be sentenced June 13.

Prosecutors said Hawkins was a street-level dealer who was overheard on a court-authorized wiretap ordering cocaine from Luna.

Rodriguez and Ramirez were among several individuals who regularly made trips between New York City and Danbury, smuggling in kilogam-sized shipments of cocaine. The drugs were usually carried in cars equipped with hidden compartments to avoid detection, authorities said.

Rodriguez was the only defendant to testify during the trial, which began on May 10. He denied any knowledge or involvement with the ring.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor praised the efforts of Danbury police and federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in breaking up the ring.

"The federal penalties for cocaine and crack distribution are severe, and it is our hope that this successful operation will deter others in Danbury from attempting to follow in Mr. Luna's and his associates' footsteps."

Suspect Ordered To Substance Program (SEQCT)

By Monica Keen, Staff Writer

Sequoyah County Times, May 26, 2006

A federal judge ordered a man, who is accused along with eight others of operating a drug trafficking ring, to participate in a substance abuse program after he failed a drug test, violating a condition of his pre-trial release.

According to court minutes filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Muskogee, the court allowed David Nelson, 44, to remain free on bond, under the same conditions previously ordered by the court. The judge also ordered Nelson to participate in a program of inpatient or outpatient substance abuse therapy or counseling if deemed advisable by the pretrial services officer, according to court minutes.

Nelson is one of eight people named in a criminal drug conspiracy complaint, filed by an agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). Nelson was arrested May 2, along with his wife, Twila Nelson, 33, and others, including Sallisaw residents Travis E. Philpot, 28, Paul Philpot, 61, Rhonda Valdivia, 38, Samuel L. Valdivia, 43, Hoyet W. Philpot, 57, and Pamela S. Pearson, 44.

The suspects are accused of conspiring to possess a controlled substance with intent to distribute and distribution of a controlled substance. The criminal complaint alleges that the suspects were involved in a multiple-state drug ring.

The Nelsons, Pearson, and Hoyet Philpot were each released on $5,000 bonds on the day of their arrest. But according to a petition filed Monday in U.S. District Court, David Nelson violated a condition of his pre-trial release by testing positive for the presence of marijuana.

A hearing set Thursday for another suspect in the case, Pearson, was reset for 10 a.m. June 5.

Paul and Travis Philpot and Rhonda Valdivia, all of Sallisaw, were released from the Muskogee City/County Jail on bonds May 5 and were ordered to abide by a variety of stipulations, including that they have no contact with any other defendants or witnesses in the case, with the exception of each other. Travis Philpot was ordered back in jail May 8 after contacting a witness named in the case the night of his release from jail. Samuel Valdivia remains in jail without bond.

Timmy Smith Gets 30-month Sentence (DENP)

By Alicia Caldwell

Denver Post, May 27, 2006

Timmy Smith, a former Washington Redskins running back who helped beat the Broncos in Super Bowl XXII in 1988, was sentenced Friday to 30 months in federal prison for dealing cocaine.

Smith, 42, also was ordered to pay $88,000 in unpaid child support.

Chief U.S. District Judge Lewis Babcock ordered Smith, who is out on bail, to report to prison July 10.

Federal agents arrested Smith and his brother, Christopher Smith, last year after 20 ounces of cocaine worth $13,600 was handed off to an undercover agent in Greenwood Village.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents had recorded several drug deals involving the Smith brothers, according to court documents.

Smith was accused of working with his brother in selling cocaine to an informant eight times in 2005, according to a federal arrest affidavit.

In all, the Smith brothers were accused of selling nearly 1,318 grams of cocaine for a total of $31,150.

Both were charged with possession and distribution of cocaine.

But according to negotiated plea agreements, each pleaded guilty to a single drug charge and the other charges were dropped.

Earlier this month, Christopher Smith was sentenced to five years' probation for aiding and abetting in distributing cocaine.

Smith, who was working at a Denver juvenile detention facility at the time of his arrest, set an NFL record in 1988 for the most rushing yards in a Super Bowl - 204 - in Washington's 42-10 victory over the Broncos.

Timmy Smith Scolded For 'Jekyl And Hyde Lifestyle.' (RMN)

By Sue Lindsay

Rocky Mountain News, May 27, 2006

Former football star Timmy Smith heaved a huge sigh as he was sentenced to 30 months in prison Friday in a federal drug case.

The sentence came over the objections of defense attorney Harvey Steinberg who argued that Smith should be sentenced to probation as his brother, Chris Smith, was earlier this month.

Sending Timmy Smith to prison while his brother got probation is "unfair," Steinberg said.

But the government argued that Timmy Smith played a much larger role in drug deals.

Timmy Smith pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute 750 grams of cocaine in eight sales. His brother pleaded guilty to distributing an ounce of cocaine and helping Timmy Smith.

The former Washington Redskins running back, 42, was arrested Sept. 30 near the Denver Tech Center after he sold an undercover officer about 20 ounces of cocaine for $13,500.

Chris Smith, 35, was arrested after delivering cocaine to his brother.

Timmy Smith apologized, saying he had made a bad choice.

"I have made a mistake," he said. "It will never happen again. I have learned my lesson, sir. I wasn't raised that way."

He told U.S. District Judge Lewis T. Babcock he was trying to get money to help a friend hurt by Hurricane Katrina.

But Babcock rebuked Smith for selling drugs by night, making deliveries to people at health clubs, after working all day as a youth counselor at Gilliam Youth Services Center.

"You were putting that stuff out on the streets," Babcock said, shaking his head. "It's a Jekyl and Hyde lifestyle."

The judge also ordered Smith to pay $88,000 in unpaid child support. He is married and has five children.

Smith had worked for more than five years for the Colorado Department of Human Services as a correctional safety officer at Gilliam, a lockup for troubled youth in Denver. He resigned Oct. 26.

The judge ordered Smith to begin serving his prison sentence July 10.

The New York Post, May 27, 2006

Former NFL running back Timmy Smith was sentenced in federal court to 21/2 years in prison for conspiring to distribute cocaine. Smith, 42, apologized to the state of Colorado during a hearing, saying, "I have made a mistake and I wasn't raised this way."

The former Redskin was arrested last fall along with his younger brother, Christopher, after the pair sold about $20,000 worth of cocaine to undercover agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. Timmy Smith pleaded guilty in March to the conspiracy charge after federal prosecutors agreed to drop eight additional cocaine-trafficking counts in exchange for the guilty plea.

Ex-Tech Running Back Sentenced To 30 Months (AP)

AP, May 27, 2006

DENVER (AP) - Former Texas Tech football player Tim Smith, a Hobbs, N.M., product who set a Super Bowl rushing record with the Washington Redskins in 1988, was sentenced Friday to 21/2 years in federal prison for cocaine distribution.

The 42-year-old former running back also was ordered to pay $88,000 in back child support and must report to prison by July 10.

His brother, Christopher Smith, 35, was sentenced May 12 to five years of probation.

The two were indicted by a federal grand jury in October. Tim Smith pleaded guilty to cocaine distribution and Christopher Smith pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting cocaine distribution.

They were arrested Sept. 30 and charged with possession of 500 grams or more of cocaine with intent to distribute. Police said Tim Smith sold about 20 ounces of the drug to an undercover officer for $13,600.

Smith rushed for 204 yards and two touchdowns in the Redskins' 42-10 victory over the Denver Broncos in the title game. He last played in the NFL in 1990 with the Dallas Cowboys.

He lives in Denver and had worked as a detention officer at the Gilliam Youth Services Center.

Doubts Raised On Colombian Killings (BOS)

By Indira A.r. Lakshmanan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, May 28, 2006

Police antidrug team was slain by soldiers

DOJ_NMG_0030207

BOGOTÁ -- The suspicious killings last week of all 10 members of Colombia's most elite antinarcotics police team by soldiers have raised questions about the possible infiltration of the military by drug lords.

The police unit, trained by the US Drug Enforcement Administration, had smashed 15 drug rings; captured 205 traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the United States; and seized nearly 4.4 tons of cocaine in the past two years, Brigadier General Oscar Naranjo, director of the judicial police, said in an interview.

The police and an informant were in the outskirts of Jamundí, a town near Cali 195 miles southwest of the capital, on Monday afternoon to investigate an alleged stash of 200 kilograms of cocaine. Witnesses interviewed by telephone said the anti narcotics team, wearing police caps and jackets, had gotten out of their vehicles when they and the informant were fatally shot at close range by a platoon of 28 soldiers.

``We're judicial police, don't shoot!'' the men yelled repeatedly, according to the witnesses. No soldiers were injured.

Army commander General Mario Montoya described the killings as a tragic case of ``friendly fire,'' saying the platoon had no advance knowledge of a police operation and was on alert for sabotage in the days before a presidential election. But investigators are heaping doubt on that explanation, and President Álvaro Uribe yesterday described the shooting as a ``massacre.''

The killings have dealt a blow to the war on drugs and further tarnished the reputation of the military. The government is already investigating the armed forces for alleged extrajudicial killings of dozens of civilians whom the military identified as rebels.

The police slayings have revived memories of a 2004 case in which soldiers killed seven police officers and four civilians on a supposed undercover drug operation. In that case, evidence including police uniforms was destroyed, the killers were absolved by military courts, and the facts were never aired, an outcome that Uribe vowed would not be repeated this time.

Military failures are understandable, the president told reporters yesterday, ``but military crimes are not.''

Uribe said he has information that he conveyed to the attorney general suggesting that the shooting was more than an error.

The president ordered that the attorney general, not military judges, handle the investigation, and offered a reward of $400,000 for information that solves the killings. The influence of narco-traffickers in the area where the officers were killed made it a particularly worrisome case, he said.

Last month, the slain police unit had busted a ring involving five retired police officers, a retired military official, and an employee of the national airline. ``They were my most effective, trustworthy, elite group, so it's a terrible loss,'' Naranjo said.

``If this was a mistake, the level of incompetence is staggering,'' Andrés Villamizar, former adviser to the minister of defense, said in an interview. ``The excessive force used is inconsistent with friendly fire.''

Villamizar said the fact that no one was held responsible for the deaths of seven officers two years ago set a terrible example. ``When you have people literally getting away with murder, events can repeat themselves.''

The killings took place in an area with properties under the control of drug kingpins. A few months ago in the same zone, five members of a ring led by Wilber Valera were killed in a confrontation with the private army of rival drug lord Diego Montoya, authorities said. Both are wanted for extradition to the United States.

Sources told El Tiempo newspaper that drug traffickers may have given false information to the military to provoke a confrontation with the anti drug police. Soldiers reportedly told investigators that they had received information that armed men in the area were planning to kidnap four Spaniards.

Initial forensics reports indicate that 145 bullets and three hand grenades were fired at the police from 50 yards away and that their three vehicles were attacked on all sides. Preliminary reports indicate the bodies of at least seven of the police may have been moved. Investigators found them face down in a ditch. The civilian informant appears to have been hit at closer range by small-arms fire.

Colonel Bayron Carvajal, commander of the military battalion whose headquarters is two hours away, was seen by witnesses in civilian clothes at the site of the shooting and was heard shouting over a walkie-talkie, ``Not one more shot!'' witnesses told El Tiempo.

His battalion has been involved in several controversial shootings since last year, including the killing of two police officers.

DOJ_NMG_0030208

Vice President Francisco Santos has said he was troubled by several facts: that the shooting took place in broad daylight in an area with clear visibility; that it occurred after the police had identified themselves; and that not a single policeman survived.

Hypotheses about the killings are circulating among analysts, politicians, and the general public. One theory is that the military platoon or its bosses were in the pay of drug lords .

Sergio Berrio, administrator at a psychiatric clinic near the site of the shooting, said patients were traumatized. ``One keeps saying, `Boom boom, Police!' and covering his ears," Berrio said in a telephone interview.

William Darío Sicachá, mayor of Jamundí, said he could imagine that jumpy soldiers in the days before an election might have mistaken police for armed delinquents or rebels. But, he said, ``there are many questions that all of us Colombians have, right up to the president."

IMMIGRATION:

Nation Splits 4 Ways On Illegals (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans hold strong and conflicting views about immigration that underscore the difficulties Congress will face in reaching a final legislative deal on the issue, an analysis of USA TODAY polling data shows.

The public splits into separate camps over whether illegal immigrants should be able to work toward citizenship, whether they help or hurt the economy — even whether immigration is an urgent problem that must be addressed.

Those disagreements are reflected in the Senate immigration bill that passed Thursday and the House bill, passed in December, which takes a tougher approach. A conference committee will try to resolve conflicts between the two measures on the issue, President Bush's top domestic priority before Congress.

A USA TODAY breakdown of public opinion, based on Gallup polls taken in April and May, finds Americans falling into four clusters that are roughly equal in size but vary dramatically in point of view. The groups can be characterized as “hard-liners,” “unconcerned,” “ambivalent” and “welcoming.”

“You're talking about irreconcilable groups that represent substantial parts of the population,” says Roberto Suro, director of the non-partisan Pew Hispanic Center. “A compromise that 50% of the population can go for leaves half the public feeling unhappy, and very unhappy.”

Among the findings in the USA TODAY analysis:

•Traditional partisanship doesn't drive views on immigration. Gender, education and family history seem to do as much to shape attitudes as political party or ideology. Significant numbers of liberals and conservatives are divided among three of the four groups. Moderates spread across all four.

In Congress, too, partisanship doesn't rule on this issue. Republicans are particularly divided: 23 Senate Republicans voted for the immigration bill, 32 voted against it.

•Those who want to take the toughest steps against illegal immigration also feel the most urgency about the subject. Two-thirds of the “hard-liners” call the issue “extremely important.” No one in the most lenient group, the “unconcerned,” feels that way.

The intensity of their views magnifies the clout of those most opposed to citizenship programs. “They project a loud voice,” says Frank Sharry of the pro-immigrant National Immigration Forum.

“The people whose political decisions are based on a candidate's immigration stance are mainly pro-control, pro-enforcement people,” says Mark Kirkorian of the Center for Immigration Studies, which supports tougher enforcement.

The “hard-liners” are also the most Republican group — one reason many House Republicans, especially those considered at risk in November's elections, may be reluctant to compromise.

•The four groups are starkly at odds on basic issues, making it difficult to see common ground. No one in the “hard-liner” group supports a proposal to allow illegal immigrants to work toward citizenship, but more than three-fourths of those in the other three groups do. The Senate bill includes such a provision; the House bill doesn't.

In two of the four groups, overwhelming majorities say removing illegal immigrants would hurt the economy. In the other two groups, solid majorities say it would help.

Jobs Could Solve Some Mexico Woes (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Of all the ways to curb unauthorized human traffic across the USA's southern border, there's one remedy that few people are even discussing: creating more jobs in Mexico.

The Mexican economy in 2006 is expected to post its third-consecutive year of better than 3% growth, but the jobs picture isn't as bright. Each year, about 1 million Mexicans enter the labor pool. But the economy creates only a sliver of the new jobs needed for them.

It doesn't require a degree in economics to understand that if there were more well-paid jobs in Mexico, fewer Mexicans would enter the USA in search of work. Today, more than half of the roughly 500,000 unauthorized immigrants entering the USA each year are from Mexico, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

So why doesn't the Mexican economy — more than a decade after a landmark free trade deal with the United States — produce more jobs? "Although Mexico has done all the right things at the macroeconomic level … and has integrated with the U.S., it has not done the last fundamental reforms," says Claudio Loser, a former International Monetary Fund (IMF) official.

Despite dropping trade barriers and liberalizing its financial markets, Mexico remains economically stuck. The consensus view is that to produce an adequate number of jobs, the USA's southern neighbor requires far-reaching reforms of labor markets, investment policy, the tax code, competitiveness — almost every critical component of a world-class economy.

Mexico faces a daunting "to-do" list, but it's hardly mission impossible. Over the past generation, other countries in Latin America and elsewhere have pulled themselves from poverty to prosperity. From 1980 to 2004, both South Korea and Ireland roughly tripled per-capita incomes while Mexico saw little more than a 10% jump.

Today, just 12.8 million of the country's 43 million working-age population have jobs in the formal sector, according to the IMF. (Millions more work in off-the-books jobs with low or uncertain wages and no benefits.)

Despite widespread acknowledgment of the need for an overhaul, Mexican politics are producing gridlock not change. In 2000, when Vicente Fox was elected president, ending the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party's 71-year lock on power, there were hopes for ambitious reforms.

But political squabbling, as Mexico adjusted to the new multiparty reality, has stalled them. So cozy state monopolies retain control of vital sectors such as electricity and telecommunications. That keeps prices sky high, which saddles the entire economy with uncompetitive costs.

Ultimately, unless job-creating reforms are implemented, the enormous disparity in living standards on opposite sides of the border will continue to draw Mexican labor into the USA.

Today, the ratio between American and Mexican incomes is roughly 6-to-1. To curb illegal immigration, Mexico doesn't have to become as rich as the USA. It just needs to close the gap and give its citizens hope of further progress. After all, Connecticut's per-capita income is almost twice that of Mississippi's. Yet plenty of people live in the Magnolia State.

Mexico's predicament, however, is growing more urgent because of the rise of China. Since joining the World Trade Organization in 2001, the Asian power has emerged as the low-cost supplier in a host of industries from furniture to toys. Mexico, after years of operating as the low bidder, suddenly finds itself priced out of many markets.

The two developing nations compete head-on in about one-half of the goods — equal to three-quarters of their total export value — that each ships to the USA, the IMF says. Manufacturing costs are almost twice as high in Mexican clothing plants as in their Chinese rivals, according to the Inter-American Development Bank. In the three years ended in 2003, Mexican textile job losses totaled 187,000.

"Mexico is not well-positioned in the major dynamic markets," concludes the IMF.

During the NAFTA debate, Mexico's then-president Carlos Salinas said the trade deal would allow Mexico to export "tomatoes, not tomato pickers." Yet, more than a decade later, the tomato pickers keep coming.

DOJ_NMG_0030210

By the end of this decade, demographics should cool the immigration controversy. Mexico had the world's highest fertility rate in the 1960s, when the typical woman had seven children. Now, the average is down to 2.6 children.

So the annual number of people turning 15 years old will drop from a peak of about 1 million in 2003 to about 600,000 by 2010, according to Philip Martin, a professor at the University of California, Davis.

“Demography is real. There will be less migration pressure from a rapidly growing Mexican labor force in the future,” Martin says.

But unless Mexico musters the political will for comprehensive economic reforms, cross-border flows won't dry up entirely. What would be needed to really make a dent in illegal immigration?

“The economy would have to grow at double the rate it is today,” Loser says.

“It may take a generation.”

The Manicure Menace (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

LOS ANGELES

If you're fretting about immigrants stealing American jobs, I recommend going to Traci Harris for a manicure, complete with the soothing aromatic compresses. Her business is a case study of what happens to native workers when immigrants arrive.

In theory, hordes of immigrants are a problem because they can take lots of jobs and drive down wages, especially for the less-educated natives in direct competition with them.

In practice, though, that's not what economists find when they look at wages and unemployment rates in cities that attract large numbers of immigrants. Less-educated American workers in places like Los Angeles, Miami and New York don't seem to be substantially worse off than they are in cities with few immigrants.

Why not? One of the cleverest answers comes from an analysis of the nail-salon business in California. It makes an especially tidy case study because the state keeps track of all licensed manicurists, enabling economists to see what happened to American workers like Harris when tens of thousands of Vietnamese entered the business during the past two decades.

Harris owns the Salon Legohn in Leimert Park, a working-class, predominantly black neighborhood in Los Angeles. As Vietnamese salons proliferated nearby, she couldn't compete with their low prices. But she has kept her salon in business — and kept hiring Americans — by concentrating on hairstyling.

"Women want a hairdresser who speaks English," Harris says. "You don't face the same kind of competition from the Vietnamese."

Harris herself remained a manicurist, but not at her own salon. She has found more lucrative full-time jobs at beachfront hotel spas and as a freelancer on movie sets and at magazine photo shoots. Instead of competing with the Vietnamese in the neighborhood, she visits clients in Beverly Hills who pay $150 for a house call.

"If you can speak English, it's easy to find a job at an elite shop," she says. "American manicurists are a hot commodity. My clients want to have a conversation."

Harris's experience doesn't surprise Kathy Krynski of Kenyon College, one of the economists who analyzed the California manicure business. She, Maya Federman and David Harrington found that the surge in Vietnamese manicurists didn't suddenly put Americans out of work.

Some Americans gave up their licenses, but the turnover wasn't much higher than it had been before the Vietnamese arrived. The chief effect of the competition was to discourage young Americans from entering the business, so over time the number of American manicurists dwindled.

"The Vietnamese didn't so much displace Americans as gradually replace them," Krynski says. "Some Americans stayed in the business in upscale salons, and others probably went into other occupations offering higher wages, like being a hairdresser."

Some young Americans did lose the chance to become manicurists, but it's not as if every immigrant took an American's job. The study found that for every two fewer Americans in the business, there were five new Vietnamese manicurists.

DOJ_NMG_0030211

Like other immigrants, Vietnamese nail-salon owners didn't simply fill existing jobs. They created more jobs that benefited American consumers. These entrepreneurs transformed the business not only with their workers but also with time-saving innovations like electric tools for shaping nails.

As a result, shop clerks in Harris's neighborhood who used to go a couple of months between manicures can now afford weekly visits to Van's Salon. I got a manicure there from Nancy Nguyen for $8, a quarter of what I paid for the cheapest manicure available from Harris at the spa at Shutters on the Beach hotel.

Nguyen couldn't compete with Harris in ambience or conversation — I barely got her to utter her name. Harris spent half an hour working on my right hand, gently using compresses infused with tangerine and peppermint as well as a hazelnut and menthol scrub. Nguyen did my left hand in 10 minutes without explaining what she was doing.

To my inexpert eye — this was my first manicure — Harris did the better job, but the nails buffed by Nguyen certainly looked better than usual. If I wanted a weekly manicure, I'd be glad to have the cheaper Vietnamese option available.

And I wouldn't worry about the economic menace of foreign manicurists. American workers have survived this immigrant invasion with their paychecks intact, and their fingernails in better shape than ever.

My History Of English-Only (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

To understand something of the current immigration debate, it might help to look at New York's Lower East Side in the early 1900s through the eyes of Henry Adams, the great-grandson of one president, grandson of another, ambassador to Britain and, toward the end of his life, winner of the Pulitzer Prize for his autobiography. All those Jews sickened him.

"God tried drowning out the world once," he wrote in a 1906 letter, "but it did no kind of good, and there are said to be 450,000 Jews now doing Kosher in New York alone. God himself owned failure."

One of those "doing Kosher" at that time was my grandfather, Rueben, a part-time garment worker and full-time no-goodnik who placed his two boys in an orphanage when his wife, Judith, died. When he came to visit, the older boy had to translate for the younger. My grandfather never spoke English, and my father never spoke anything but.

You can understand Adams's distress. The Lower East Side of Manhattan was an alien place. Its denizens spoke Yiddish. They were not Christians. They had their own newspapers and theaters and political organizations, and when they rallied for one cause or another -- and boy did they ever rally -- the calls for reform or revolution were uttered in a foreign tongue. This pot was not melting.

Now, of course, the Lower East Side is the East Village and it is cool and hip and young and expensive. The grandchildren of those who did Kosher there have scattered throughout the country, and the English their grandparents did not speak has been mastered and enriched by Bellow and Roth and Chabon and Ephron, not to mention Irving Berlin, if you are that old, or Jon Stewart, if you can stay up that late.

The current immigration fuss has engendered more sloppy thinking and rhetoric than any issue in recent times. The descendants of immigrants wax romantic, confusing legal and illegal immigration -- it's all the same. But it is not. My grandparents were legal immigrants. They came through Ellis Island, papers in hand. It was easier to do so then, but that is not the point. The point is that they broke no law and, as a consequence, sought no amnesty.

But this anxiety about the fate of English and its importance to the culture does have its antecedents, although they are not, of course, exact. The non-English-speaking immigrants of the 19th and earlier centuries could not simply get on an airplane and return to the mother country for a visit. Once they came to America, they usually stayed in America. This is not necessarily true of Spanish-speakers, who can more easily visit Mexico or another Latin American country. Still, the larger culture remains English-speaking and its pull is like an ocean tide. It may take a while, but it will get its way.

In Los Angeles, for instance, radio station KDL shifted in 2003 from Spanish to English because the Latino audience it wanted -- the young -- was increasingly bilingual and what's called "English dominant." English was cooler, hipper and younger, younger, younger. Spanish was the language of mom and dad, and nothing could be fustier -- or, in some cases, more embarrassing. The latter is why, to my regret, I peevishly ignored my Yiddish-speaking grandmother, adamantly insisting she speak English. I thought I was being very patriotic.

In New York City, the library system of a single borough, Queens, typically has the highest circulation of any in the country. That's not because the culturally ravenous Jews of myth and fact are continuing their reading habits but because of a much newer influx of Asians. Many of them read exclusively in their native language, some in two and some, sooner or later, in English only. The richness of Shakespeare's tongue, its universality in commerce and business and above all in entertainment, make it unavoidable. Few things in life are certain, but death, taxes and English certainly are.

It's reasonable, I suppose, to insist on English-sufficiency for citizenship or even for a driver's license. But the nation's so-called political conversation can be conducted in any language -- just as long as it's conducted. The Jews, the Italians, the Chinese, the Russians, the Germans and all the other ethnic groups who once lived cheek by jowl in Manhattan had a vibrant press and raised the roof with their political conversation. Now their descendants rue, as I do, the virtual loss of a tongue. Henry Adams need not have feared. I can read him but not the contemporaries he so reviled.

TAX:

Adios To A Phone Tax (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The Spanish-American War was fought in 1898 and lasted less than eight months, but Americans still pay an excise tax on phone service that was imposed to finance it. Last week, a mere 108 years after the end of that conflict, the Bush Administration moved to terminate the levy. Its duration is something to keep in mind the next time you hear a politician call for a "temporary" tax.

Treasury Secretary John Snow said the Internal Revenue Service will no longer collect the 3% federal excise tax on long-distance phone calls and will offer refunds for the past three years. We'd like to think the Administration was acting out of principle. But the reality is that the courts -- most recently the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in a decision last month -- have forced its hand with repeated rulings that the tax on long-distance is illegal in a telecom world in which calls are no longer priced based on distance. The IRS will continue to collect the tax on local calls, but Mr. Snow to his credit did express support for the idea of Congress passing legislation to repeal the tax entirely.

That would be the best outcome, and not just because a future administration might opt to begin collecting the tax again and restart the court battles. Another argument for full repeal is that so long as the tax exists, so will the political temptation to expand its scope and turn it into yet another revenue stream for the federal till. A Joint Tax Committee report issued last year suggested extending the excise tax to "all data communication services," including cable modems, cellular and DSL Internet connections.

Like the alternative minimum tax, the federal excise tax was intended to target "the rich," who at the time were the only ones who could afford a telephone. Yet our tax code still considers phones "luxury" items today. The last time Congress came close to ending this charade was 2000, when majorities in both the House and the Senate voted for repeal, which President Clinton vetoed. The Republican Congress, which may not be Republican much longer, might consider giving it another shot before November.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Policy Adviser Admits Altering Text (WP)

By Zachary Goldfarb

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, acknowledged he did something wrong when he took a newspaper profile of himself, altered quotes and text, and then posted it on a Web site without noting the changes.

DOJ_NMG_0030213

"Looking back, this is foolish," he said in a telephone interview Friday evening. Zinsmeister said he did it to correct the record while protecting a young journalist who had made mistakes.

This admission came about because on Friday morning the New York Sun's Josh Gerstein disclosed that shortly after the weekly Syracuse New Times published a profile of Zinsmeister in August 2004, Zinsmeister posted an altered copy of the profile on the Web site of the American Enterprise Institute's magazine, which he edits.

The Syracuse paper had requested to interview Zinsmeister, who lives near Syracuse, because of his writings about the Iraq war. The article quoted him saying critical things about ordinary Iraqis, Washington elites and upper-class parents. It also contained a quote questioning the Bush administration's execution of the war.

In one example, the original article attributed to Zinsmeister this quote: "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings."

But, on the institute site, it appeared as: "I learned in Washington that there is an 'overclass' in this country stocked with cheating, shifty human beings that's just as morally repugnant as our 'underclass.' "

Zinsmeister explained the change to The Washington Post by saying he has long studied issues of class and morality and he was confident he would have used the kind of specific language in the quote on the institute site rather than the more broad description in the original article.

In other examples, he said he made changes to fix errors he believed the New Times reporter had made because of misunderstandings or truncated notes -- taken in an interview in a noisy restaurant.

Even so, Zinsmeister acknowledged, "I should have contacted the New Times to say that there were four errors in the story and they should be retracted and corrected. . . . At the time it seemed innocent."

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday that Zinsmeister erred in making the changes, but he was well-intentioned: "This was done not out of animosity; it was an attempt to set the record straight and he did it in an unartful way."

All of this was a surprise to the New Times reporter, Justin Park, especially because, as he told the Sun, he had received a laudatory e-mail from Zinsmeister after the profile was published.

But Zinsmeister said he avoided asking for corrections at the time because "I think I would have gotten Justin in worse trouble if I moaned about it."

He said he expects people to dig through his vast writings as he prepares to start his White House job in mid-June. "There's so much insincerity in the political discourse. I write very bluntly and I know that, and the president knew that when he picked me. That's somewhat of the bond between us," he said. "I don't have trepidation or worry that there's a huge skeleton in my closet."

Poised To Come Back To The C.I.A., A Former Official Who Has Become A Symbol (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 29 — In his old office at the Central Intelligence Agency, Stephen R. Kappes once hung a World War II-era British poster that announced, "Keep Calm and Carry On." He ignored this admonition 18 months ago, when he resigned in anger after bitter clashes with senior aides to Porter J. Goss.

But now Mr. Goss has been forced out as the agency's director, and Mr. Kappes is poised to return, with a promotion. He would become deputy director, under Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who won Senate confirmation on Friday.

A man of military bearing and a storied past, Mr. Kappes would become the first person since William E. Colby in 1973 to ascend to one of agency's top two positions from a career spent in the clandestine service. General Hayden has said that his return would be a signal that "amateur hour" is over at the C.I.A., which has seen little calm since Mr. Kappes's departure.

A no-nonsense former Marine officer who insists on addressing his elders as "sir," Mr. Kappes speaks Russian and Persian; served as the agency's station chief in Moscow and Kuwait during a quarter-century at the C.I.A.; and played a pivotal role in the secret talks with Libya that culminated in December 2003 in the agreement in which Col. Muammar el-Qadaffi agreed to give up his chemical and biological weapons program.

His appointment has not been formally announced, but intelligence officials as well as Mr. Kappes's friends say he will probably take the deputy director position.

DOJ_NMG_0030214

Mr. Kappes, 54, declined to be interviewed for this article, having spent most of his professional career trying hard not to be noticed.

Veteran intelligence officials say his expected return is being celebrated within the agency, and some Democratic lawmakers have even characterized Mr. Kappes as a savior who will rescue a moribund agency.

Some critics, including Representative Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, have portrayed his return as a victory for a hidebound C.I.A. bureaucracy that resists all change. There has even been grumbling among White House officials that Mr. Kappes, the former head of the clandestine service, criticized the Bush administration and its policies after he left the agency in 2004.

People who know Mr. Kappes well reject these descriptions as simplistic.

"I would suggest that we dismiss all of the breathless characterizations of Steve Kappes either from his critics or the people trying to counter his critics," said Milton A. Bearden, who served for three decades in the C.I.A.'s clandestine service. "The simple fact is that he is a very solid choice to come to the agency at a time when it is extremely wobbly."

John E. McLaughlin, deputy director of the C.I.A. from 2000 to 2004, said Mr. Kappes would "bring a sense of leadership and professionalism to the agency's operations division."

Mr. Kappes, a Cincinnati native, joined the C.I.A. in 1981 after five years in the Marine Corps, where he once commanded a platoon of the Marines' legendary "silent drill team" in Washington that performs a tightly scripted rifle ceremony before thousands of spectators each year.

In 1988 he became the deputy chief of a secret C.I.A. station in Frankfurt, the agency's hub for collecting information about Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's government in Iran. From Frankfurt, case officers debriefed Iranian exiles and built up a network of agents inside Iran.

Mr. Kappes later transferred to the Middle East, where he served on the agency's task force before the Persian Gulf war of 1991 and re-opened the C.I.A. station in Kuwait after the war's end.

After running the C.I.A. station in Moscow in the late 1990's, Mr. Kappes returned to C.I.A. headquarters, where he ascended to the top echelon of the directorate of operations, now known as the national clandestine service.

His time at C.I.A. headquarters was marked by an occasionally stormy relationship with the lawmakers who oversee the intelligence community.

One of the biggest successes of Mr. Kappes's career came after he became the clandestine service's second-ranking official and was put in charge of coordinating the C.I.A's effort to penetrate the secret network of a Pakistani nuclear scientist, A. Q. Khan.

Dr. Khan had for years been using the black market to sell nuclear blueprints and centrifuge parts, and in October 2003, American and European authorities intercepted a freighter bound for Libya loaded with nuclear bomb-making material.

Soon afterward, Colonel Qaddafi agreed to allow American and British inspectors to tour suspected nuclear sites, and Mr. Kappes was put in charge of a team that began negotiating directly with the colonel over ending Libya's programs for unconventional weapons.

Former intelligence officials said Mr. Kappes was given the assignment because he had both the background and the temperament for the delicate negotiations with a longtime American adversary.

"You don't send just anyone to do this," Mr. McLaughlin said. "It was an enormously difficult, complicated and high-stakes mission."

After several rounds of talks led by Mr. Kappes, the Bush administration was able to announce in December 2003 that Libya had agreed to abandon the programs.

Yet Mr. Kappes's career track veered off course in late 2004, when Mr. Goss and many of his top aides came to the C.I.A.

The incident that directly led to his resignation occurred in November 2004, shortly after Mr. Goss took over at the agency. Patrick Murray, who was Mr. Goss's chief of staff, ordered Mr. Kappes to fire his deputy, Michael Sulick, after Mr. Sulick had a testy exchange with Mr. Murray.

Mr. Kappes, who at the time was in charge of the C.I.A.'s clandestine service, refused and chose to resign instead.

After leaving the agency, he became an executive vice president at ArmorGroup, a private security firm based in London.

DOJ_NMG_0030215

Those who know Mr. Kappes say he bears no grudges for the circumstances of his departure. But while many inside the agency are eagerly awaiting Mr. Kappes's return, his reputation as a taskmaster who does not suffer fools gladly has some bracing for what could lie ahead.

"The really good people are happy he's coming back," said a former top C.I.A. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Mr. Kappes's return has not yet been made official. "The ones who are scared of him should be scared of him."

Justices' Heaviest Lifting Is Ahead (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

As the Supreme Court term ends, weighty issues will test Roberts' consensus-finding skills.

WASHINGTON — As the Supreme Court heads into the final month of its term, the new chief justice has shown a knack for finding ways to decide cases on narrow issues that have led to unanimous rulings.

But June is rarely the time for harmony and unanimity at the high court.

The justices tend to put off the most difficult cases to the end of the term, and this one is no different. The court faces major decisions on terrorism tribunals, wetlands protection, lethal injection, domestic violence prosecutions and campaign finance limits.

The final cases could test whether Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. can extend his record through his first term on the court, which he acknowledged could be a challenge in a recent talk to Maryland judges.

"I do feel at this point a bit like the fellow who jumped off the Empire State Building, passed the 50th floor and said, 'So far, so good,' " he joked. "The hard part's coming up."

In all, 37 cases remain to be decided by the end of June. Unlike in years past, however, the justices will not face end-of-term decisions on issues that typically divide the court along ideological lines, such as religion, affirmative action, abortion and gay rights.

In one highly anticipated case, the court could deal a rebuke to President Bush and the Defense Department for their plans to put some prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba on trial for war crimes in special military courts.

Defense lawyers and civil libertarians say the military courts have not set fair rules and do not adhere to international standards for war crimes trials.

That decision, however, will not bear the imprint of the new chief justice. He is sitting out the case because he heard it when he was on the U.S. Court of Appeals and ruled in favor of the administration's position.

Meanwhile, property rights advocates hope Roberts and the court will sharply cut back on the reach of the federal law that protects wetlands and streams by deciding that it applies only to "navigable" waters.

The Clean Water Act seeks to protect the nation's rivers, bays and lakes from pollution. Since the 1970s, environmental regulators have cited it to stop the dredging of wetlands and the flow of tainted drainage into small streams because the pollution will end up in lakes and bays.

The Bush administration has linked up with environmentalists to protect the broad reach of federal anti-pollution law.

And the court could make it far harder to prosecute domestic violence. Because victims are often afraid to testify in court, prosecutors commonly use their tape-recorded calls to 911.

Justice Antonin Scalia, however, has said defendants have a right to confront their accusers face-to-face in court, and he may persuade a majority to halt prosecutions based on out-of-court statements.

Most of the remaining cases will not change the law in a significant way, and many may be resolved on narrow issues.

For example, the justices in January stopped Florida's planned execution of Clarence Hill, the murderer of a police officer whose many appeals were rejected. His defense lawyer said he was not challenging Hill's conviction or death sentence, but the method of execution.

Challenges to lethal injection have been filed in many states, including California. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose has scheduled a hearing in September on whether the state must change its lethal injection procedures.

Some doctors say the drugs commonly used in lethal injections may, if wrongly administered, cause excruciating pain.

DOJ_NMG_0030216

But the Supreme Court justices might decide only a procedural question: Can a state inmate win a new hearing in federal court after his final appeals have been rejected? If the justices do so, the court will put off for another day the ultimate question of whether such injections amount to cruel and unusual punishment.

Roberts has established that he intends to steer his court toward such narrow rulings.

This month, the court decided eight cases, and all were unanimous. Sometimes, however, the ruling skirted the most difficult issue.

For example, an Ohio case tested whether states could give special tax breaks to lure big corporations to build new factories there. A lower court, siding with some disgruntled taxpayers, said the tax breaks were unconstitutional.

Roberts, writing for the court in DaimlerChrysler Corp. vs. Cuno, threw out the lawsuit on the grounds that the taxpayers did not have standing in federal court to challenge the state's policy. The decision sent the case back to a state court to start again.

In January, the court even managed to resolve an abortion case with a narrow, unanimous ruling. The justices revived a New Hampshire law that required doctors to notify the parents of girls under age 18 two days before they performed an abortion, but the justices also said there must be an exception for medical emergencies.

The chief justice recently explained to Georgetown law school graduates his desire to press for narrow rulings over broad pronouncements. "If it is not necessary to decide more to a case," he said, "then in my view it is necessary not to decide more to a case."

Topping the court's docket

Here are 10 of the most important questions the Supreme Court will confront in June, the last month of its term.

War on terrorism

Can the Bush administration try detainees at Guantanamo Bay in special military courts? This is a clash between Bush's claim of war powers and Geneva Convention rules. (Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld)

Texas redistricting

Can Texas redraw its electoral districts in mid-decade to give the Republican Party more seats in Congress? At issue is a redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Such plans are usually drawn only once a decade based on the census. (League of United Latin American Citizens vs. Perry)

Campaign spending

Can Vermont strictly limit how much state candidates spend on campaigns? The state is challenging the 1976 Supreme Court ruling Buckley vs. Valeo, which said federal candidates had a free-speech right to spend as much as they wanted. (Randall vs. Sorrell)

Whistle-blowers

Does the 1st Amendment protect government whistle-blowers from being punished for reporting wrongdoing? This case arose when a Los Angeles deputy sheriff alleged he was moved to a less desirable job for reporting misconduct by the police. The outcome could affect the rights of 21 million public employees. (Garcetti vs. Ceballos)

Domestic violence

Can the government prosecute domestic assaults based not on courtroom testimony of the alleged victim but on taped 911 calls? A ban on such evidence would make it much harder for prosecutors to pursue cases when the victim can't or won't testify. (Davis vs. Washington and Hammon vs. Indiana)

Wetlands

Does the Clean Water Act protect inland streams and wetlands, or is this federal anti-pollution measure limited to navigable rivers, lakes and bays? If a Michigan developer prevails, it would greatly limit the reach of a key environmental law. (Rapanos vs. United States)

Lethal injections

DOJ_NMG_0030217

Can death row inmates file a last-minute appeal after losing all previous appeals to challenge the method of execution as cruel? Lawyers for a Florida murderer won a stay on the day their client faced execution, citing studies that suggested a drug used in executions may mask an inmate's pain. (Hill vs. McDonough)

DNA

Can a death row inmate win a new trial after showing that new DNA analysis refutes some of the evidence against him? Paul House was sentenced to death for the rape and murder of a neighbor, but DNA tests showed he did not have sex with her. (House vs. Bell)

Foreign felons

Do foreign prisoners in the United States have a right to reopen their cases if they and their consulates were not informed of their rights at the time of their arrest? The World Court ruled that the Vienna Convention gives legal rights to Mexican natives imprisoned in the United States. (Sanchez-Llamas vs. Oregon)

Retaliation

Can an employer be forced to pay damages for transferring a worker to a lesser job after she has filed a complaint of sexual harassment? Employers say retaliation claims, such as this one involving a woman who was removed from her job as a forklift operator, are the fastest-growing kind of discrimination cases. (Burlington Northern vs. White)

Senate Leader Took Free Boxing Tickets (AP-Y2)

By John Solomon

AP2, May 29, 2006

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that state agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing.

Reid, D-Nev., took the free seats for Las Vegas fights between 2003 and 2005 as he was pressing legislation to increase government oversight of the sport, including the creation of a federal boxing commission that Nevada's agency feared might usurp its authority.

He defended the gifts, saying they would never influence his position on the bill and was simply trying to learn how his legislation might affect an important home state industry. "Anyone from Nevada would say I'm glad he is there taking care of the state's No. 1 businesses," he told The Associated Press.

"I love the fights anyways, so it wasn't like being punished," added the senator, a former boxer and boxing judge.

Senate ethics rules generally allow lawmakers to accept gifts from federal, state or local governments, but specifically warn against taking such gifts — particularly on multiple occasions — when they might be connected to efforts to influence official actions.

"Senators and Senate staff should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears that the gift is motivated by a desire to reward, influence, or elicit favorable official action," the Senate ethics manual states. It cites the 1990s example of an Oregon lawmaker who took gifts for personal use from a South Carolina state university and its president while that school was trying to influence his official actions.

"Repeatedly taking gifts which the Gifts Rule otherwise permits to be accepted may, nonetheless, reflect discredit upon the institution, and should be avoided," the manual states.

Several ethics experts said Reid should have paid for the tickets, which were close to the ring and worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each, to avoid the appearance he was being influenced by gifts.

Two senators who joined Reid for fights with the complimentary tickets took markedly differently steps.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., insisted on paying $1,400 for the tickets he shared with Reid for a 2004 championship fight. Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., accepted free tickets to another fight with Reid but already had recused himself from Reid's federal boxing legislation because his father was an executive for a Las Vegas hotel that hosts fights.

DOJ_NMG_0030218

In an interview Thursday in his Capitol office, Reid broadly defended his decisions to accept the tickets and to take several actions benefiting disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's clients and partners as they donated to him.

"I'm not Goodie two shoes. I just feel these events are nothing I did wrong," Reid said.

Reid had separate meetings in June 2003 in his Senate offices with two Abramoff tribal clients and Edward Ayoob, a former staffer who went to work lobbying with Abramoff.

The meetings occurred over a five-day span in which Ayoob also threw a fundraiser for Reid at the firm where Ayoob and Abramoff worked that netted numerous donations from Abramoff's partners, firm and clients.

Reid said he viewed the two official meetings and the fundraiser as a single event. "I think it all was one, the way I look at it," he said.

One of the tribes, the Saginaw Chippewa of Michigan, donated $9,000 to Reid at the fundraiser and the next morning met briefly with Reid and Ayoob at Reid's office to discuss federal programs. Reid and the tribal chairman posed for a picture.

Five days earlier, Reid met with Ayoob and the Sac & Fox tribe of Iowa for about 15 minutes to discuss at least two legislative requests. Reid's office said the senator never acted on those requests.

A few months after the fundraiser, Reid did sponsor a spending bill that targeted $100,000 to another Abramoff tribe, the Chitimacha of Louisiana, to pay for a soil erosion study Ayoob was lobbying for. Reid said he sponsored the provision because Louisiana lawmakers sent him a letter requesting it.

Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist, has pleaded guilty in a widespread corruption probe of Capitol Hill. Reid used that conviction earlier this year to accuse Republicans of fostering a culture of corruption inside Congress.

AP recently reported that Reid also wrote at least four letters favorable to Abramoff's tribal clients around the time Reid collected donations from those clients and Abramoff's partners. Reid has declined to return the donations, unlike other lawmakers, saying his letters were consistent with his beliefs.

Senate ethics rules require senators to avoid even the appearance that any official meetings or actions they took were in any way connected with political donations.

Reid broadly defended his actions, stating he would never change his position because of donations, free tickets or a request from a former-staffer-turned-lobbyist.

"People who deal with me and have over the years know that I am an advocate for what I believe in. I always try to do it fair, never take advantage of people on purpose," he said.

Asked if he would have done anything differently, the Senate Democratic leader said his only concern was "the willingness of the press ... to take these instances and try to make a big deal out of them."

Several ethics experts said they believed Reid should have paid for the boxing tickets to avoid violating Senate ethics rules.

Bernadette Sargeant, a former House ethics lawyer, said the Senate would have to examine the specific facts to determine whether Reid violated the gift ban. She said the clearer ethics issue involved Reid's obligation to avoid the appearance that the free tickets and his official duties were connected.

"From what you are describing, it is such a huge risk that a reasonable person with all the relevant facts would say this creates the appearance of impropriety," she said. "The more cautious thing, the more prudent thing would be to either pay the tickets or fair market value or not accept the tickets in the first place."

Andrew Herman, a Washington lawyer who frequently works with Congress, agreed. "I think it is pretty clear what Sen. McCain did in the current atmosphere in Washington was certainly the more prudent thing."

"I think if you are receiving anything of value from anyone that has matters before the federal government and matters under your purview that you have to be very careful with your conduct," Herman said.

Attorney Marc Elias, who has represented Democrats in ethics cases and was asked by Reid's office to call AP, said he believed Reid should not be penalized for trying to help his state. "There are varying degrees of gift givers," Elias said. "There is a difference between a gift from a state entity and a gift from a savings & loan."

Marc Ratner, executive director of the Nevada Athletic Commission when Reid took the free tickets, said one of his desires was to convince Reid and McCain that there was no need for the federal government to usurp the state commission's authority. At the time, McCain and Reid were pushing legislation to create a federal boxing commission.

"I invited him because I was talking with his staff" about the legislation, Ratner said. "This was a chance for all of my commissioners, who are politically appointed, to interact with them. It was important for them to see how we in Nevada did things.

"I am a states rights activist and I didn't want any federal bill that would take away our state rights to regulate fights," he said, adding that he hoped McCain and Reid, at the very least, would be persuaded to model any federal commission after Nevada's body.

Reid said he remembered talking to Ratner briefly at the fights and knew Ratner was working with his Senate staff on the federal legislation.

McCain's office said the Arizona senator felt an obligation to pay for the ringside tickets he got from the Nevada commission to attend the Oscar De La Hoya-Bernard Hopkins championship match in September 2004.

"Sen. McCain has always paid for his own tickets to boxing matches and sees no reason to change that," aide Mark Salter said.

Ensign's office said he attended one fight in the last couple of years with Reid and accepted the free tickets from the commission. But his office said Ensign already had removed himself from the boxing legislation that would have affected the Nevada commission.

"He did not have anything to do with it because at the time he recused himself," Ensign spokesman Jack Finn said of the legislation.

Kathleen Clark, a Washington University of St. Louis congressional ethics expert, said Congress should re-examine the exemption allowing gifts by state and federal and local governments because they too can have interest in influencing federal lawmakers like Reid.

"I think he would want to be above approach even when it's from a state commission and not a private lobbyist," Clark said. "I don't think we should make any assumption about a government. The fact is government agencies can act as proxies for different interests. Here it happens to be the Nevada boxing commission, and I would guess it is aligned with certain industry groups."

Reid Accepted Free Boxing Tickets While A Related Bill Was Pending (WP)

"People who deal with me and have over the years know that I am an advocate for what I believe in. I always try to do it fair, never take advantage of people on purpose," he said.

Asked if he would have done anything differently, the Senate Democratic leader said his only concern was "the willingness of the press . . . to take these instances and try to make a big deal out of them."

Reid Sat Ringside In Vegas For Free (WT/AP)

By John Solomon, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that state agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing.

Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, took the free seats for Las Vegas fights from 2003 to 2005 as he was pressing legislation to increase government oversight of the sport, including the creation of a federal boxing commission that Nevada's agency feared might usurp its authority.

DOJ_NMG_0030221

Mr. Reid, who has accused the Republicans of fostering a culture of corruption, defended the gifts, saying they would never influence his position on the bill and was simply trying to learn how his legislation might affect an important home-state industry.

"Anyone from Nevada would say 'I'm glad he is there taking care of the state's No. 1 businesses,' " he told the Associated Press.

"I love the fights anyways, so it wasn't like being punished," added the senator, a former boxer and boxing judge.

Senate ethics rules generally allow lawmakers to accept gifts from federal, state or local governments, but specifically warn against taking such gifts -- particularly on multiple occasions -- when they might be connected to efforts to influence official actions.

"Senators and Senate staff should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears that the gift is motivated by a desire to reward, influence, or elicit favorable official action," the Senate ethics manual states. It cites the 1990s example of an Oregon lawmaker who took gifts for personal use from a South Carolina state university and its president while that school was trying to influence his official actions.

"Repeatedly taking gifts which the Gifts Rule otherwise permits to be accepted may, nonetheless, reflect discredit upon the institution, and should be avoided," the manual states.

Two Republican senators who joined Mr. Reid for fights with the complimentary tickets took markedly differently steps.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona insisted on paying $1,400 for the tickets he shared with Mr. Reid for a championship match between Oscar De La Hoya and Bernard Hopkins, one of 2004's most-hyped fights. Sen. John Ensign of Nevada accepted free tickets to another fight along with Mr. Reid but already had recused himself from Mr. Reid's boxing legislation because his father was an executive for a Las Vegas hotel that hosts fights.

In an interview Thursday in his Capitol office, Mr. Reid broadly defended his decisions to accept the tickets and to take several actions benefiting disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's clients and partners as they donated to him.

"I'm not 'goody-two-shoes.' I just feel these events are nothing I did wrong," Mr. Reid said.

Mr. Reid had separate meetings in June 2003 in his Senate offices with two Abramoff tribal clients and Edward Ayoob, a former staffer who went to work lobbying with Mr. Abramoff.

The meetings occurred over a five-day span in which Mr. Ayoob also threw a fundraiser for Mr. Reid at the firm where Mr. Ayoob and Abramoff worked. That firm netted numerous donations from Abramoff's partners, firm and clients.

Mr. Reid said he viewed the two official meetings and the fundraiser as a single event. "I think it all was one, the way I look at it," he said.

One of the tribes, the Saginaw Chippewa of Michigan, donated $9,000 to Mr. Reid at the fundraiser and the next morning met briefly with Mr. Reid and Mr. Ayoob at the senator's office to discuss federal programs. Mr. Reid and the tribal chairman posed for a picture.

Five days earlier, Mr. Reid met with Mr. Ayoob and the Sac & Fox tribe of Iowa for about 15 minutes to discuss at least two legislative requests. Mr. Reid's office said the senator never acted on those requests.

A few months after the fundraiser, Mr. Reid sponsored a spending bill that targeted $100,000 to another Abramoff tribe, the Chitimacha of Louisiana, to pay for a soil erosion study that Mr. Ayoob lobbied for. Mr. Reid said he sponsored the provision because Louisiana lawmakers sent him a letter requesting it.

AP recently reported that Mr. Reid also wrote at least four letters favorable to Abramoff's tribal clients around the time Mr. Reid collected donations from those clients and Abramoff's partners. Mr. Reid has declined to return the donations, unlike other lawmakers, saying his letters were consistent with his beliefs.

Mr. Reid broadly defended his actions, stating he would never change his position because of donations, free tickets or a request from a former-staffer-turned-lobbyist.

"People who deal with me and have over the years know that I am an advocate for what I believe in. I always try to do it fair, never take advantage of people on purpose," he said.

Asked whether he would have done anything differently, the Senate Democratic leader said his only concern was "the willingness of the press ... to take these instances and try to make a big deal out of them."

DOJ_NMG_0030222

Several former ethics officials said they thought Mr. Reid should have paid for the boxing tickets to avoid violating Senate ethics rules.

Bernadette Sargeant, a former House ethics lawyer, said the Senate would have to examine the facts to determine whether Mr. Reid violated the gift ban but said a clearer ethics issue involved Mr. Reid's obligation to avoid the appearance that the free tickets and his official duties were connected.

"From what you are describing, it is such a huge risk that a reasonable person with all the relevant facts would say this creates the appearance of impropriety," she said. "The more cautious thing, the more prudent thing would be to either pay for the tickets or fair market value or not accept the tickets in the first place."

Andrew Herman, a Washington lawyer who frequently works with Congress, agreed. "I think it is pretty clear what Senator McCain did in the current atmosphere in Washington was certainly the more prudent thing."

Attorney Marc Elias, who has represented Democrats in ethics cases and was asked by Mr. Reid's office to call AP, said he thought Mr. Reid should not be penalized for trying to help his state.

"There are varying degrees of gift givers," Mr. Elias said. "There is a difference between a gift from a state entity and a gift from a savings and loan."

Marc Ratner, executive director of the Nevada Athletic Commission when Mr. Reid took the free tickets, said one of his desires was to convince Mr. Reid and Mr. McCain, who were pushing legislation to create a federal boxing commission, that there was no need for the federal government to usurp the state commission's authority.

"I invited him because I was talking with his staff" about the legislation, Mr. Ratner said. "This was a chance for all of my commissioners, who are politically appointed, to interact with them. It was important for them to see how we in Nevada did things." He added that he hoped the two senators, at the very least, would be persuaded to model any federal commission after Nevada's body.

Mr. Reid said he remembered talking to Mr. Ratner briefly at the fights and knew Mr. Ratner was working with his Senate staff on the federal legislation.

Dem Leader Reid Took Free Boxing Tickets (USAT)

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., accepted free ringside tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to three professional boxing matches while that agency was trying to influence him on federal regulation of boxing, the Associated Press reported. The tickets were worth several hundred to several thousand dollars each.

Reid took the seats for Las Vegas fights in 2003-05 as he was pressing legislation to increase government oversight of the sport, including the creation of a federal boxing commission that Nevada's agency feared might usurp its authority.

Reid defended the gifts, saying they would never influence his position on the bill. He said he was simply trying to learn how his legislation might affect an important home state industry. “Anyone from Nevada would say, ‘I'm glad he is there taking care of the state's No. 1 businesses,' ” Reid said.

Two Republican senators who joined Reid for fights with the complimentary tickets took different steps. Sen. John McCain of Arizona paid $1,400 for the tickets he shared with Reid for a 2004 championship fight. Sen. John Ensign of Nevada accepted tickets to a fight with Reid but had recused himself from Reid's federal boxing legislation because his father was an executive for a Las Vegas hotel that hosts fights.

Senate ethics rules generally allow lawmakers to accept gifts from federal, state or local governments but warn against taking such gifts when they might be connected to efforts to influence official actions.

Finding himself under attack from both the right and left, Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., is putting $280,000 into television ads to defend his seat. Conservative Republicans, citing Chafee's votes against the war in Iraq, President Bush's tax cuts and Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito have been gravitating to his primary challenger, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

The Club for Growth, which has raised thousands of dollars for Laffey's campaign, is running ads on cable TV that criticize Chafee for voting against the president's tax cuts and supporting unspecified increases in government spending.

Chafee's ads present him as a financial conservative and attack Laffey for raising taxes and increasing government spending.

On the Democratic side, former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse is spending more than $180,000 on ads, promising to bring home the troops, lower drug costs and protect Social Security. Whitehouse leads in the polls against his Democratic primary rival, businessman Carl Sheeler.

Spending Bill Includes Pay Increases For Civil Service, Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 29, 2006

Federal employees would receive a 2.7 percent pay raise next year under a provision included in a fiscal 2007 spending bill.

The provision reaffirms a tradition of providing "pay parity" increases to the civil service and the military, and the policy decision is rarely changed by the House or Senate after being accepted by leaders of the House Appropriations Committee.

The 2007 raise was wrapped into a $67.8 billion appropriations bill for the departments of Transportation, Treasury, and Housing and Urban Development by Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee overseeing the departments. The bill, approved by the subcommittee on a voice vote Thursday night, typically includes a series of government-wide provisions, including the pay raise.

President Bush had recommended a 2.2 percent pay raise for the civil service and the military in his fiscal 2007 budget. But the House, on May 11, approved a 2.7 percent raise for the military as part of next year's defense authorization bill, and congressional aides said the transportation-treasury subcommittee decided to provide an equal increase for the civil service.

Reps. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) and James P. Moran (D-Va.), members of the Appropriations Committee, had planned to offer a pay parity amendment. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, also had urged Knollenberg and Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, to support a higher federal raise.

But the amendment became unnecessary when Knollenberg presented his draft of the bill. There was no discussion on the pay proposal before the voice vote, an aide said.

The Bush administration has opposed across-the-board raises for government personnel, contending that the president's recommendation is adequate and will support hiring objectives for the military and the civil service.

Advocates for parity in pay adjustments have said that civil service and military personnel serve side by side in the Defense Department and point to civilians in the Homeland Security, State and Justice departments and the CIA as essential to the support of the armed forces in the fight against terrorism.

The House Appropriations Committee will take up the spending bill on June 6, aides said.

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the subcommittee's decision "a giant step. This is very good news." She praised the panel for showing "bipartisan support and recognition that a 2.2 percent raise is inadequate."Retirement Upgrade

The Office of Personnel Management has awarded a contract to Accenture to develop business and technology models for the agency's transition to an electronic retirement system.

The contract, announced Friday, is part of a larger effort by OPM to more quickly calculate pension payments for federal employees who are retiring. The current process requires a search to find personnel files and other paperwork, often creating delays. Most retirees, as a result, are put on interim, partial retirement pay while a final annuity is calculated.

Accenture, a consulting and technology services company, will help OPM reorganize its staffing, training and processes for handling retirement claims under a contract that carries a maximum value of $40 million and that will run no longer than four years, an OPM official said. Accenture will be paid as task orders are issued, the official said.

The contract is the second awarded by OPM to upgrade retirement claims processing. On May 3, the agency announced a 10-year, $290 million contract with Hewitt Associates, an outsourcing and consulting firm, to build the new, electronic benefits-delivery and tracking system.

DOJ_NMG_0030224

Funding for the retirement project, however, may be in jeopardy. The House Appropriations transportation-treasury subcommittee that oversees OPM has removed funding for the project in fiscal 2007. The administration had asked for $26.7 million next year.

In a letter to Congress, OPM Director Linda M. Springer warned that the retirement project "will be halted without adequate funding" next year. An OPM official said the agency hopes to win support for the project when Congress returns after the holiday recess.

U.S. Foreign-Investment Debate Goes Global (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

As Congress debates legislation to tighten rules on foreign investment in the U.S., the most important audience may be abroad.

Any restrictions lawmakers impose on such deals could boomerang against the U.S., spurring action by nations anxious to impose their own limits. To date, the debate in Congress has focused on whether the proposed changes would impede the flow of capital into the country, endangering U.S. jobs and curbing economic expansion. A deeper danger is the legislation might feed retaliation abroad, tightening cross-border investment flows and damping the business climate for U.S. companies operating internationally.

"Anything we do, it reverberates," says Dave McCurdy, president of the Electronics Industries Alliance, a high-tech trade group in Arlington, Va., whose members include Motorola Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and BAE Systems PLC. A former Oklahoma congressman active in trade issues, Mr. McCurdy warns that China -- where the U.S. is pushing to loosen domestic restrictions on foreign investment -- is particularly watchful of what is happening on Capitol Hill.

Other nations are paying attention, too. In Russia, aides to President Vladimir Putin are working on legislation that would impose controls on foreign investors in "strategic industries," joining France and other nations in Europe that have embraced "economic patriotism." In Mexico, opening the oil sector further to foreign investors is a presidential campaign issue. And echoing the fight here over a Dubai company's bid to operate several U.S. ports, members of the Canadian Parliament are considering proposals to widen the government's authority to block investments on national-security grounds.

On Capitol Hill, senior members of the House and Senate are pushing rival bills that would make substantial changes in the Committee for Foreign Investment in the United States, of CFIUS, the panel that reviews the security implications of foreign-led transactions. The bills would subject deals involving government-controlled entities to an extended 45-day investigation -- beyond the 30-day review that applies to all deals. The measures would raise accountability within the government for final decisions, requiring cabinet-rank sign-off on scores of deals handled at lower levels.

The CFIUS panel is led by Treasury, but the departments of State, Homeland Security and Defense all have a seat at the table, as do several offices from within the White House.

Both chambers of Congress, moreover, share the goal of enhancing disclosure to lawmakers of CFIUS actions. The Senate, by far, draws a tougher line, requiring notification to Congress once reviews are initiated -- a mandate that would expose CFIUS deliberations to political influence. The House simply requires notification once reviews are completed. Further sharpening differences, the Senate bill would require the administration to create a ranking of countries based on compliance with weapons-control deals. Those rankings would guide CFIUS decisions. Also, a measure pushed by House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.), would bar foreigners from holding critical infrastructure, including roads and bridges and ports.

The legislation began amid concerns raised over Dubai Ports World, a firm controlled by the Persian Gulf emirate. The furor over DP World, which tried to gain control of commercial operations at five U.S. ports, highlighted public unease with the nation's security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and underscored an increasing economic nationalism among the public and many U.S. lawmakers.

"We live in an age of nascent protectionism," says Ohio Republican Mike Oxley, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0030225

The Trans-Atlantic Business Dialogue, a group of business executives from Europe and the U.S., warns lawmakers to proceed cautiously. The group says legislation on Capitol Hill "greatly complicates" efforts by global-minded companies to resist calls abroad for new limits on foreign competition and investment.

The Bush administration, after losing control of the Dubai debate, is trying to referee an end to the sparring. Aides to President Bush stress the need to embrace policies that meet national-security demands post-Sept. 11, while ensuring the U.S. supports investment -- at home and abroad. From 1985-2004, foreign investment in U.S. hard assets, such as buildings and factories, as opposed to stocks and bonds, soared to $1.47 trillion from $184.6 billion. U.S. foreign direct investment abroad ballooned during the same period, reaching more than $2 trillion.

The flow of capital dramatizes the integration of the world economy that took place in the 1990s, and preserving the capital flow is a Bush priority. But the administration worries that even the House bill -- the more moderate of the measures moving through Congress -- may go too far.

"There's no question that countries around the world are watching this very carefully," says Clay Lowery, Treasury's assistant secretary of international affairs. "It is a concern to us."

Andrew Somers, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, is working to make sure U.S. lawmakers know their actions are being monitored abroad. Mr. Somers says Kremlin officials have suggested to him that the Putin-backed measure aimed at limiting foreign investment has been put on slow track, in part to assess the effect of legislative efforts in Washington. In Moscow, diplomats don't quite go that far, but do emphasize that making the case for liberal foreign-investment rules has gotten harder after the fights over Cnooc Ltd. and Dubai Ports World.

Analysis: Democrats Wary Of November Vote (AP-Y2)

By Ron Fournier

AP2, May 29, 2006

Republicans are three steps from a November shellacking — each a grim possibility if habitually divided Democrats get their acts together.

First step: Voters must focus on the national landscape on Nov. 7 rather than local issues and personalities that usually dominate midterm elections.

That would sting Republicans, who trail badly in national polls.

Second step: Voters must be so angry at Washington and politics in general that an anti-incumbent, throw-the-bums-out mentality sweeps the nation.

That would wound Republicans, the majority party.

Third step: Americans must view the elections as a referendum on President Bush and the GOP-led Congress, siding with Democrats in a symbolic vote against the Iraq war, rising gas prices, economic insecurity and the nagging sense that the nation is on the wrong track.

That would destroy Republicans, sweeping them from power in one or both chambers and making Bush a lame duck.

Less than six months out, most Democratic and Republican strategists say the first two elements are in place for now — a national, anti-incumbent mind-set — and all signs point to the third.

Still, many Democrats worry that their party has not closed the deal.

"The fear I have as a Democrat is that if we are making this solely a referendum on the Republicans, we are not giving people a reason to turn out," said Democratic strategist Chris Lehane of California.

"Having said that, I think all these other elements are so bad for the Republicans that 'Had enough?' should be enough."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean and the party's congressional leaders have clashed over money and the DNC's push for a unified message that draws a stark contrast with the GOP.

Inside the DNC, some officials point to internal polls that show voters holding both the Democratic and Republican parties in equally low esteem.

The fact that most voters, when forced to choose, tell pollsters they want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress is not a sign of strength, these officials say. Rather, it's evidence that voters are simply giving Democrats a chance to win them over — a chance that can be blown unless Democrats stand for something other than attacking Bush, these officials said.

Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, agreed that Democrats have not sealed the deal.

"I think if the election were held today, there is a 50-50 chance of taking the House and the Senate and a very high percentage of gaining a significant number of seats," Schumer said.

"But things change."

Democrats outside Congress will be disappointed with anything less than major triumphs.

"Shame on us if we don't have a good election cycle," said Jill Alper, a Democratic strategist from Michigan.

Back to those three steps.

NATIONAL ELECTION: Among the two dozen Republican and Democratic strategists interviewed in the last two weeks, there was unanimity that the fall campaigns will be national in scope. Voters will give local issues less attention than normal, a bad sign for the GOP.

"If we keep it local we win; if they nationalize issues, they win," said Michigan Republican Party Chairman Saul Anuzis.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, head of the GOP Senate committee, seemed resigned to a national campaign. "Obviously, we're going to do everything we can here at the Senate committee to minimize any aspect of that," she said.

THROW THE BUMS OUT: More than 70 percent of Americans tell pollsters that the nation is on the wrong track. Larger percentages think corruption is a major problem in Washington. Incumbents have been roughed up already this year in Pennsylvania and Indiana, and in both cases Republicans suffered the worst.

If this shapes up to be an anti-incumbent midterm, "we'll lose some members" in Congress, said Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, "but they have more incumbents."

ANTI-REPUBLICAN TIDE: Whether 2006 turns out to be an anti-incumbent or anti-GOP election "is the 15-seat question," said Democratic strategist Dane Strother, referring to the number of seats the Democrats need to win to seize control of the House.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., says GOP majorities are "clearly in jeopardy" because the political landscape is both anti-incumbent and anti-Republican.

"They know that Republicans are in charge," the grim-faced presidential hopeful said of voters. "But I just want to emphasize that we have six months, and we can turn this around."

And Democrats could fumble the opportunity.

Takeover Of House, Senate Not Likely (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

The only thing that can be said with any certainty about the 2006 midterm elections is that none of the top campaign forecasters is flatly predicting Republicans will lose the House or Senate -- yet.

President Bush's job approval polls are the lowest in his presidency; the Democrats are leading Republicans in the generic congressional election polls by an average of 13 percent; and voter surveys suggest a strong anti-incumbent tide is building. But leading analysts still think at this point that Republicans will hold on to majority control of both chambers, though with reduced numbers.

"The 2006 midterm elections are a political analyst's nightmare. The national climate seems to portend big changes, yet race-by-race analyses reveal formidable odds against a Democratic takeover of either the House or the Senate," veteran elections tracker Charlie Cook says in his latest National Journal election preview.

Several structural problems confront the Democrats in the House elections. Just three- to four-dozen House races out of 435 at stake are truly competitive. And among the 18 Republican seats that are open, only half are in districts where "Democrats have a remote chance of winning," Mr. Cook says. Making matters worse, the Democrats were able to recruit only second- or third-tier challengers in many key districts where the Republicans looked vulnerable.

Stuart Rothenberg, Mr. Cook's chief rival in the political predictions business, believes "the House definitely is in play" and has increased his estimate of likely Democratic gains "from 5-8 seats to 7-10 seats," short of the 15 seats needed to topple Republicans from power, though he thinks there could be "greater Democratic gains."

As for the six to eight Senate seats that are in play this year, there appear to be nearly as many races where Democrats are leading, as in Pennsylvania and Maryland, as races where Republicans are competitive, like Washington, Minnesota and New Jersey. Neither Mr. Cook nor Mr. Rothenberg see the Democrats taking control of the Senate, but they could make some gains in the GOP's 55-45 seat majority, they say.

But to win, Democrats would need a strong national anti-Republican wave behind them, Mr. Rothenberg writes in his latest House forecast. Many Democrats think that opposition to the war in Iraq, $3 a gallon gas prices, unhappiness with the economy and the GOP's handling of illegal immigration is creating that wave.

"I think we are in one of those cycles in politics where the Republicans in Congress are getting hit on every front and obviously the president's polls don't help, and that, combined with a series of unprecedented crises, from the war to gas prices, concerns over the handling of Hurricane Katrina, and with conservative Republicans expressing great concern [about their party's political direction], it's almost as if they can't catch a break," said Democratic adviser Leon Panetta, who was President Clinton's White House chief of staff.

"The anxiety of the country is there and people are angry and frustrated and wondering where the country is going. In light of that, there isn't any question in my view that Democrats would be able to win control of the House and probably capture additional seats in the Senate, though it's going to be much harder to get control of the Senate," Mr. Panetta said.

But independent pollsters like John Zogby say the Democrats could "blow this opportunity" if they do not come up with an agenda that appeals to swing voters, and Mr. Panetta, among other Democrats, is urging his party to come up with "an agenda and a message for voters, sooner rather than later."

"They ought to present a very clear vision to the country in four or five areas. People want to know they stand for something. The public is hungry to know what solutions this party is going to present," he said. "If they wait too long, they won't have enough time to say what they stand for."

He is also worried about the political fallout from a growing anti-incumbent mood that he says could hit both parties in November. "This could be one of those years that could produce a lot of surprises where we could see some Democratic incumbents not winning easy seats and that could be true for Republicans as well," he said.

Both parties enter the last five months of the 2006 election with political advantages that they hope to exploit in the final weeks of the campaigns, but with problems and divisions, too.

The Republicans' biggest political advantage lies in its congressional district boundaries, which have been redrawn over the past decade in GOP-friendly ways. A number of district lines were strengthened after the 2000 census in both Republican and Democratic districts. As a result, Republican redistricting strategists say, the GOP now has many more districts that can withstand a stiffer Democratic challenge.

In the past decade or more the re-election rate for House members has been running from 97 percent to 99.5 percent. And despite the Republican Congress' low approval polls, surveys show that an average of 59 percent of the voters like the job their representative or senator is doing.

But Republican campaign advisers acknowledge that the bitter battles over immigration, spending and other issues have divided and alienated parts of the party conservative base amid fears that many will not turn out to vote.

"I worry about that. There's disagreement in the party and dissatisfaction on the issues. [Republican leaders] are going to have to convince conservative voters that Congress is holding true to conservative principles," said Frank Donatelli, the former Reagan White House political director.

"There's just tremendous division. The issues that brought the party to power are not around anymore. New issues have come to the fore, so it's going to be a challenge to reconstitute your governing coalition. It's not going to happen in '06. The 2008 presidential election is the next big challenge to fashion a governing agenda," Mr. Donatelli said.

But other Republicans say they do not see any evidence that the party's disputes are having any effect in their state elections.

DOJ_NMG_0030228

"The president's popularity is eroding in this state as it is everywhere else, but there's no evidence I've seen that there is any kind of down-ballot effect because of what's going on in Washington. I don't have a sense that the wheels are wobbling on the Republican Party here," said Florida Republican campaign consultant Mac Stipanovich.

Still, Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, isn't taking any chances. He has reactivated the massive get-out-the-vote volunteer army that was pivotal to the success of the party's 2004 election victories. A Republican ground force that will eventually number in the hundreds of thousands is identifying, contacting and registering voters in a vast computerized network that for months has been sending in weekly quota reports to the RNC in preparation for its get-out-the-vote drive on Election Day.

But if the Republicans are having problems with their base, Democrats say their supporters are more activated and united than ever.

"We are seeing an uptick in party participation. We've had a 25-year high this year in precinct caucus participation," said Brian Melendez, the Minnesota Democratic state chairman. "That suggests that party activists are energized."

Like other Democrats interviewed, Mr. Melendez is unhappy with his party's failure to produce a national campaign agenda and is critical of Democratic leaders who say they will subpoena and investigate Mr. Bush's administration if they win control of the House in November.

"I hope that's not where we go. I hope we fight on the issues that affect people's lives and not engage in political infighting. I would rather end the war than try to impeach George Bush," he said.

"What Democrats need to do is to articulate a clear message that is more than we-are-not-the-Republicans," he said.

Many Democrats say their local organizations have been strengthened by the party organizers sent into their state by party Chairman Howard Dean. The Democratic National Committee has put at least four party strategists into each state, as part of a long-term, 50-state party-building plan to prepare for the '06 and '08 elections.

"It's working miracles and is exactly the right strategy for Minnesota," Mr. Melendez said. "They are doing the grass-roots organizing that is going to turn out our voters in November, channeling all that voter anger into votes."

Bush Rating At All-time Low In W.Va. (CWVG)

By Scott Finn

Charleston (WV) Gazette, May 29, 2006

A record number of West Virginians don't like the way President Bush is doing his job, according to a new poll from the nonpartisan group SurveyUSA and WUSA-TV in Washington.

Fifty-nine percent of state residents disapproved in the survey of 600 adults taken May 12 to 14. Thirty-seven percent approve. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Bush's approval rating in West Virginia is 2 points below his previous low of 39 percent reached in December, May and April.

The president is still more popular in West Virginia than most states. Nationwide, only 33 percent of American adults approved of his job performance, according to SurveyUSA.

The approval rating among state Republicans has taken the biggest dive, from 87 percent in January to 67 percent this month, while 18 percent of Democrats and 38 percent of independents approve of the president's job performance.

Bush's troubles are no surprise to Marybeth Beller, assistant professor of political science at Marshall University. She blamed dissatisfaction about the war in Iraq.

"You're seeing Republican leaders in the House of Representatives opening up a debate about the Iraq war," she said. "That's a sign of growing frustration about the war and Republicans' willingness to distance themselves from the president to save their own seats."

The only Republican representing West Virginia in Congress, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, also is distancing herself from the Bush administration by talking about high gas prices, mine safety and problems with the Medicare drug benefit plan, Beller said.

DOJ_NMG_0030229

Her Democratic challenger, former federal prosecutor Mike Callaghan, will have to do a better job getting out the vote and introducing himself to voters if he wants to beat Capito this fall, she said.

About two-thirds of West Virginians approved of the job being done by West Virginia's two Democratic senators.

Clinton Is A Politician Not Easily Defined (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Hillary Rodham Clinton has fashioned a political persona that generates intense passions but defies easy characterization. She is viewed as a hawk on Iraq and national security, stamped as a big-government Democrat for her work on health care in the 1990s, and depicted as seeking the middle ground on abortion.

After three decades in public life, New York's junior senator is one of the most recognized women in the world, her every move and utterance interpreted amid the assumption in Democratic circles and her own circle that her reelection campaign this fall will pivot into a run for president in 2008. Yet for all her fame, there are missing pieces to the Clinton puzzle: What does she stand for? And where would she try to take the country if elected?

Clinton's roles as senator, first lady, governor's wife, lawyer and children's advocate have given her a depth of experience that few national politicians can match, but she is still trying to demonstrate whether these yielded a coherent governing philosophy. For now, she is defined by a combination of celebrity and caution that strategists say leaves her more vulnerable than most politicians to charges that she is motivated more by personal ambition and tactical maneuver than by a clear philosophy.

In recent weeks, Clinton has moved to clarify her agenda with major speeches on the economy and energy. Later this summer she will help present a new strategy for the Democrats. She has also given speeches setting out her foreign policy views. But she has yet to wrap up her ideas in a kind of package like the "New Democrat" philosophy her husband, former president Bill Clinton, used in his 1992 campaign or the "compassionate conservative" label George W. Bush adopted in 2000.

To the contrary, she made clear in a telephone interview on Friday that her governing philosophy may never be easily reduced to a slogan. "I don't think like that," she said. "I approach each issue and problem from a perspective of combining my beliefs and ideals with a search for practical solutions. It doesn't perhaps fit in a preexisting box, but many of the problems we face as a nation don't either."

As a result, everyone seems to have a label for her. Roger Altman, a former Treasury Department official and one of her outside advisers, calls Clinton "a modern centrist." William Galston of the Brookings Institution, who was domestic policy adviser in the Clinton White House, describes her as "a progressive without illusions" and a politician who has been "consistent but complicated."

Her detractors find much -- and much different -- to criticize. Liberal columnist Molly Ivins dismisses Clinton as the embodiment of "triangulation, calculation and equivocation." Markos Moulitsas, whose Daily Kos Web site often attacks the Democratic establishment, ridicules her as a leader who is "afraid to offend." The Rev. Jerry Falwell, echoing a view shared by many Republicans, calls her a liberal "ideologue" who is far more doctrinaire than her husband.

A selective reading of Clinton's record can produce evidence to prove she is a centrist, a liberal and much in between. But there are clear patterns. On defense, she has consistently supported the use of force abroad, having advocated military intervention in the Balkans during her husband's administration. She differs with Bush administration officials on many aspects of how they have conducted foreign policy, but not on combating terrorism or the imperative of winning in Iraq.

Domestically, she has a more complex profile, a product of life experiences that have shaped and refined her approach to issues. She is an activist who believes in the power of government to solve problems, but those pro-government instincts have been tempered by the health-care debacle of 1993-94 and the nation's budgetary squeeze. On family policy, she has some traditional, even moralistic, instincts that those who know her best say are genuine and deeply felt.

Asked whether there is anything that connects her different interests and positions, she answered in spacious language: "What's framed all the work I've done in the Senate and all the years before that is my belief that our most important obligation is to take care of our children . . . and that as a nation, America should remain as a symbol of freedom and hope around the world."

She believes government is an essential partner in a three-sided relationship that also includes the free market, and a "civil society" of churches and nonprofit groups. "I am a big believer in self-help and personal responsibility and a work ethic that holds people responsible," she said. "But I know one of the reasons our country has been one of the most successful organizations in the world is because we got the balance right."A Polarizing Force

The debate about Clinton's beliefs is linked to one about her electability. Many Democrats fear she carries so much baggage that, if she becomes the party's standard-bearer in 2008, she would prove too polarizing and lead it to a third straight defeat. Many Republicans see a shrewd politician who they fear would be a formidable opponent in a general election and who, if elected, would move the country leftward.

That she polarizes the electorate is clear from a new Washington Post-ABC News poll. The survey found that 84 percent of Democrats have a favorable impression of Clinton, while 73 percent of Republicans have an unfavorable view. As a point of contrast, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a leading potential candidate for the Republican nomination, is viewed favorably by 65 percent of Republicans and 50 percent of Democrats.

Although she has drawn criticism from the left for supporting the Iraq war, Clinton remains more popular among liberal Democrats than among moderate Democrats. Overall, 37 percent of Americans said she is too liberal, which is less than the 45 percent recorded for Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) during the 2004 campaign and almost identical to perceptions of then-Vice President Al Gore in 2000.

Clinton's advisers argue that most Americans have formed opinions about her based not just on Iraq or health care but also on how she has conducted herself through personal circumstances. In the Post-ABC News poll, for example, 68 percent said they see Clinton as a strong leader, 16 percentage points more than Bush received a few months ago.

On balance, most of those around Clinton say her hard-to-pigeonhole profile is a political asset -- the product, they say, of a curious intellect, the absence of rigid ideology, an instinct for problem solving and a willingness to seek consensus even across party lines. Her detractors see her career as the work of an opportunistic politician who has sanded the sharp edges off her views, so much so that there is little sense of authenticity when she speaks.

On Iraq, she has tried to be a critic of Bush without renouncing her support for the resolution that authorized him to go to war, as other Democrats have done. She opposes both a timetable for withdrawing troops and an open-ended commitment.

In the interview, Clinton defended herself. "I've said many times I regret how the president has used his authority," she said. "But I think I have a responsibility to look at this as carefully as I can and say what I believe, and what I believe is we're in a very dangerous situation and it doesn't lend itself to sound bites, and therefore I have resisted going along with either my colleagues who feel passionately they need to call for a date certain or colleagues who are 100 percent behind the policy and with the president and [British] Prime Minister [Tony] Blair. . . . I know I take criticism from all sides on this, but I've tried to work my way through it as clearly and responsibly as I can."

Bill Clinton is also a defender. At a meeting of a group of well-heeled liberal donors called the Democracy Alliance this month in Austin, he lost his temper when an audience member suggested that Hillary Clinton should follow the lead of 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards and renounce her 2002 vote authorizing military force in Iraq, audience members said. He glowered and lectured the donor that it was more important to look to the future than to debate the past in Iraq.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton has introduced about 190 bills. Of those not strictly involving parochial New York matters, about half include at least one Republican co-sponsor, her advisers say.

But a Congressional Quarterly analysis found that she has voted with a majority of Democrats 95 percent of the time and has consistently recorded one of the highest percentages for opposing Bush on legislation of any of her potential 2008 Democratic rivals.No One Label

Those who have dealt with Clinton say she is not easily caricatured. "Reviewing her writings, which I've done, having chatted with her and knowing personally something about how the Clintons raised Chelsea, I believe she holds what we sometimes call traditional values about personal responsibility and family," said Douglas Besharov of the American Enterprise Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0030231

Peter Edelman, who resigned in protest from the Clinton administration after the president signed, with his wife's support, the welfare reform bill in 1996, said no label fits her. "Anybody who thinks she's some sort of down-the-line liberal who has tailored her thinking for electoral reasons, I think that's just not true," he said.

The defeat of her health-care proposal in 1994, advisers say, taught her to respect the limits of the political system to absorb major policy changes.

She said the biggest lesson learned is that there can be no progress on health care without the business community. "There has to be a consensus in the public and private sector before we can ever get the political system to respond," she said.

Hillary Clinton has a populist streak that sometimes takes on an angry edge, in contrast to her husband. But one policy aide in the Clinton White House who has worked closely with both Clintons suggested their differences are stylistic. "She's just blunter in the way she talks about things than he is," the adviser said. "If you hear the same policy from both of them, because he sugarcoated it and she didn't, it might sound more centrist coming from him than from her."

No Clinton speech has drawn more attention than her January 2005 address in which she described abortion as a "sad, even tragic choice" for many women. The speech was widely interpreted as her effort to move toward the center. Her advisers, worried that she would be attacked for inconsistency, insisted that it represented no change from her past position.

The speech, read in its entirety, was a ringing endorsement of a woman's right to choose, and its political purpose, advisers say, was to put abortion foes on the defensive about contraception, not to make news by softening Clinton's tone on abortion.

This summer, Clinton will participate in the rollout of a Democratic agenda, a project initiated by the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. At her urging, the project includes participation of the liberal Center for American Progress, as well as two other centrist groups, the New Democrat Network and Third Way.

When he sought the presidency, Bill Clinton used the DLC to signal a break from the old Democratic Party when the DLC officials were at war with the liberal wing. Hillary Clinton appears to have the opposite goal, which is to use the DLC as a base from which to unite the party to rebut criticism that Democrats have no common message.

Galston suggested that people are asking the wrong questions about her. "I think the real issue that people ought to be talking about is not whether she's consistent or sincere," he said. "If I'm reading her correctly, she is. The real question that people ought to be asking is, given what she's stood for unflinchingly, is that the direction they want the standard-bearer to take the party?"

Waiting At The Docks (WT)

By Antonio Villaraigosa And Rusty Hammer

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

This past week, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation recently passed by the state legislature to place the largest infrastructure bond measure in state history -- $37 billion for transportation, housing, education and levees -- before the voters in November. This historic agreement has the strong support of the City of Los Angeles and its business leaders. Meanwhile, throughout the United States, other states are struggling with how to fund the transportation infrastructure that is so necessary to the future of the country.

One of the biggest effects of that gap is the economic cost of delays and logistical uncertainties in transporting goods, as congestion threatens to overwhelm the system. Our economic reality is changing to meet the distribution needs of imported goods, and our environmental reality is telling us to be mindful of the inherent relationship between environmental pollution and the movement of goods. There will be no greater pressure placed on our transportation system and environment than this massive inflow. As we survey the global context and local landscape, it is clear that our gateway cities, with Los Angeles a top example, face major challenges -- from homeland security to the movement of goods to public health to the environment.

The movement of goods has far-reaching effects on the lives of all Americans. Not only does it shape our markets, it also impacts the air we breathe, the jobs we create and the economic climate we foster.

American retailers and manufacturers depend on the Ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach for 43 percent of all imported goods to the United States Think of it as a river carrying more than $230 billion in products to every corner of every state, where retail jobs and markups and sales taxes add value to local economies.

DOJ_NMG_0030232

To carry this load, there are ships of increasing size and number, needing more trains and trucks, arriving at our docks every day. The biggest container vessels can now carry up to 1.2 million 29-inch color televisions or 50 million mobile phones and are larger than an aircraft carrier.

The issue we face is daunting: We have no coherent national policy to deal with goods and freight movement. Nor do we have the available resources upfront to infuse our seaports, airports, highways and rail lines with enough capital to be efficient and cost-effective for users in years ahead.

We must be creative and responsible in how we green, grow and compete in our increasingly global market place. And our success will be measured not only by our economic prosperity, but also in how our decisions and investments maintain the environmental integrity and public health of our communities.

This is not an exclusively urban or rural problem; this is a global issue affecting every sector of our market and every consumer in every community. Meanwhile, issues surrounding port and cargo security have, until now, been going unaddressed and adding to the uncertainty within the supply chain.

The Los Angeles gateway is a national asset, providing consumer goods to the entire country. Californians are stepping up to the plate to ensure the critical infrastructure necessary for competitive access to world markets, but we can't do it alone.

A stronger partnership with the federal government is essential. What's needed? From Congress: Pass the port security bill. From the Department of Transportation: Provide a national freight policy and partner with the states and cities on massive gateway and corridor construction projects. From the states: Share the financial burden of these projects of national significance, whose return on investment is spread throughout the country.

The challenges we face are immense. And they will not be remedied with simple solutions or quick fixes. Nor can they be addressed by one community alone.

A unified country needs a unified, flowing transportation system. Los Angeles and California are ready to put our future on the line to raise our share of the cost, but this is a future that belongs to the whole country, and we can only achieve it together.

Manufacturers' Profits Outpace Broader Economy (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

Profits are increasing far faster for U.S. manufacturers than for U.S. companies as a whole, aided by a wave of consolidation that has wiped out weaker players, unrelenting cost cutting and a revival of pricing power in some sectors.

Companies still find it tough to raise prices to consumers, helping curb overall inflation.

But within manufacturing, those that make important materials and intermediate products are raising prices to other producers, often in an effort to offset their own soaring costs. Many have moved some operations overseas, trimming costs.

A surge in U.S. exports, dominated by manufactured goods, also is helping. The Commerce Department reported this month that exports jumped 13.8% to $76.5 billion in March, compared with a year ago.

"There's clearly been an upturn in profits and profitability for manufacturers," says David Huether, director of economic analysis at the National Association of Manufacturers.

To be sure, some manufacturers continue to struggle. Foreign competition remains fierce. Manufacturers could also face challenges keeping up profit growth amid rising interest rates, predictions of a global economic slowdown and the continued climb in prices for raw materials, particularly energy.

Manufacturing profits almost quadrupled since 2001 on a pretax basis to $208 billion last year, according to the Bureau of Economic Analysis, while profits for all types of companies doubled to $1.2 trillion. Manufacturing profits now exceed the level they reached at the height of the late 1990s economic boom.

DOJ_NMG_0030233

Economists say that manufacturing's relative strength is partly attributable to the severity of the recent downturn, which was far deeper than it was for the larger economy. Profits in the factory sector plunged almost 64% in 2001 to $52.6 billion from $144.3 billion in 2000 as manufacturers shed millions of workers and slashed output to survive the slump. Manufacturers had more ground to cover just to catch up, says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at bank National City Corp. in Cleveland.

"I expect manufacturing profit gains to continue throughout 2006, though rising interest and labor costs will slow the momentum somewhat," Mr. DeKaser says.

The global boom has helped. Caterpillar Inc. recently reported first-quarter net income rose 45% to $840 million from a year earlier amid strong world-wide demand for construction and mining equipment.

Some U.S. companies also are benefiting from increased manufacturing on U.S. soil by foreign companies, even as some traditional customers such as General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. struggle to run their factories profitably. "Go up the road to Toyota -- their parking lot is full, they're expanding," says Michael Mittler, president of Mittler Bros. Machine & Tool in Wright City, Missouri, referring to Japanese auto maker Toyota Motor Corp. Toyota's plant in nearby Troy, Missouri, makes aluminum castings for cylinder heads and engine manifolds.

Striding through the middle of his bustling shop one recent morning, he pointed to large machines that shape cylinder heads for Toyota's new V-8 engines, part of a subcontract he landed last fall.

Mr. Huether, the NAM economist, says, "One of the things driving profits for manufacturers is that they have more pricing power," although in some cases that mainly means no longer facing as much pressure to cut prices. He attributes this both to rising domestic demand as well as to higher prices for imports, which creates less deflationary pressure in the U.S.

Robert Murdock, president of Murdock-SuperSecur LLC, has raised prices, just not fast enough. His Cincinnati-based company, a maker of brass drinking fountains and fire hydrants, is caught in a bind because of the lag between when his customers order products and when he delivers. With raw materials such as brass surging over the past year, he often has found himself paying more for metal than he had expected, after quoting a lower price as part of a bid.

For many manufacturers, the trick has been to keep squeezing their own costs and pushing into new businesses in order to boost profits.

Hoveround Corp. in Sarasota, Florida, isn't allowed to raise prices for its motorized wheelchairs and scooters, because prices are set by fee structures for Medicaid and by contracts with large insurers. Yet the company has managed to consistently widen profit margins "slightly" each year, says company President Tom Kruse.

One strategy has been to move more production of subassemblies and parts to cheaper off-shore factories. And the company has grown every year since 2000, so it has also benefited in some cases by increasing the volume of outside parts it buys, making it eligible for bigger volume discounts.

Meanwhile, business is the best it has ever been at Allfast Fastening Systems Inc. in City of Industry, California. Chief Executive Jim Randall says demand has soared for the company's rivets, used in commercial and military aircraft. Indeed, Mr. Randall's biggest problem is meeting demand, given tight supplies of key materials such as titanium. Some wags in the industry have taken to calling such hard-to-get metals "unobtainium."

Talk Of Pelosi As Speaker Delights Both Parties (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 29 — Hoping to win a Congressional majority in November, some optimistic Democratic lawmakers have taken to referring to Representative Nancy Pelosi as "speaker," as in speaker of the House. So have some optimistic Republicans.

"She ought to be a big component of the fall campaign," said Ed Rogers, a Republican strategist and lobbyist. "There are some Democrats who make really good bad guys."

Ms. Pelosi, the California Democrat and House minority leader, lends herself to easy caricature by Republicans. She is an unapologetic liberal, with a voting record to match (the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, said she was neither a "New Democrat" nor an "Old Democrat" but a "prehistoric Democrat"). She is wealthy (married to an investment banker, she has assets listed at more than $16 million). She represents San Francisco, which Republicans love to invoke as a hotbed of counterculture decadence and extremism.

"Is America ready for Nancy Pelosi's Contract With San Francisco?" asked Representative Ric Keller, Republican of Florida, posing a question that, one imagines, could form the basis of many Republican advertisements this fall.

Democrats may have some reservations about Ms. Pelosi, but they are largely loyal, seeing her as an earnest champion of the party's beliefs and as an effective leader.

"She has brought everyone together, she has kept everyone together, and I think she deserves a great deal of credit," said Martin Frost, a former Texas congressman and rival of Ms. Pelosi for minority leader.

Republicans have made a target of Ms. Pelosi — who has become ubiquitous on campaign podiums, in interviews and in Republican talking points — because the notion of Democrats' winning a Congressional majority is hardly the pipe dream it was 18 months ago.

As President Bush's approval ratings languish with those of Republican lawmakers, polls suggest that Democrats could be on course to lead the House for the first time in 12 years.

As a result, Ms. Pelosi teeters on a fine line: between the need to say what Democrats plan to do if they win control of the House and the danger of speaking too soon. She begins some sentences with "when we win" and others with "if we win." Sometimes she will tack on a qualifier ("no matter who wins this election") or caveat ("that's if the election were held today").

"I don't want to appear overconfident," she said.

She is sitting in an office that, she often notes, belonged to Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. when he was speaker. After November, she hopes — or expects — to assume that mantle, depending on what conjunction she happens to be using.

Republicans hope to block her ascent by preventing Democrats from picking up the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. Republican strategists say they are eager to conduct a direct assault on Ms. Pelosi, focusing on what they believe are her vulnerabilities.

Ms. Pelosi can struggle at times to give the air of the gravitas that powerful women like Hillary Rodham Clinton and Condoleezza Rice do, both friends and adversaries say. She can appear tentative and overscripted in interviews, with a tight smile and large, expressive eyes than can leave an impression of nervousness.

"Her public speaking style is not good," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts.

She is more animated and assured in private meetings, said Mr. Frank, who counts himself a big admirer.

The view of Ms. Pelosi as a deficient spokeswoman for her party was buttressed during an appearance on "Meet the Press" on NBC earlier this month, which centered largely on what Democrats would do if they won the House. Political insiders of both parties judged her performance as shaky, uncommanding and defensive.

"A lot of Republicans were saying, 'We need her on TV more,' " said Ed Kutler, a Republican lobbyist. "Maybe we should buy ad time for her."

Asked why she makes such a popular Democratic bogyman, or bogywoman, Ms. Pelosi shrugged, smirked and, finally, smiled.

"I am an Italian-American Catholic grandmother," she said, "very traditional in terms of values."

She repeated this three times, as if to emphasize that her self-image was at odds with more common descriptors, like "San Francisco liberal."

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House Democratic whip, said, "They will try to demonize our members in leadership because it's all they have left."

Mr. Hoyer, who is seen as more moderate than Ms. Pelosi, has made no secret over the years of his interest in moving up the leadership ranks. But he said he would not run against Ms. Pelosi for speaker, and he dismissed speculation on Capitol Hill that he might do so as "the right trying to create a fight."

Ms. Pelosi has said that she intends to become speaker if her party wins control of the House and that she would expect to run unopposed.

As the prospect of a Democratic majority gains credibility and Ms. Pelosi is more visible, she is also subjected to the speculation and analysis about her hair, makeup and clothes that any woman positioned for such a big job often must endure.

DOJ_NMG_0030235

"I hear them say on TV that I've had face-lifts," said Ms. Pelosi, 66, who added that she had never had one. "I heard one woman say I've had a face-lift, but it looks terrible."

She shook her head and said, "Did you ever think that those two things cancel themselves out?"

Ms. Pelosi said she slept little, stole exercise by dashing through airports and subsisted many days on Ghirardelli chocolates ("less than 10" a day) and pistachio nuts (which she shells with her teeth).

"I had a hamburger last night and it was my breakfast, lunch and dinner," she said last week. "And I had these strange things. I realized they were French fries." She made quick spiraling gestures with her fingers to show what they looked like.

It was apparent that she was not familiar with curly fries.

In the course of two interviews, Ms. Pelosi repeated herself frequently, even by the hyper-repetitious standards of politicians:

¶About how the Republican House leadership was presiding over a "culture of corruption."

¶About how Democrats were committed to fiscal responsibility.

¶About how Democrats would restore civility to the House.

¶About how "when Democrats win," President Bush will be a "lame duck," upon which she switches poultry metaphors and drops in the cautionary cliché about not counting chickens before they are hatched.

She repeated Jesse Jackson-like alliterative sound bites in halting un-Jackson-like cadences. Republicans, she said, "are engaging in deluge and desperation," while her Democratic caucus "is a great collection of idealism, intellect and" — she paused while trying to summon the third "i" — "integrity."

Whatever Ms. Pelosi lacks as a communicator, her political gifts are abundant, colleagues say. She is known as a shrewd inside player with instincts honed in the political hothouse of her youth. She grew up in the Little Italy section of Baltimore, one of six children and the only daughter of a legendary Democratic machine boss, congressman and mayor, Tommy D'Alesandro.

She attended Trinity College in Washington, where she met her future husband, Paul Pelosi, who was attending Georgetown. They eventually moved to his hometown, San Francisco, where she remained active in Democratic politics and was first elected to Congress in 1987. The heavily Democratic district has easily re-elected her ever since.

In Congress, Ms. Pelosi has been particularly interested in intelligence issues and has strongly supported abortion rights. She has also shown sharp-elbowed partisanship and old-school pragmatism and collegiality.

Ms. Pelosi nodded vigorously when asked if she was friends with Representative Tom DeLay, whom she had just seconds earlier described as "corrupt." She went on to catalog the work the two had done together in Congress. And then Ms. Pelosi affirmed, once again, how "corrupt" her friend Mr. DeLay was.

Ms. Pelosi, who succeeded Representative Richard A. Gephardt as minority leader in 2002, has been credited in that role with keeping her racially, ideologically and stylistically diverse caucus unified. Congressional Quarterly magazine examined 669 roll-call votes in 2005 and found that Democrats voted with the majority of their party 88 percent of the time, the highest total since it started doing such analyses in 1956.

"She understands her members, where they are on issues and what they need," said the Democratic lobbyist Steve Elmendorf, a former aide to Mr. Gephardt.

Mr. Elmendorf described Ms. Pelosi as "an extremely attentive leader" who would deservedly receive much credit if Democrats won in November.

Democratic solidarity is also forged of the party's fierce opposition to President Bush's policies. As Mr. Frank said, "The Republicans' extremism is the sine qua non of our unity."

Indeed, throughout the Bush presidency, Democrats have been criticized as being only against Mr. Bush and not standing for any ideals or agenda of their own. This creates something of a dilemma for them.

In recent years, Republicans have charged that Democrats had no ideas, Ms. Pelosi said. Now, whenever Democrats talk about their ideas, she said, "they say we're measuring the curtains on the speaker's office."

Ms. Pelosi disagrees with the notion — proffered by some Democrats — that party leaders should say nothing and let the Republicans founder on their own.

"We've done our job for 18 months saying why they shouldn't vote for Republicans," she said. "Enough of the Republicans. Now it's about us."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

Jeb's future

Don't underestimate Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's prospects as a future presidential contender, says former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Probably 2008 is a little bit tricky, but " '12 or '16 isn't. And he's a young enough guy that he has a great future," Mr. Gingrich said on a Florida television station.

"I just think his natural, personal ability is so great that people are going to realize he is not his father, and he's not his brother. He's a very unique, charismatic leader with extraordinary capabilities. ... Jeb Bush may well be the most innovative [governor] in the entire country."

Which potential Democratic presidential candidate most worries Mr. Gingrich?

"Either [former Virginia] Gov. Mark Warner or [Indiana] Sen. Evan Bayh have a lot to offer the Democratic Party because they're more moderate," he said, although he predicted that either would have a very tough time beating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for the nomination.

Mr. Gingrich said Mrs. Clinton will have a tough time winning over voters in much of the country, including Florida, but Republicans are foolish to underestimate her.

"She's very smart; she works very hard. Anyone who thinks we're going to beat her easily is just wrong. We can beat her if we have better ideas and better solutions, and people have a choice between a left-wing view of the world and a solution-oriented view of the world. We're not going to beat her just with an anti-Hillary campaign," he said.

Mr. Gingrich likewise fretted that the Republican loyalists might stay away from the polls in November out of disenchantment with Republican leaders in Washington, the St. Petersburg [Fla.] Times reports.

Dayton's jibes

When asked to describe his attitude in his last few months in office, Sen. Mark Dayton cited a line from the 1971 song "Me and Bobby McGee."

"Freedom's just another word for nothing left to lose," he said.

The first-term Minnesota Democrat is not seeking re-election and, these days, sounds very much like a politician with nothing left to lose, the Associated Press reports.

In February, upset about a plan by a South Dakota railroad to run coal trains close to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., Mr. Dayton said the clinic "is worth a hell of a lot more than the whole state of South Dakota."

He later apologized for the remark.

The next month, he called fellow Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold's proposal to censure President Bush over a warrantless surveillance program "an overreaching step by someone who is grandstanding and running for president at the expense of his own party and his own country."

Mr. Dayton did not apologize for that.

He even told a Minnesota high-school group that he'd give himself an "F" if he had to grade his accomplishments in the Senate.

"And I would give the entire Congress, of which I'm a member, an 'F' for results," Mr. Dayton said. He pointed out that he also told the students that he'd give himself an "A-minus" for effort.

Lack of enthusiasm

The race for the Democratic nomination for California governor enters its final stretch this week in a virtual tie, with a large chunk of voters still undecided -- and unimpressed by their two choices in the June 6 primary, the Los Angeles Daily News reports.

In part, analysts said, the two Democratic candidates -- state Treasurer Phil Angelides and state Controller Steve Westly -- have to overcome voter fatigue. With the recall in 2003 and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's special election last year, the state's voters have not had a year off from the barrage of TV ads and campaign rallies since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0030237

"I think there is a lack of enthusiasm for the two candidates," said political analyst Sherry Bebitch Jeffe of the University of Southern California. "I think the whole country is in a very sour mood. People are not happy about the way government is performing at all."

A poll released last week by the Public Policy Institute of California found Mr. Angelides with a slight edge, 35 percent to 32 percent, within the poll's margin of error. That was a big improvement for the treasurer, who was 13 points behind in a Los Angeles Times poll last month.

Not going away

"June 6, 2006, is an important date, not only because it's the 62nd anniversary of D-Day. It's also the day the Senate will vote on the so-called marriage amendment, which would amend the Constitution to restrict marriage in America to a man and a woman," Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard.

"It won't pass. A constitutional amendment requires a two-thirds majority in the Senate and the House. When the Senate voted in 2004, the amendment got only 48 votes. This time, it's likely to get more -- probably between 52 and 58 -- in part because a powerful and unusually ecumenical religious coalition is now backing the amendment. And President Bush, despite his wife Laura's admonition that the marriage issue ought to be kept out of politics, plans to host a pro-amendment event at the White House and speak out in favor of the amendment," Mr. Barnes said.

"Once dismissed as a sop to social conservatives, the proposed amendment has become a serious rallying point for opponents of same-sex marriage. The June 6 vote will put senators on the record and make their position on the amendment a potential campaign issue. And the formation of the religious coalition means the issue won't go away soon."

On the lookout

The group Public Advocate of the United States said yesterday that it had set up sobriety checkpoints on Capitol Hill over the holiday weekend to protect the public against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and his son, Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy, Rhode Island Democrat.

"Citizen volunteers have responded to the call, and we have erected checkpoints at several intersections to prevent any Kennedy from driving in an impaired manner on Capitol Hill. We selected the long Memorial Day weekend due to the increased potential for a repeat of earlier car accidents," said Eugene Delgaudio, president of the group.

Volunteers patrolling in front of the U.S. Capitol and in front of the Supreme Court are attempting to prevent a repeat of Kennedy-related car accidents, the group said. The elder Mr. Kennedy walked away from a 1969 Chappaquiddick Island auto accident after a day of drinking, leaving campaign aide Mary Jo Kopechne to drown in the car. His son earlier this month crashed his car into a concrete barrier on Capitol Hill while, he said, disoriented from prescription drugs.

The checkpoints were mobile units comprising two dozen persons alternating positions around the Capitol. Volunteers wore bright orange or yellow vests and yellow construction hats and carried traffic cones and traffic directional signs (stop, slow down, go) and posters that identified them as the "Kennedy Sobriety Checkpoint" and with a message that states, "If your name is Kennedy, Get Out of the Car."

Roy Moore 'So Help Me God' (WSJ)

By Kyle Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- Most politicians would kill for -- or spend millions of dollars to acquire -- the name recognition Roy Moore has in Alabama. Not necessarily the kind of name recognition, mind you. Just the level.

That's because here, and across the country, he's known not just as Roy Moore, but as "Roy Moore, Ten Commandments Judge" -- the Southern Baptist-cum-chief justice of Alabama who defied a federal court order to remove his 2.5-ton monument to the Commandments from the state courthouse, and lost his job as a result. It's a moniker that wins him automatic support in some quarters, and deafens ears before he even opens his mouth in others. And as he runs for the Republican nomination for governor in his native state, that notoriety is both a blessing and a curse. * * *

Roy Moore makes no apologies. "I'm not trying to dodge or get away from my past," he tells me over lunch at a Montgomery seafood restaurant. "I think what we stand for in this state is exactly what our motto is: 'We dare defend our rights.' And Alabamians have always dared defend our rights, whether it be Martin Luther King, or what I did, or the beginning of the Civil War. We dare defend our rights."

At the same time as he makes this boast, there's no doubting that much of his campaign is devoted to explaining his past and persuading voters to look beyond it. "You've got to understand what the issue was with the Ten Commandments monument," he says. "And that is the message that must be gotten out first, to open the eyes and the ears of the people to understand that I do have more than that. It was more about principle than politics. . . .

"When they don't understand that it wasn't about a monument, or the Ten Commandments, or disobedience of a federal court order, but about obedience to the U.S. Constitution and the acknowledgment of God which cannot be prohibited by any authority, then when you get that message out, you can go to the platform, [and] they start to see that."

Mr. Moore referred to the "acknowledgment of God" so many times during his 2003 battle to keep the monument (and himself) in the courthouse that reporters covering the months-long saga wished they had a keystroke for the phrase. As he tells it, it's his way of describing the many nods to the Almighty made by public officials: the invocation, "God save the United States of America and this honorable court," that opens sessions of the Supreme Court; the phrase, "so help me God," that concludes many an oath of office, from the president on down; the references in the Declaration of Independence to "Nature's God," the "Creator"; the fact that religious freedom is the first right mentioned in the Bill of Rights. And, he argues, it includes postings of the Ten Commandments in courthouses -- from small plaques like the wooden one he carved and hung in his Etowah County courtroom a decade ago, to the washing-machine-sized granite marker he installed in the state courthouse.

"Every function of government is related" to the acknowledgment of God, he says. "For example, an understanding of God leads to an understanding of the fallen nature of man, which leads to the separation of powers, checks and balances. . . . Then you understand why judges can't make law, and legislators can't enforce law, and the executives can't put themselves above the law." * * *

But putting himself above the law is exactly what Mr. Moore was accused of doing. His refusal to remove the tablet from the state courthouse -- a U.S. district judge had ruled that it was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion by government -- drew hundreds of supporters from across the country to camp out on the building's steps for over a week in the dog days of August. They organized food deliveries and threatened to form a blockade if anyone tried to remove the stone. Critics, from the ACLU to atheist groups, also gathered to voice their opposition.

Even for Alabama, which has seen its share of political stagecraft over the years, it was a surreal sight. After all, George C. Wallace's "stand in the schoolhouse door" to protest the integration of the University of Alabama ended with his stepping aside to allow two black students to enroll. Eventually, the state Supreme Court's eight associate justices had "Roy's Rock" rolled away with little incident. Three months later, a special panel of retired judges voted to expel Mr. Moore from office.

So it's no wonder that this yarn is what people remember about Roy Moore, and not his platform, which lists four topics -- Legislative Reform, Education, Taxation and Wasteful Spending, and Illegal Aliens -- ahead of Morality. Money has been a critical issue for Mr. Moore, who has been out-fundraised by his opponent in the June 6 GOP primary, the incumbent Bob Riley, by more than 4-to-1. The Moore campaign ran its first TV commercial in mid-May; Gov. Riley has been ruling the airwaves since January.

"Our problem has been reaching great multitudes of people with the message because of funding," Mr. Moore says. "And the funding has been hampered by the fact that we take no political action committee money, and the reason is because it's the very problem here in Montgomery. . . . In my opinion, [the state government] is controlled by special interests. And when it's controlled by special interests . . . you can't address the problem by taking their money."

It's to address this crucial problem, he says, that he's proposing term limits for legislators and amending the state constitution so that the legislature meets every other year instead of annually -- "Because, by fewer legislative sessions, you don't have as much time for the special interests to control."

In some ways, his platform could belong to just about any small-government conservative. But if you're starting to wonder what all this has to do with God, and whether Mr. Moore has lost support because he's strayed from his religious message, consider how he addresses these topics.

His arguments for limited government portray this political philosophy as the only one for those who believe in God. He quotes Jefferson: "'Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God.' Now that had a meaning back in 1700 which is true today. Tyrants are those who put [themselves] above the law of God and become all-powerful. They control everything -- your life, your liberty, your pursuit of happiness. In this country, those things are given by God and government is there to secure them."

The Constitution, Mr. Moore says, was framed largely to prevent the emergence of such a godless, all-powerful tyrant. "Jefferson said, 'In questions of power let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution.' Which is exactly what the Constitution's about." And as for the budget deficit, Mr. Moore believes that God is on the side of lower taxes and spending: "If you know that government isn't God, then government doesn't need all the money in the world to do everything for everybody, because that's not the role" of government. * * *

Can more than one deity, I ask, be held in official esteem in America? Not if religious tolerance is to be maintained, Mr. Moore argues: "The Judeo-Christian God is the one that gives religious liberty. The Muslim God, Allah, does not give religious liberty. If you want to prove that, go to Saudi Arabia and lift up your Bible on a street corner, and you'll find out what the Muslim God -- they say -- dictates.

"They dictate a form of worship through the government, and that's what their God mandates -- they say. Our God does not mandate that at all. . . . Our God says that that freedom is between you and me, not you and government. That's the big difference. . . . And that's exactly why Muslims and Buddhists and others are free to worship [here] the way they want, not dictated by government."

For a man who might fairly be described as a provincial populist, Mr. Moore has a somewhat unconfined (and, in parts, exotic) past. After graduating from West Point in 1969, then-Lt. Moore served in Kansas, Germany and Vietnam. In the 1980s, he worked for a time as a cowboy on a ranch in the Australian outback. But now, he expresses disdain for much of the world beyond his own -- in particular, for Europe, with its widespread secularism. "When they don't acknowledge there's a God, government is the god and controls everything.

"You don't have to know anything about history," he continues, "to go over to Europe and look at the churches. I mean, they're cold, vacant, locked museums of what used to be." The U.S. had been moving in that direction for some 60 years, he says, but in recent years has started to reverse the slide. "America's churches are alive and growing. But more than the churches, the people are coming back to a knowledge of God -- and a knowledge of what the Constitution is."

Europeans likely wouldn't vote for someone as overtly religious as Mr. Moore to be dog-catcher, much less elect him to a position comparable to a U.S. governor. Yet it's beginning to look like Alabamians' sentiments toward his candidacy aren't much warmer. A May 21 poll by the Mobile Press-Register and the University of South Alabama shows Mr. Moore trailing Gov. Riley by 69% to 20% after leading the incumbent by eight points a year-and-a-half ago. The passage of time hasn't helped. Many an observer reckons that Mr. Moore might have beaten the governor handily had the race been held in 2004, when the erstwhile judge was perhaps at his most popular and Mr. Riley was being browbeaten for a poor economy and his failed proposal to raise taxes by $1.2 billion.

Regardless of how the election turns out, Mr. Moore says he asks supporters to pray only that God's will be done. And he indicates that failing to elect faith-oriented politicians like himself won't be the end of the world for Americans: "It's good to have people in office that do understand these things, no doubt. But I think, whether they're elected or not, it's the people that are going to change it. It's from the bottom-up, not the top-down. If you go from the top-down, you're liable to put your faith in somebody that doesn't deserve it."

Blowing Smoke About Tobacco (WP)

By Philip Alcabes

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030240

"Tobacco: deadly in any form or disguise" is the slogan of the World Health Organization's World No Tobacco Day tomorrow. The claim is false: Tobacco is not deadly; the harm is in the smoke. A policy that confuses innocuous tobacco with harmful smoke is responsible for millions of avoidable deaths each year worldwide.

Cigarette smoke is a deadly delivery device for a benign but habit-forming product: nicotine. Nicotine isn't especially dangerous -- about like caffeine. Good policy toward tobacco use would reduce the grave harm of smoking by replacing cigarettes with non-smoked forms of nicotine for the addicts. They might use nicotine safely forever, if harmless delivery systems were widely available.

Instead, nicotine abstinence is the policymakers' only approach to tobacco. Like other abstinence campaigns (alcohol prohibition, sexual abstinence before marriage, just saying "no" to drugs), this one is both moralistic and ineffective.

The human cost of the nicotine-abstinence policy is doleful. More than 430,000 U.S. deaths each year -- one out of every five -- can be attributed to smoking. This is 10 times our death rate from car crashes, 30 times the rate from AIDS -- an unprecedented toll that is a testament to the inadequacy of 40 years of quit-smoking policy.

The surgeon general reported smoking to be a health hazard back in 1964, but the net effect of smoking-cessation messages since then is that between 4 and 5 percent of smokers quit each year. Of the approximately 14 million Americans who try to quit smoking every year, only 2 million succeed. That failure leaves 45 million to 60 million American smokers, more than one-fifth of American adults. Most of them smoke regularly. Another million or so start smoking each year. In fact, of all the Americans alive today who ever smoked regularly, half are smoking now.

Obviously, nicotine use is a popular and tenacious habit. Equally obviously, tobacco policy is a failure. Surveys show that a majority of current smokers would like good alternatives to smoking as ways of getting nicotine. But we will not tell nicotine users that there are safe ways to continue to use the legal drug they crave. Apparently, our policymakers would rather see those people get sick and die.

Alternative nicotine delivery could be easy. Nicotine replacement therapy could work long-term. Gum and the patch are already available, but not to everyone. Also, they are still approved only for short-term use and can deliver only small doses -- inadequate for heavy users.

Smokeless tobacco would work. It comes in several forms. One is chewing tobacco, made famous by cowboys and ballplayers. But other forms are handier, less messy and far less dangerous than smoking. Yet health officials label smokeless tobacco as "not a safe alternative to smoking," despite much evidence that it is quite safe. Indeed, current policy is so wedded to nicotine abstinence that officials will lie to discourage widespread use of smokeless tobacco as a way of delivering the drug.

As Carl V. Phillips, an epidemiologist at the University of Alberta, has shown, evidence points to a low risk of health hazards stemming from smokeless-tobacco use. That includes virtually no evidence of risk of oral cancer. Phillips's calculations show that total mortality from "smokeless" is about a hundreth of that from smoking.

And then there's what many smokers nowadays really do: Mix periods of abstinence (encouraged by smoke-free workplaces and restaurants) with periods of light smoking. Mixing light or occasional smoking with other nicotine-delivery products might be even safer -- but it can't be studied as a possible alternative because current funding goes only to research on how to quit smoking, not on finding a safe level of smoking.

How shameful that the United States is willing to allow almost a half-million Americans to die each year, and that the World Health Organization is prepared to allow up to 5 million annual deaths worldwide -- all because of a delivery device -- cigarette smoke -- whose hazards are well known and largely avoidable.

Where's the usually progressive public-health establishment on this? We are generally not given to telling people, "Stop doing what you are doing." We prefer health promotion in the form of seat belts, motorcycle helmets, condoms, syringe exchange, ingredient labels, and warning labels, rather than forcing people to quit their habits. But with tobacco we have jettisoned our tolerance and thrown all our support to nicotine abstinence.

We cannot ignore tobacco in its one deadly "disguise": cigarette smoke. Neither should we ignore a deadly nicotine-abstinence crusade disguised as tobacco control.

6 Nations Plan To Sign Off On Iran Package (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 30, 2006

Top U.S., Russian, Chinese and European officials plan to sign off this week on a package of incentives and penalties meant to reward Iran if it gives up uranium enrichment — and punish it if it doesn't, diplomats said Monday.

Agreement by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany could open the way for sanctions if Tehran remains defiant and refuses to abandon technology that can be used to make the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

The meeting of foreign ministers including Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice was set for Thursday in Vienna, said the diplomats, who demanded anonymity for divulging the confidential information.

Tehran appeared unimpressed: One official repeated that Iran is permitted to enrich uranium for peaceful purposes under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Another announced that his country had experimented in technology that can be used to make the hydrogen bomb.

Tehran's main goal was recognition of "the essential right of Iran to have nuclear technology," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said during a visit to Malaysia.

State television quoted nuclear official Sadat Hosseini as saying his country "is competing with the advanced world in the field of producing nuclear energy through fusion."

Fusion is the main principle behind the hydrogen bomb, which can be hundreds of times more powerful than atomic weapons that use fission. In a hydrogen bomb, radiation from a nuclear fission explosion sets off a fusion reaction responsible for a powerful blast and radioactivity.

Peaceful uses of fusion are still at the experimental stage.

The European Union, the United States, Japan, China, Russia and others hope to set up a demonstration power plant in the southern French town of Cadarache around 2040. Officials project that 10 percent to 20 percent of the world's energy could come from fusion by the end of the century.

International concern about Iran's nuclear aims has been focused on fears it could be trying to make a fission-type nuclear weapon by enriching uranium to weapons-grade level. Hosseini's comments were likely add to concern about Tehran's interest in fusion.

But former U.N. nuclear inspector David Albright said the announcement was probably "not very worrisome."

"They like to pretend they are competing but their program is (probably) pretty rudimentary," said Albright, who runs the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security.

"One part of their (nuclear) strategy is to say, 'We have it all, so you can't stop us,'" he said.

Any package foreign ministers approve on Thursday would then be presented to Tehran by France, Britain and Germany — the trio of nations that broke off talks with Iran in August after it resumed activities linked to uranium enrichment.

The Security Council gave Iran until the end of April to suspend all such activities. Instead of complying, Iran announced last month that it had for the first time successfully enriched uranium and was doing research on advanced centrifuges to produce more of the material in less time.

Indirectly linked to any possible deal for Iran would be agreement on a resolution tough enough for Washington but acceptable to Tehran ally Moscow, a dispute that has hobbled action by the Security Council's permanent members for months.

If Iran remains defiant, the proposal — as outlined to AP by diplomats familiar with the text — calls for a resolution imposing sanctions under Chapter VII, Article 41 of the U.N. Charter. But it avoids any reference to Article 42, which is the trigger for possible military action to enforce any such resolution.

The proposal also calls for new consultations among the five permanent Security Council members on any further steps against Iran — a move meant to dispel complaints by the Russians and Chinese that once the screws on Iran are tightened, the council would automatically move toward military involvement.

Among the possible sanctions are a visa ban on government officials, the freezing of assets, blocking financial transactions by government figures and those involved in the country's nuclear program, an arms embargo and a blockade on the shipping of refined oil products to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0030242

If Tehran agrees to suspend enrichment, enter new negotiations on its nuclear program and lift a ban on intrusive inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, rewards would include agreement to "suspend discussion of Iran's file at the Security Council," as well as help in building a peaceful domestic nuclear program that uses an outside supply of enriched uranium.

Iran Set Up For Big Gains In Iraq (AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 30, 2006

With a new Iraqi government in place, Iran is positioning itself to play a major role here at a time when American influence is showing signs of faltering.

That is worrisome to Iraq's Arab neighbors, especially Sunni-dominated countries such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt. But it also raises serious questions for Washington, including the wisdom of withdrawing entirely from Iraq when it has long been considered the eastern defense against Iranian expansion.

Concerns about Iran have simmered since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq removed a Sunni-dominated dictatorship and set the stage for democracy — or, inevitably, Shiite rule in a country where Shiites hold an overwhelming majority.

Those issues have now come to the fore because of Iran's confrontational stance over its nuclear program. In effect, Iran's recent robust behavior in Iraq serves to remind Washington that it has its own cards to play — including influence among Iraqi Shiites — if the Americans threaten Tehran militarily over its plans to enrich uranium.

Iran has wasted little time in moving to shore up ties with the new government that took power last month in Baghdad. Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki flew to Baghdad on Friday, where he was warmly welcomed by Iraq's new leadership, including not only Shiites but also Sunni and Kurdish politicians.

In addition, work has already started on a multimillion-dollar international airport near the Shiite holy city of Najaf, financed mostly by a low-interest loan from Iran. The airport is designed to serve Shiite religious pilgrims visiting Najaf's shrines and provide a major boost to the economy of Iraqi's impoverished Shiite south.

All that is alarming to the Middle East's majority Sunni Arab governments — including Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia — which have long feared Iranian influence among Shiites throughout the Persian Gulf because it could undermine pro-American regimes in the oil-rich region.

Last year, Jordan's King Abdullah II warned that Iran wants to create "a Shiite crescent" that would disrupt the balance of power in the region. The Saudi foreign minister gave similar warnings.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak then outraged Shiites across the region this year when he said that Iraqi Shiites were more loyal to Iran than to their own country.

Arab governments fear a bleak future in which Iraq either descends into civil war or ends up closely allied with Iran.

As long as substantial U.S. forces remain in Iraq, those dark scenarios seem unlikely. But prospects for a long-term U.S. presence here look shaky as American public opposition to the war grows.

If the Americans leave, the Iranians are waiting in the wings.

It is unlikely, however, that Iran would take a high-profile role, given the ambivalent feelings that most Iraqis, even Shiites, hold toward their eastern neighbor after a bitter 1980s war that killed an estimated 2 million people.

Sunni Arabs deeply distrust Iranians and consider Shiite politicians little more than Iranian agents. Rumors circulate widely that Iranian intelligence agents direct death squads in Baghdad.

"Iran wants to shape the situation in its favor, but does not want to be, or be perceived as, heavy-handed about it," said Juan Cole, an expert on Shiite Islam at the University of Michigan.

Instead, the Iranians prefer to work behind the scenes, doling out cash to key Shiite political players — chief among them the biggest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic evolution in Iraq.

Iran's hand also is rumored to be behind Shiite militias in Basra, although little evidence of a direct link has been made public.

DOJ_NMG_0030243

Nevertheless, U.S. officials have long accused the Iranians — though not necessarily the Tehran government_ of smuggling weapons to Shiite militias in Basra and perhaps also selling roadside bomb technology to Sunni militants — charges Iran denies.

If the charges are valid, it may be that Iran wants to keep Iraq bubbling just enough to tie down the Americans and keep them from any military moves against Tehran.

Ironically, both the United States and Iran share an interest in preventing Iraq from disintegrating into full-scale civil war, something that would threaten Shiite political power in Iraq and risk angering Iran's Arab minority.

But the nuclear standoff, as well as a generation of bitterness, has prevented the two countries from working together. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has offered to talk to the Iranians but only about the situation in Iraq.

Mottaki, the Iranian foreign minister, ruled out talks with the Americans, citing unspecified conditions. That suggested the Iranians want to hold out until Washington is ready to put everything — including the nuclear issue — on the table.

Echoes Of Barbary (WSJ)

By Richard Brookhiser

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

One way or another we have been dealing with a hostile Iran for 27 years. In 1979, Iranian mobs, including one Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (now the president), overran our embassy in Tehran and seized our diplomats. In 1980 President Carter sent a military mission to rescue them that crashed and failed at Desert One. The hostages were released on Jan. 20, 1981, the day of Ronald Reagan's first inauguration, which seemed to symbolize a clean slate, but Reagan became involved in secret arms sales to Iran via his National Security Council staffer Col. Oliver North. In the late 1990s, we began to view Iran's nuclear program with alarm. President George W. Bush placed Iran in the Axis of Evil in his 2002 State of the Union address. Now we hope some combination of U.N. and European diplomacy will forestall Iran going nuclear, or at least buy time, while President Ahmadinejad, the former goon now guiding his nation of 68 million, corresponds with the 12th imam, hidden in his well near the city of Qom.

We might take counsel ourselves with our first, second, third and fourth presidents and their own dealings with Islamic rogue nations -- the warlords of 18th- and early 19th-century North Africa: Morocco, Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli, better known as the Barbary States. George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison were men of this world. Unlike the 12th imam, they cannot tell us what God thinks. But their actions offer a primer in dealing with intractable enemies.

The Barbary States were originally parts of the Turkish empire, struggling for control of the Mediterranean with Spain (Cervantes spent five years as a prisoner of war in Algiers). In the late 1600s, however, they became effectively independent and turned to extortion. Barbary ships preyed on merchantmen and defenseless coastal towns. If your country paid the Barbary States a periodic fee, you would be safe from attack. But if no one had paid up front, you might be captured and held for ransom. If no one then paid under compulsion, you spent your life in slavery. A prisoner could free himself by embracing Islam, especially if he were a capable seaman who could join in the raids of his new co-religionists. The Barbary States ran a pious protection racket, a fusion of jihad and the mob.

The infant U.S. had many merchants but no navy to speak of, so found itself obliged to pay. Thomas Jefferson spent considerable time as minister to France in fruitless dickering. "An angel sent on this business," he wrote, ". . . could have done nothing." In 1795, President Washington commissioned Joel Barlow, a poet and diplomat whose efforts in both fields were characterized by high ambition and modest achievement, to negotiate a treaty with Tripoli. Seeking to avoid any pretext for trouble, Barlow's treaty declared that the U.S. bore "no . . . enmity against the laws, religion or tranquility of Musselmens" because it was "not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion." (Secularists today point to the treaty as proof that America is not a Christian nation. They would do better to cite the First Amendment, rather than a payoff to thugs.) Barlow's treaty was ratified unanimously by the Senate and signed by Washington's successor, President Adams, in 1797.

Jefferson followed Adams in the White House in 1801, determined to shrink government spending, including on the Navy, which Adams had increased during a maritime showdown with France. Jefferson's first inaugural promised "peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations," but Tripoli had other ideas. In May 1801 the Bashaw (or pasha) cut down the flag in front of the American consulate, declaring war and demanding a higher tribute. Jefferson sent the excellent little navy which Adams had built to cruise the Barbary coast. The most pacific of the founders resented buying protection. "Nothing will stop the eternal increase from these pirates," he wrote his secretary of state, James Madison, "but the presence of an armed force."

Jefferson's show of force encountered setbacks. The Philadelphia, a 36-gun frigate, ran aground in Tripoli harbor in 1803. Its crew was enslaved, and Lt. Stephen Decatur made a daring raid to burn it. Jefferson's greatest success was a combined land-sea attack on the Bashaw's territory in 1805. The land assault was led by William Eaton, a quarrelsome ex-Army captain, who assembled a force of marines, mercenaries and Muslim allies in Alexandria, Egypt, and marched 500 miles across the desert. Eaton stormed Derna, Tripoli's second largest town, a feat remembered in the Marine Corps Hymn ("to the shores of Tripoli"). The Bashaw, alarmed, negotiated in earnest, agreeing to release his captives for $60,000; we took the deal. Eaton spent an angry, alcoholic old age denouncing what he considered a shameful compromise.

The compromise was ineffective as well as shameful, for in 1812 the Barbary States resumed their predatory ways. This time Algiers was the principle aggressor. James Madison, who was then president, found himself embroiled in war with Great Britain; any thought of dealing with the Barbary States had to be postponed. But in March 1815, four months after peace with Britain was declared, Madison sent a fleet, led by Decatur, now a commodore, to the Mediterranean. Decatur smashed the Algerians and wrung payment from them. Madison hailed "this demonstration of American skill and prowess." Britain, acting on behalf of the European powers, led a punitive expedition of its own in 1816. Barbary piracy was finally stamped out when France conquered Algiers in the 1830s, and a revived Turkish empire reasserted control over Tripoli.

What are the similarities in our situations? Then, as now, too many cooks spoiled the broth. The Barbary States flourished because the major naval powers thought taking action would be too expensive, or were even pleased to see their competitors molested. Today, Iran's nuclear aspirations are suspended in a cat's cradle of diplomacy, Muslim solidarity masking fear, and lucrative arms traffic. We generated our own cross-purposes in our dealings with the Barbary States, even as we do with Iran today: Our founders tried diplomacy, warfare plus diplomacy, and finally warfare, just as we have alternated menaces and blandishments.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seems more devout than his North African soul mates, who warred against infidels when it would raise money, but who made peace when they were paid. Yet the piety differential is perhaps an illusion: The mullahocracy for whom Mr. Ahmadinejad fronts has grown well used to ease and power.

The big difference, of course, is that Iran hopes for something the Barbary States had no concept of: the ultimate weapon, deliverable by missile, or by terrorist. Perhaps Alexander Hamilton, who took no direct role in the Barbary saga, gives the most useful advice: We should "awake from the deceitful dream of a golden age," he wrote in Federalist No. 6, and realize that we "are yet remote from the happy empire of perfect wisdom and perfect reason." It's a tough world, and our problems won't go away by wishing.

Coalition Of The Erring (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

Imagine where British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be if he hadn't joined with President Bush in prosecuting the Iraq war.

It's hard to resist imagining an alternative universe after hearing Bush and Blair offer their apologies last Thursday for difficulties in Iraq that they did not foresee. It was even more heartbreaking to study Blair's Georgetown University speech the next day, which -- in perfect Third Way fashion -- amended Bush's approach to the world with a vigorous internationalism that would appeal to many of the president's critics.

At their joint news conference, Bush shocked most of his listeners by actually apologizing for something. Except for speaking of his regrets over Abu Ghraib, Bush concentrated on mistakes in the way he said things.

"Saying 'Bring it on,' kind of tough talk, you know, that sent the wrong signal to people," Bush said. "I learned some lessons about expressing myself maybe in a little more sophisticated manner -- you know, 'wanted, dead or alive,' that kind of talk. I think in certain parts of the world it was misinterpreted."

It was striking that Bush focused on the sound of his words and the fact that they had not seemed "sophisticated." But as George Orwell argued in "Politics and the English Language," published in 1946, "the slovenliness of our language makes it easier for us to have foolish thoughts."

What was foolish were the thoughts Bush conveyed: that foreign policy was about his toughness and swagger, that the United States could transform the world and count on potential allies to follow along or acquiesce. The melodrama of the great American Western -- "Wanted, Dead or Alive" -- would be a sufficient story line for one of the most complicated foreign enterprises ever pursued by an American government.

It remains maddening to many who admire Blair that he went along with all this. You wish, at least, that the prime minister could have edited Bush's rhetoric. More important, you wish Blair would have pushed Bush much harder to approach the rest of the world in a way that would have left us with a few more friends and allies.

Blair speaks as if he has no doubts. His defense of the policies he and the president pursued in Iraq was so forceful and articulate that Bush, at the end of one of Blair's eloquent mini-speeches at their news conference, commented: "I'm going to say, that was a great answer."

But Blair's Georgetown speech the next day, while defending the Iraq war, was also an implicit critique of Bush's foreign policy. That's true, even taking into account the Sunday Telegraph's report that Blair softened his remarks on climate change, Iran and other issues at the Bush administration's request.

"Interdependence -- the fact of a crisis somewhere becoming a crisis everywhere -- makes a mockery of traditional views of national interest," Blair declared. "You can't have a coherent view of national interest today without a coherent view of the international community. Nations, even ones as large and powerful as the U.S.A., are affected profoundly by world events; and not affected in time or at the margins, but at breakneck speed and fundamentally."

Calling for "a new concord to displace the old contention," Blair urged the world to help Iraq in its struggle for democracy, but also insisted on joint action to reduce global poverty, deal with climate change and respond to the catastrophe in Sudan.

Blair laid out a broad agenda for reforming international institutions, including the United Nations, and creating new ones. In the process, he suggested that Bush had missed a great opportunity to be the Harry Truman whom he praised lavishly in his address to West Point cadets on Saturday. Just as Truman, George Marshall and Dean Acheson built effective organizations that served the world well for decades after World War II, so did the world need to be reorganized in the wake of the Cold War and in the face of globalization. Too bad Blair couldn't get Bush moving on this four years ago.

Invoking a commitment to the common good that many see as naive in the international sphere, Blair insisted that the "national self-interest" could be best achieved through "effective communal action."

Paradoxically, Bush's best ally may have delivered to the president's political opponents the outlines of a coherent approach to the world. To believe in internationalism, international cooperation and global justice is not soft, but essential and practical. Some who would never accept such thoughts from the likes of John Kerry or Al Gore might give them a second look after hearing them from Blair.

Jordan's King Meets With President Bush (AP)

AP, May 30, 2006

Jordan's King Abdullah II met with President Bush on Monday and urged him to pursue Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts, repeating a plea the king made in a recent letter to the White House.

"King Abdullah underlined the importance of moving forward in the pursuit of a two-state solution as outlined in President Bush's vision for peace," the Jordanian Embassy said in a statement Monday night.

The king told Bush the Palestinian people need aid to avert a humanitarian crisis in the Palestinian territories, the embassy statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0030246

Abdullah told Bush that Jordan plans to play a key role in the peace process, the embassy said. Abdullah meets regularly with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and plans to hold a separate meeting in the next few weeks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Abdullah wrote to Bush earlier this month urging him to help restart the Mideast peace process.

The king met with Bush for a private dinner Monday during a brief visit to the United States. In addition to the Mideast peace process, the possibility of additional U.S. aid for Jordan came up during their conversation, the embassy said.

Abdullah "thanked the president for considering additional assistance to Jordan this year, at a time when Jordan's economy is facing many challenges associated with high oil prices," the statement said.

Earlier Monday, Abdullah met with Vice President Dick Cheney in Jackson Hole, Wyo. The king has been on a private visit to the United States since Friday.

Palestinians Report 3 Dead In Gaza Attack (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 29, 2006

An Israeli helicopter fired a missile in northern Gaza early Tuesday, killing three militants and wounding four, Palestinian security and hospital officials said.

The officials said the incident began with a gun battle across the border, and then the helicopter fired the missile.

The Israeli military had no immediate comment.

The area where the clash took place is a frequent flashpoint. Palestinian militants fire rockets and Israel from there, and there are frequent infiltration attempts by unarmed Palestinians seeking work in Israel and armed militants trying to carry out attacks.

In The Village Of Nowhere, A Fate Soon Sealed (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

NUAMAN, West Bank -- For generations, first in caves hollowed from hillsides, then shepherds' tents and simple stone houses, the Shawarwa and Darawi families thrived here amid pine windbreaks, olive orchards and flocks of sheep. On a hill of their own, they worked, married and raised children.

Jamal Darawi was born here in a weathered house in June 1967, the same month Israel triumphed in the Middle East war. In the conflict, Israel's army seized East Jerusalem and the West Bank from Jordan. Soon, the Israeli government drew a larger municipal boundary around Jerusalem, annexing the lands to the Jewish state, including Darawi's home.

But Israel did not take the people of Nuaman. An Israeli military census right after the war registered families here as West Bank residents, even though their village fell inside Jerusalem's new borders. As a result, the Israeli government has never offered them the right to live in the city, apply for Israeli citizenship or vote in Jerusalem, rights given to Palestinians in other annexed neighborhoods.

For many, it was a distant problem, and as the years passed on Nuaman's single street, the residents did little about it. But now their lives in the village are threatened. Israel's separation barrier is rising along the eastern edge of the village, sealing them inside the Jewish state.

In the valley below Darawi's home, backhoes are preparing the way for the tall fence, which traces a chalky stripe across the far hillside. Soon, the 200 people will be cut off from the Palestinian territories where Israel says they live, enclosed within a state where they have no right to be. This is the village of nowhere.

"All of our life has been changed," said Darawi, 38, a farmer, father and political activist. "The purpose of what is being done here now is to empty this place of its people."

This solitary village on a windswept plateau between Bethlehem and Jerusalem captures in microcosm the accelerating dislocation of Palestinian communities along the Israeli separation barrier now dividing the land with chain link and concrete. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert says the 456-mile barrier will roughly define the final eastern border of Israel.

The 1993 Oslo accords began a process of separation between Israel and the Palestinians and established a semiautonomous Palestinian government in the occupied territories. But the Palestinian uprising that began in 2000, including suicide bomb attacks on Israeli civilians, led Israel to build a towering barrier to keep Palestinians out. The course of the wall, drawn by Israel, is now also separating thousands of Palestinians from their property and from each other.

The Israeli government says the barrier -- in some places a 26-foot-high concrete wall -- runs along a course designed to protect Israel from Palestinian attacks, which have dropped dramatically since construction began. Only a quarter of the barrier follows the pre-1967 borders. Along the rest, it cuts into land Palestinians envision as part of their future state, according to the United Nations.

Approximately one-third of the barrier's route has been challenged in court by Palestinians and Israeli civil rights groups on the grounds that it is based more on annexing Palestinian land than safeguarding Israeli citizens.

As it skirts the edge of this village, the nearly complete barrier is a 10-foot-high chain-link fence with electronic sensors and an 82-foot-wide military buffer running along each side. Construction of the fence, along with a new road for Jewish settlers commuting to Jerusalem and a crossing terminal, has consumed acres of valley and hillside once used by families here for agriculture.

In Jerusalem, the barrier has cast a shadow across the daily lives of thousands of Palestinians. Once complete, it will leave roughly 140,000 Palestinians with Jerusalem residency rights on the West Bank side, forcing them to pass through Israeli-controlled checkpoints along the wall to reach jobs, families and classrooms in the city. Another 110,000 will remain on Israel's side of the barrier with equally uncertain access to the West Bank.

Idyllic and isolated by layers of hills, Nuaman is a mix of two dozen aging stone houses and grander homes of a younger generation, clustered along the one-lane road that dips toward the valley below. Tilled plots of vegetables, olive trees and lemon groves line the back yards, and on weekends they fill with parents and children helping with harvests. Stands of cypress surround small graveyards on the hillside above and in the valley below.

This village lies close enough to Jerusalem's Old City that some of its men travel by foot to the al-Aqsa mosque each Friday to pray. On nearby hillsides, topped with minarets and watchtowers, camels graze in the twilight shadows cast by apartment towers in the Jewish settlement of Har Homa. The fence draws tighter each day.

"This village," said Labib Habib, a lawyer representing the residents, "will not survive."'The Original Owners'

In sandals, Darawi negotiated the rocky hillside beneath his house one recent afternoon holding the hand of his 5-year-old daughter, Yara. The slope bloomed with wildflowers and spring wheat under his feet.

The landmarks on the hillside, he said during the walking tour, tell the story of his family's claim to the land.

Darawi is tall and broad, round around the middle with thick hands and a smile that rarely appears unless his three children are nearby. His hair recedes in a black widow's peak, and his bristly mustache is streaked with gray.

In silence, he made his way to an opening in the hillside, ducking into a cavern with rough walls blackened by a thousand cooking fires. The outlines of an animal pen appeared in one corner. Across its length sat the stone oven where his grandmother baked bread as recently as three decades ago.

"We are the original owners of this land," Darawi said, emerging from the cavern and ascending toward a stone house with shuttered windows and grassy tufts sprouting from the roof. A stone above the door, etched with a crescent moon and Arabic script, says the house belongs to Suleiman Darawi, Jamal's grandfather. It was built, according to a date on the stone, in 1963.

Darawi grew up walking to schools in East Jerusalem. He participated in demonstrations protesting Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and marking the anniversary of the 1967 war. He attended university in the territories and in Jordan, receiving his undergraduate degree in 1987. That December, a Palestinian uprising against the Israeli occupation broke out and his plans to work in a medical laboratory suddenly changed. He joined the ranks of the Popular Front for Liberation of Palestine, a radical nationalist movement with a Marxist orientation. At 21, Darawi began his first of four stints in Israeli prisons, held without charge, he said, for participating in the uprising.

After the 1993 accords, he joined the newly established Palestinian Authority, where he now works as a political organizer in Bethlehem, a city that will soon lie on the West Bank side of the fence. Even now, his work is reachable only by passing through an Israeli military checkpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0030248

As he returned home from Bethlehem with his toddler son, Suleiman, and some Palestinian laborers last month, Darawi said, soldiers at the checkpoint ordered them out of his Isuzu Trooper. The soldiers began a search and then told the men to lift their T-shirts, though Darawi refused as his son looked on. The others obeyed.

"I have my dignity," he said. "I have my self-respect and I won't take my clothes off for them."Erased From the Map

Darawi was an infant when Israeli soldiers arrived in the weeks after the war with pens and notepads to carry out a census. The troubles of the village can be traced to that day.

At the time the war broke out, the village was located in Jordan. Some of the village men were working construction in Amman, the capital, and were unable to return for years after Israel occupied the land. According to aerial photographs taken in August 1967 by Israel's mapping agency, 13 houses ran along the ridge. While showing that the houses existed, the photos have not resolved the question of who lived in them at the time.

The soldiers registered the people they found there as residents of Um A-Talla, a West Bank village where the head of their clan lived. Israel then renamed the village Mazmuriya for a Roman archaeological site nearby, erasing Nuaman from the map.

Whether a clerical error or deliberate, the West Bank residency classification deprived the families of the right to live, vote in municipal elections and work in Jerusalem that thousands of other Palestinians in the city's annexed neighborhoods received.

Sabin Hadad, a spokeswoman for Israel's Interior Ministry, said that "either they were not there when the census took place or they did not live there continuously, and therefore did not enjoy the right to obtain an Israeli ID."

"The fact that they now live in Israel does not make them automatic Israeli residents, just as living in the United States does not grant you automatic rights of citizenship or residency," Hadad said.A Settlement Rises

Yusef Darawi's mobile phone rang.

The voice on the other end came in angry shouts -- his boss. Yusef's almond eyes looked into his lap.

"We're under pressure," he said, snapping his phone shut with calloused hands. "We're behind schedule because they won't let us in." He had been denied passage through a checkpoint to work on a construction site.

Yusef was born in the house behind his own 41 years ago, one of 15 children of a father with two wives. Now he was helping build a Jewish settlement planned in the years after Oslo that, according to its development plan, would likely displace his own village one day.

Throughout Israel and the territories, peace seemed a possibility after the Oslo accords. The village of Nuaman had grown to 25 homes by then. Young men like Yusef were starting their own families and building multistory houses next to the squat one-room cottages they were born in.

Then one day, within a year of the Oslo accords, a pair of Israeli building inspectors arrived at the unfinished home of Mahmoud Atiyeh Shawarwa, one of Yusef's many distant cousins. The inspectors ordered the construction, which Shawarwa was doing himself, to stop for lack of building permits granted by the city of Jerusalem.

"We never knew this was part of Jerusalem until they told us that," Yusef recalled. "The inspector who told us was surprised to see we had West Bank identification. We told him everyone here did."

Some residents began appealing to the Interior Ministry for residency rights, though none were successful. All building in the village was frozen. On a hilltop, construction for the Jewish settlement expansion began rising. It is now visible from the window of Yusef's comfortable living room.

Israeli planning maps show that Har Homa's "D" neighborhood is to be built in the years ahead on the hilltop where his home is now. Yusef runs a 30-person construction crew at the site of the settlement, but on this day Israel had closed the territories and kept his men from reaching the job, despite their permits.

"No one wants to work on land that belongs to Arabs," Yusef, a father of six, said with a thin smile. "But you have to feed your family."The Daily Crossing

By 6:30 a.m., clusters of children began gathering outside homes and filing onto the road in the village. Samar and Yara Darawi, Jamal's daughters, were among the bundled crowd.

Students from the village went to school in Jerusalem for years. In 1995, two years after the Oslo accords, the Israelis began turning them away. The students lived inside the city limits, but the Israelis said their parents held West Bank residency documents, based on the census decades earlier, and the children were no longer allowed in Jerusalem schools.

DOJ_NMG_0030249

After Oslo, as the two societies began a complicated separation, Nuaman found itself in a crack between them. Although the village was part of Jerusalem, the Palestinian Authority assumed responsibility for its water, electricity and telephone services. Village residents turned to Bethlehem for medical care, but were forced to navigate new Israeli checkpoints along the one road to the outside world.

In her blue-and-white striped school smock, Samar, along with her sister and cousins, walked pensively across the valley -- out of Jerusalem and into the West Bank. The children cast shifting shadows against the exposed hillside, carved out for the new road. Once the fence is complete, the children of Nuaman will have to pass through a chain-link barrier, manned by Israeli soldiers, to reach their school.

On this day, however, the soldiers were huddled against the chill, inside an armored personnel carrier that sat near the site where the terminal will be built. Coils of concertina wire marked the location.

Only the patter of light footsteps sounded as the children wound their way down the road to the valley floor, Samar's long single braid bouncing against her pink backpack. Two days earlier, the Darawi girls had not gone to school because they were frightened to cross the Israeli checkpoint. Samar, flushed cheeks beneath brown eyes, said Israeli soldiers had searched her backpack and torn up a map of historic Palestine she had inside.

This day the soldiers waved and smiled at the children. As they climbed past a small graveyard, the mood lightened. Samar and her friends began jostling each other along the footpath, laughing and shouting. Yara turned toward kindergarten, housed in the town council building. Samar and the others stopped at a corner grocery to buy grape drinks and lollipops.

"Now there is no fear," Samar said. "We have passed."A Narrowing Existence

The authorities came to Raed Shawarwa's house, a smooth concrete cube behind his father's, while he was on a job hours away. His wife received them nervously on a March day in 2004. The house, they said, would have to be torn down.

"The Jews told us we had no building permits," said Shawarwa, a cousin of Mahmoud and a distant cousin of the Darawis. "But no one here does."

For years, the village had been growing slowly, clandestinely, despite the 1993 Israeli orders to cease construction. Village sons like Yusef Darawi married and brought their brides from surrounding towns, some with Jerusalem residency. Families grew larger. Today, children's tiny purple pants and school smocks dry on lines strung beneath vine-laced trellises outside many of the homes in the warm evening.

The construction to enlarge homes and accommodate the population growth was done without permits, which Arab residents receive from the Jerusalem municipality only with great difficulty. City officials say the decisions are based on planning criteria. But human rights groups counter that denying permits is a way to limit Arab population growth and increase the proportion of the city's Jewish residents.

An Israeli organization that tracks home demolitions reports that the Jerusalem municipality has destroyed 467 homes that it says were built without permits since 2000 -- the year the second Palestinian uprising began.

As the intifada intensified around him, Shawarwa had more immediate concerns -- saving his house, which with his slight savings, he had built himself. He commuted several hours each day to Ramallah, where, as a heavy-machinery operator on a construction crew, he made far more than in Bethlehem. In a good month, he says, he brings home $225.

Shawarwa appeared in court in 2004 in a bid to make his house legal. He was fined the equivalent of $6,000, more than two years' salary, and the house was ordered sealed until permits could be arranged. Raed bricked up his own windows.

"I felt like I was killing myself," Shawarwa said over warm flat bread and tea under an olive tree on his doorstep.

The house is still sealed two years later. When he went to the Jerusalem municipality to arrange for permits, he discovered he lived nowhere.

"The people there told us we didn't belong to Jerusalem but to Bethlehem," said Shawarwa, who is still paying off his fine in monthly increments. "When we went to Bethlehem, they told us we belong to Jerusalem. So we learned that we don't belong to either side."

Last year, a lawyer for Nuaman and the Israeli government reached an agreement that would allow the families to apply for Jerusalem residency without a guarantee of success, a risky proposition given that failure would likely cost them their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0030250

The status of the agreement appears uncertain now, and the villagers have appealed to the Jerusalem municipality for the fence to be rerouted in a way that leaves them in the West Bank.

Life in the village, meanwhile, is narrowing.

At the end of April, Israeli work crews installed a steel gate at one end of the road into the village. A lock and chain appeared on it a week later, the only keys in the hands of border police and the work crews in the valley below. No taxis, buses or private vehicles that do not belong to village residents are allowed in.

The village has been without running water for much of this month, shut off by the construction crews working below. Lowering buckets into makeshift backyard wells, men and women fetch their own water just as their parents and grandparents did on the same hilltop decades ago.Lives Dismantled

Nidal Darawi, a schoolteacher, married in late 2005. The newlyweds added a kitchen to the small house he had built eight years earlier without permits. But the construction job drew the notice of passing border police patrols. The demolition team arrived soon after, on the last day of January.

Using a backhoe, the crew dismantled the house as the family and soldiers looked on. The carefully tended rosebushes rimming the property remain intact, surrounding a heap of rubble and twisted rebar.

"This is a threat to Israel?" asked Yusef Darawi, a brother, looking over the wreckage of the house in the lot behind his own. "This was his blood and the blood of his children -- all of his savings."

British Teachers' Union Votes On Boycott (AP)

By Paisley Dodds

AP, May 29, 2006

Britain's largest college teachers' union voted Monday to consider boycotting Israeli academics over what members termed "apartheid" policies and discrimination against Palestinians.

The 69,000-member National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, or NATFHE, passed the motion at its annual conference in the northern English city of Blackpool.

NATFHE is merging with another teachers' union this week. Trevor Phillips, a spokesman for NATFHE, said Monday's vote would be purely advisory and not set policy for the new, larger union, which will have more than 100,000 members.

Ronnie Fraser, director of the Academic Friends of Israel, said his group would continue fighting the boycott proposal, which he called "racist."

"If the sponsors of this boycotting campaign succeeded in something, it is only to undermine further progress, collaboration and peace in the Middle East and to marginalize the standing of NATFHE," Fraser said.

One part of the motion called on union members to consider whether they should refuse to cooperate with Israeli academics or Israeli research journals that do not "disassociate themselves" from the policies described in the motion.

It said members had a responsibility to ensure "equity and nondiscrimination" in Israeli education institutions and passed with 106 regional delegates in favor, 71 against and 21 abstaining, Phillips said.

Other parts of the boycott motion that passed with a show of hands noted Israel's "apartheid practices" toward Palestinians, including the construction of a wall between Israel and the West Bank, and called for more meetings in secondary schools and universities on the subject.

"This resolution's intent is an aggressive assault on the universal concept of academic freedom," said Prof. Yosi Yeshurun, rector of Israel's Bar-Ilan University and chairman of the country's International Advisory Board for Academic Freedom. "It reflects a lack of knowledge of the structure of the Israeli academia, which consists of all the spectrum of Israeli political views."

The proposal reopened debate sparked last year when Britain's 40,000-member Association of University Teachers voted to boycott Bar-Ilan and Haifa universities for actions that it said undermined Palestinian rights and academic freedom.

That union said it targeted Bar-Ilan for its links to the College of Judea and Samaria in the West Bank settlement of Ariel. It accused Haifa University of threatening to fire an Israeli political science lecturer for supporting a student's research into allegations of killings by Israeli troops.

The universities said many elements of the allegations were false. The boycott was condemned by the Israeli and British governments and overturned after a month.

Some British academics continue to push for ties to be cut. Professor Richard Seaford, a classicist at Exeter University, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that he and other academics were already engaged in an informal boycott, refusing to submit work to Israeli journals or collaborate with Israeli academics.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science had urged NATFHE to withdraw the boycott motion, calling it "antithetical to the positive role of free scientific inquiry in improving the lives of all citizens of the world, and in promoting cooperation among nations, despite political differences."

British Teachers Favor Call To Boycott Israelis (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

LONDON, May 29 — Britain's biggest association of higher education instructors voted Monday to urge its 67,000 members to consider boycotting Israeli academics who had failed to renounce what it called Israel's "apartheid policies."

The resolution by the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education deepened the contest among academics in Britain, the United States and the Middle East that has evoked questions of academic freedom. The debate threatened to further divide British academics into camps — for or against the imposition of penalties on Israeli university teachers cast as complicit in Israeli government actions in the West Bank and Gaza.

At its annual conference in Blackpool, in northern England, the association voted 106 to 71 in favor of the resolution, which called for the organization's members "to consider their own responsibility for ensuring equity and nondiscrimination in contacts with Israeli educational institutions or individuals." There were 21 abstentions, said Trevor Phillips, an association spokesman.

The text of the resolution noted "continuing Israeli apartheid policies, including construction of the exclusion wall and discriminatory educational practices," and it urged the association's members to "consider the appropriateness of a boycott of those that do not publicly dissociate themselves from such policies."

The resolution's thrust is to encourage individual academics in Britain to sever professional contact with their counterparts in Israel.

The resolution was "advisory" rather than mandatory, Mr. Phillips said in a telephone interview. It echoed a call last year by the smaller Association of University Teachers, which first demanded a boycott of two Israeli universities and then withdrew the call under pressure from some of its members.

The unions are set to merge into a single body, the University and College Union, on Thursday, and there has been some discussion of the resolution's status after that date. Some academics said the struggle over the principle of boycotting would carry over to the new organization.

Sue Blackwell, a lecturer in English at Birmingham University and a supporter of last year's boycott move, said: "This is a contentious issue of policy. The new union will have to adopt its own policy."

Emanuele Ottolenghi, who teaches Israeli politics at St. Antony's College at Oxford and opposes the boycott, said, "The view is that this is purely symbolic and will have no consequences" after the creation of the new union.

"But I think it will have consequences, not so much because it will be binding, but because it creates a precedent," he said. "This will bolster the pro-boycott lobby" within the new organization. He said he would ask to be boycotted by other academics who supported the resolution.

"I don't think anyone should be asked to come clean about political views as a precondition" for academic cooperation, he said in a telephone interview.Palestinian supporters of the boycott argue that it should be imposed as part of a broader effort to isolate Israel, modeled on the sanctions used against white-ruled South Africa in the apartheid era.

In a statement after the resolution was approved Monday, the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel said, "Just as in the South African case, a comprehensive regime of sanctions and boycotts remains not only the most politically effective but also the most morally sound strategy in bringing about Israel's compliance with international law and universal principles of human rights."

DOJ_NMG_0030252

Ms. Blackwell is a member of a commission from the smaller Association of University Teachers studying the Israel-Palestine academic issue. It has drawn up proposals for penalties, from "graylisting" of academic institutions — publishing their names as not adhering to adequate standards — to a full boycott.

Such proposals seem likely to recur within the British debate, deepening the divide.

In a separate statement on Monday, the pro-boycott British Committee for the Universities of Palestine called the association's vote "a historic step forward both in expressing our solidarity with our Palestinian academic colleagues, and also in helping persuade our Israeli academic colleagues that it is time to cease silent complicity with the illegal acts of the Israeli state."

But opponents of the boycott insisted such views would be challenged. "I don't think this is going to lead to a split down the middle," said Mr. Ottolenghi at Oxford University. "It's going to be a small minority pursuing the boycott and a large majority finding it distasteful."

Bolton Changes Tune Over UN Relationship (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

After a recent Security Council resolution on Lebanon, John Bolton, the iconoclastic US ambassador to the United Nations, invoked the wisdom of the Rolling Stones to assembled reporters.

"You can't always get what you want," he intoned, "but if you try sometimes, you just might find you get what you need."

It was an interesting statement from the ambassador of a country more often characterised in UN circles as coming late to negotiations and rejecting them if it does not get exactly what it wants.

Senator Paul Sarbanes upbraided this tendency in the Senate foreign relations committee last week. "I'd hate for you to be the coach of an athletic team," he told Mr Bolton. "This role of the constant scold, I'm not sure it's the best way to induce change."

Yet the recent US record at the UN is more complex than that put-down would suggest. For a start, in spite of personal rivalries, significant progress has been made in relations between the transatlantic powers, which appear once more broadly in harmony during UN debates.

But that may no longer be enough for the US to get what it wants. China is exerting growing influence over a range of Security Council debates and tensions with Russia are rising. Both regularly find common cause against Washington, undermining attempts at action by the council.

Meanwhile, in the General Assembly, a bloc of developing countries is growing increasingly vocal about the US vision, with India, Egypt and South Africa, all US allies, among those to the fore of the dissenting chorus.

In the Security Council, the US did manage, after much wrangling, to win a unanimous statement urging Tehran to cease nuclear enrichment. But its subsequent efforts to threaten sanctions quickly ran into Sino-Russian opposition.

US policy at the UN, with French backing, also did much to achieve a withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon. But recent efforts to clamp down on the Lebanese Islamic party Hizbollah and its Iranian backers have been considerably less successful.

And on Sudan, a recent US-European push to punish alleged war criminals overcame Chinese objections but fell short of securing backing to target key regime figures. While a new US-backed resolution should speed up efforts to deploy UN peacekeepers, it is still unclear which countries will offer troops and success is far from assured.

The picture gets worse in the General Assembly, where the US has suffered outright defeats. It was isolated in its opposition to a new Human Rights Council and a coalition of developing countries recently forced through a rejection of American-backed management reforms.

"These countries that are coming into their own are not going to put up with the 1945 order any more," said Mark Malloch Brown, UN deputy secretary-general. "Ultimately, if the US price of paying 22 per cent of the budget is to keep the UN ever more imprisoned in that 1945 arrangement, they are reaching the point where they are as likely as the US to say 'enough's enough'."

This has prompted some searching questions. Is the US failing diplomatically or has its ability to wield influence at the UN been fundamentally diminished? On the other hand, could its recent compromises in the council mark not a decline in influence but emergence of a more mature foreign policy?

DOJ_NMG_0030253

The problem, say analysts, is that it is not always clear what the US objectives actually are. Mr Bolton is often suspected of pursuing a different set of policies to Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, leading to significant confusion among diplomats. Mr Bolton, for his part, claims there is little evidence of a new Russia-China axis and suggests the developing-world attack is part of a cyclical pattern.

By contrast, he says the permanent members of the Security Council are actually working more closely than before and that he has recently taken a more conciliatory approach to the assembly's reform debate, alongside Japanese, Canadian and Australian allies.

Mr Bolton also warns against drawing too many conclusions from events at the UN. "By and large, what happens in the Security Council reflects larger geopolitical realities," he told the Financial Times, "but what happens here in New York doesn't necessarily affect what goes on in the bigger world."

"I don't think that much of what happens here reflects the status of bilateral relationships. Sometimes it's like being in the twilight zone – it's a different environment that operates under practices that are decades old."

Drive To Aid Indonesia (CSM)

By Michael J. Coren And Tom McCawley

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

BANTUL AND YOGYAKARTA, INDONESIA - The rumble of C-130 cargo planes over the ancient Indonesian city of Yogyakarta Monday marked the slow but increasing flow of emergency aid to survivors of Saturday's quake.

The scale of the relief effort needed is still coming into focus. The magnitude 6.3 temblor that rocked the island of Java has left more than 5,000 dead and at least 150,000 people homeless, according to UN and Indonesian official estimates.

Food, medicine, and tents began arriving after the quake-damaged airport reopened to aid flights on Sunday. The International Red Cross, for example, says it has already sent a field hospital and 2,000 tents, with 8,000 more on the way. But as of Monday, most of the aid had yet to be distributed beyond the capital here.

Indonesia's President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, who spent Saturday night sleeping in a tent with quake surivivors, said relief efforts reflected a "lack of coordination."

"There is a lack of clothes, food, of everything. We need help," says Sugiharto, who lives in Bantul, the worst-hit area south of Yogyakarta. Sugiharto's two sons were trapped in the rubble for 30 minutes before he was able to pull them out. Like many of the thousands injured in the quake, one of Sugiharto's sons had two broken legs.

Some 80 percent of the homes in Bantul were destroyed. The Indonesian government estimates as many as 35,000 homes and buildings on the island of Java were reduced to rubble.

In Sugiharto's tiny village, some 25 survivors - ranging in age from 1 to 80 - sat under blue tarps staring out at a relentless rain that has fallen each night since the quake.

The aid that did arrive on Monday inched along rubble-choked roads. Residents, some who said they lost their entire families, gathered into isolated encampments following the temblor. But most stayed put, saying they prefer the familiarity of their devastated villages to low-lying camps scattered nearby.

As with the December 2004 tsunami that devastated villages in Banda Aceh, Indonesia, many of the first groups to provide help to the Java quake survivors were nongovernmental organizations.

Food distribution has fallen to private citizens who have been driving their SUVs into the rice paddy fields handing out eggs, cookies, cooking oil, and rice. One government truck drove by announcing the location of a food pickup point, say residents, but no food was found at the site.

Islamic political groups are stepping in to help, already establishing camps housing as many as 600 people.

Monday, rescue workers and some distraught relatives continued to search collapsed buildings, even as aftershocks continued through the weekend.

In Yogyakarta, boxes stenciled with "Japanese Disaster Response Team" arrived in hotel lobbies and the distinctive white UN vehicles began to ply the roads. Although inadequate for the scale of this disaster, some international and Indonesia aid was already here prior to Saturday's quake to support villagers evacuating from the sides of Mt. Merapi, a nearby volcano threatening to erupt.

For example, Oxfam, with a branch in Yogyakarta, has already distributed 600 tents, 1,600 tarpaulins, and 6,000 hygiene kits. The World Food Program is sending 200 tons of food.

Since Saturday, more than a dozen national governments have pledged assistance. The US has committed $2.5 million in aid and is sending 100 doctors, nurses, and medical technicians from a base in Okinawa, Japan. Britain has pledged $5.6 million to be channeled through UN relief efforts. The European Union pledged $3.8 million, China is sending $2 million, and Japan almost $1 million plus medical teams.

International aid agencies met in Geneva Monday to coordinate relief and brief donor nations on the specific kinds of help needed.

Yet residents in the ruins of some isolated villages said they had not yet seen a government or aid worker.

The Indonesian military sent teams to the province to rescue survivors, residents said, along with about 600 military cadets here clearing debris and starting reconstruction.

The government's attention appears to be focused on overwhelmed hospitals where doctors have been triaging patients crammed into hallways and courtyards. Hundreds of victims are lying on newspapers, plastic tarpaulins, and even banana and palm leaves. Nurses were forced to set up intravenous drips using trees in car parks as props.

Budi Mulyono, a spokesman for the Sardjito Hospital, says they needed more of everything, including doctors, medical supplies, and tents.

At Yogyakarta's Muhammadiyah Hospital, which is filled to seven times its normal capacity, paramedic Gunawan says, "Our doctors and nurses were included among the victims. So you can imagine our situation. This is the best I can do at the moment."

Many had feared devastation and death on the scale that followed the tsunami in in 2004. The quake death toll by Monday night reached 5,140, according to Biwara Yuswantana, a government spokesperson, although it was expected to keep climbing.

The two disasters differed in another way as well, says Gunawan, who worked as a medic in Aceh for five months.

"The difference is the [nature of the injuries suffered by] victims and the lack of dead bodies, says Gunawan. 'In this earthquake, there were bodies, but there were also true emergency patients."

In the coming days, aid workers cite several local conditions that will help their relief effort. Yogyakarta airport is functioning. And unlike Aceh, most roads were undamaged. In fact, much of the area's infrastructure, including communications towers, sewage facilities, and government offices were left largely intact.

By nightfall Monday, thick rains fell on thousands of the displaced, sheltering in tent settlements, parking lots, and rice fields.

"My house was flattened, everything was flattened," says Wati, a grandmother, who, like many Indonesians, only uses one name. She crouched with her two grandchildren in a deserted shop opposite the main buildings of an Islamic university in Yogyakarta that had been tipped sideways by the quake. Then, there's Mt. Merapi

Residents of the rice-growing towns of Bantul and Klaten, the worst hit areas, had been watching the grumbling volcano Mt. Merapi, that has been spewing clouds of ash and gas in recent weeks.

Activity in the volcano has tripled since Saturday's earthquake, with hot clouds spewed out an average of 150 times a day, compared with 50 times before, said Subandriyo, chief of the Merapi volcanology and monitoring office.

"The earthquake has caused instability in the lava dome," Subandriyo told the Associated Press. "There is still a chance that a big eruption might occur."

Chew Soon Hoe, an associate professor of engineering geology at the National University of Singapore, says Merapi's renewed activity and the earthquake are related. Both are in the same subduction zone - the area where one tectonic plate slides under another plate - along a boundary between the Euro-Asia plate and the India-Australia plate, he says.

"This ocean plate ... is the cause of the recent earthquake and volcanic activity in Indonesia," Mr. Chew says. "Because it is very near, the energy released by the quake will accelerate or perturb the activity of the volcano."

DOJ_NMG_0030255

David Booth, a seismologist with the British Geological Survey, disagrees, saying the quake would not necessarily cause the volcano to erupt. He says the plates that shifted to cause the earthquake did not necessarily open cracks in the surface that would be needed to cause a volcanic eruption.

Indonesia, the world's largest archipelago sits atop the Ring of Fire, an arc of volcanoes and fault lines around the Pacific basin. Indonesia has some 129 active volcanoes.

Indonesian Quake Toll Climbs; Aid Arrives (AP)

By Irwan Firdaus

AP, May 29, 2006

Homeless earthquake survivors living in rice fields and makeshift shacks begged for food and water under a blazing sun Monday as Indonesia's death toll rose to over 5,000.

Soldiers began delivering bags of rice to village chiefs in the mountainous quake zone on the island of Java, but survivors called the aid meager and slow. The United Nations planned a global appeal, saying relief money was running low.

"We have 300 families in this village and have only gotten two sacks of rice," said Lastri, 27, holding a 5-month-old. "It's not enough."

Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry raised the death toll to 5,137, saying some 800 bodies that were buried in mass graves immediately after the quake had just been counted.

Thousands of people including children and the elderly lined main roads in the area of Saturday's 6.3-magnitude quake, holding out whatever containers they could find to hold donations to buy rice, oil and candles.

"Please give me something, I'm hungry," 7-year-old Sari told passing drivers, standing beside a group of children carrying banners that read "We have not gotten any aid" and "Help us."

A plane chartered by the U.N. children's agency touched down near the disaster area, and the United States, which pledged $2.5 million, said 100 military doctors and nurses were en route with surgical, dental and other equipment.

But rough roads in mountainous central Java and new cracks in the runway at the region's main airport hampered delivery efforts.

In Jamprip, a village of 300 families, Edi Sutrisno, 37, helped unload aid from a military truck — two bags of rice, nine boxes of dried noodles and two boxes of bottled water.

"It's the first we've gotten since the quake," he said. "Of course it's not enough for all of us, not even for a day."

A group of teenagers raced up to a slowing truck and managed to steal supplies off the back, but their excitement was short-lived.

"I thought it was food, but it was just soap and toothbrushes," said Andi Marwanto, 16.

The government said an estimated 200,000 people were homeless, most living in improvised shacks close to their former homes or in shelters erected in rice fields. Hospitals overflowed with bloodied survivors. Power was still out in much of the quake region, which covers hundreds of square miles.

Compounding the devastation were fears of an eruption of nearby Mount Merapi, which has been belching gas and lava for weeks, and a scientist said its volcanic activity had increased threefold since the quake.

Lava and hot clouds of gas were avalanching 2 1/2 miles down the volcano's slopes Monday, said volcanologist Subandriyo, who like many Indonesians uses only one name.

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono visited refugees Monday and acknowledged a "lack of coordination" in aid distribution. He urged government officials to be "more agile."

"I saw in many areas that there are many things that need to be speeded up," said Yudhoyono, who moved his office to the ancient city of Yogyakarta to supervise relief operations.

A UNICEF plane loaded with water, tents, stoves and cooking sets arrived Monday in Solo, a city about three hours' drive from the hardest-hit district of Bantul.

On Sunday, three U.N. trucks brought high-energy biscuits to survivors and two Singapore military cargo planes arrived with doctors and medical supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0030256

Some 22 countries have contributed or pledged assistance, the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs said in Geneva. The agency said it has released $100,000 in emergency funds to jump start the relief effort, but said it will need much more.

Indonesia said it hoped foreign aid would account for 50 percent of the $108 million to $161 million in estimated rehabilitation costs.

The quake was the fourth destructive temblor to hit Indonesia in the past 17 months, including the one that spawned the Dec. 26, 2004, Indian Ocean tsunami that left at least 216,000 dead or missing.

The country also is battling a bird flu crisis and a spate of terror attacks by al-Qaida-linked Islamic militants.

Indonesia, the world's largest archipelago, is prone to seismic upheaval due to its location on the so-called Pacific "Ring of Fire," an arc of volcanos and fault lines encircling the Pacific Basin. It has 76 volcanos, the largest number of any nation.

Indonesian Hospital Overflows With Victims (LAT)

By Richard C. Paddock

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BANTUL, Indonesia — Panembahan Senopati Hospital was designed for 140 patients. On Monday, it had 1,200.

Even so, the wards were nearly empty. No one wanted to stay inside. Instead, the patients lay in rows in the open-air reception area and in the sprawling hospital's exterior corridors.

These were survivors of Saturday's central Java earthquake, which measured magnitude 6.3 and killed more than 5,100 people as of Monday. Many at the hospital had casts on broken limbs and bandages on cuts, but the psychic wounds they suffered from the quake were far greater.

"The main problem is the patients don't want to go home," said the hospital's director, Dr. Endang Purwati. "They are afraid to go and they don't have houses."

Most of the patients narrowly escaped from their collapsing homes and live in fear of a major aftershock. Refusing to stay in the wards, they were poised to make a break for the parking lot at the first sign of shaking.

They lay on mattresses, thin woven mats or pieces of cardboard. Some were connected to intravenous drips that hung from window frames and exterior air conditioning units.

Even those who were sedated or wearing casts were resting in prime spots only a few steps from the safety of the open air. Never mind that the sturdily built hospital suffered no damage on Saturday.

"If there is another earthquake, we can run faster," said Nada Refty Nurhidayah, 15, who was taking care of her grandmother, Ngatrihardi Suwarno.

Suwarno suffered a compressed vertebra when two banana trees fell on her. Sedated, she lay on a mat on the floor two feet from the main reception counter, surround by hundreds of other patients. Soldiers carried injured people past on cots, and the reception area was filled with the constant buzz of activity.

People came every few minutes to stand only inches from Suwarno's head and use a phone on the counter. Some narrowly missed stepping on her. She was oblivious to it all.

Authorities estimate that the quake left between 100,000 and 200,000 Indonesians homeless. Many are sleeping in rice paddies and soccer fields in shelters made of plastic sheeting that do little to protect them from frequent downpours.

Throughout the quake zone Monday, hundreds of young men and boys stood in the middle of busy streets with cardboard boxes begging for assistance from cars that zipped past. "We need to eat," read the sign on a box held by one boy. "Please help," said another.

In the stricken village of Manding Gandekan, about 50 villagers were taking part in the fund-raising drive. Some had placed chairs and benches in the middle of the street to slow traffic. Sometimes, one of the boys would step in front of a line of cars to stop them in the hope of snagging a donation.

"Nobody's scared because this is what we do to get some food," said Rustam Nurkholis, 18. In three days of begging, he said the group had raised about $18.

DOJ_NMG_0030257

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono acknowledged Monday that assistance had been slow in arriving to the quake zone. "I saw in many areas that there are things that need to be speeded up," he said.

Ibham Samawi, the regent of Bantul, the hardest hit area, said he was sorry the government had not done more to help victims.

"We apologize to Bantul residents for not being able to help optimally for the past two days," he said. "But now we have enough people to work."

Nearly 100 troops from Malaysia joined Indonesian soldiers and volunteers in digging through the rubble for bodies. Authorities said it would be unlikely to find any survivors at this stage, three days after the quake.

Archeologists were still coming to grips with the damage caused to Prambanan, a 9th century Hindu temple complex that is one of Indonesia's most significant historic monuments. The tallest temple is more than 150 feet tall.

Hundreds of chunks of stone were shaken loose from the complex's 16 main temples. Many of them weigh hundreds of pounds each and crashed to the ground around the temples. Some of the intricate stone reliefs were damaged, and one of the temples has begun leaning to one side.

To help treat survivors of the quake, meanwhile, the United States was sending 100 doctors and other medical personnel to Indonesia from facilities in Okinawa, Guam and the Philippines.

Purwati, the director at Panembahan Senopati hospital, welcomed the possibility of assistance. She said the hospital was in need of doctors and nurses, surgical equipment, and needles and thread for sewing up victims' wounds.

She said most of the patients admitted to the hospital were suffering from broken bones and lacerations. She estimated that a third of those were physically healthy enough to leave.

Suprapdi Harjono, 54, was in the hospital for kidney failure when the earthquake struck. Like other patients, he hurried out of the building onto the lawn. The shock of the quake gave him a mild heart attack. On Monday, he sat quietly on a mattress in the outer corridor with other patients.

"We ran when the earthquake happened," he said. "Now I am scared to go back to my room."

Indonesia Pleads For Relief As Quake Aid Slowly Arrives (WT/AP)

By Chris Brummitt, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

BANTUL, Indonesia -- Emergency aid began arriving yesterday in areas devastated by a magnitude 6.3 earthquake in Indonesia, but officials said supplies were not being delivered fast enough to victims who begged for help on roads lined with crumpled buildings.

The government's Social Affairs Ministry raised the official death toll to 5,427. The new number includes bodies buried in mass graves immediately after the quake.

The International Committee of the Red Cross said it had sent a field hospital and distributed about 2,000 tents, with up to 8,000 more on the way.

The United Nations sent three trucks carrying high-energy biscuits and a plane loaded with water, tents, stoves and cooking gear.

Two Singapore military cargo planes arrived at Yogyakarta airport with doctors and medical supplies.

Japan said it would dispatch land, sea and air forces to help with relief efforts.

But officials said supplies remain inadequate.

"We have received food and medicine from the government, but it's not enough," said Suparno, a neighborhood official in the hardest-hit district of Bantul on Java island who goes by one name, like many Indonesians. "How can I distribute [90 pounds] of rice to 1,200 people?"

Indonesia said late Sunday that it would allocate $107 million to help rebuild over the next year.

The United States has allocated $2.5 million in aid, and the U.S. military plans to send 100 doctors, nurses and medical technicians from a base in Okinawa to Indonesia, U.S. Pacific Command spokesman Lt. Col. Bill Bigelow said Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0030258

The U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs has released $100,000 in emergency aid but said it will need to give much more.

U.N. humanitarian chief Jan Egeland has proposed boosting relief efforts with money from the United Nations' $178 million central emergency relief fund.

U.N. officials in Indonesia said the most urgent needs were for generators, tents, three 100-bed field hospitals and medical supplies, mostly for treating broken limbs. Officials said they hoped to meet these requirements within three days.

France said yesterday that it would send medical equipment and personnel. Spain was to send 12 tons of tents, blankets and medicines and other aid, and Germany said aid groups were moving water-purification equipment and a mobile medical clinic to Java.

Britain, the European Union, China and the Japanese Red Cross Society together have given, or pledged to give, more than $14 million.

Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono -- criticized by some as being hesitant to act in the past -- spent the first night after Saturday's quake sleeping in a tent along with survivors and moved his office to the nearby city of Yogyakarta to supervise relief operations.

Quake Survivors Desperate For Aid (WP)

By Irwan Firdaus

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

JAMPRIP, Indonesia, May 30 -- Homeless earthquake survivors living in rice fields and makeshift shacks begged for food and water under a blazing sun Monday as the death toll from Saturday's quake continued to rise.

Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry on Tuesday raised the official death toll to 5,427.

Aid Reaches Indonesian Quake Area, But Volcano's Activity Increases (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, May 29 — Significant amounts of aid began arriving Monday in Bantul, the town south of this city that was hit the hardest by Saturday's earthquake, but a nearby volcano substantially increased its threatening activity.

For the third night in a row, residents in Bantul and in Klaten, another badly ravaged town, slept outside their houses, grouped around campfires and used debris for cover from the sporadic rain. Some softly strummed guitars, while others, kneeling on mats, prayed for help.

Mount Merapi, a towering 9,800-foot volcano north of Yogyakarta, has been close to an eruption for nearly a month, but activity weakened in recent weeks. Volcanologists said Monday that the powerful quake destabilized a fragile dome at the mountain's peak. Collapse of the dome would set off a large eruption of lava, rocks and hot gas, they said.

Large, billowing clouds of gas were vented from the mountain's crater on Monday, drifting more than two miles down its western slope toward the village of Magelang.

Subandriyo, director of the Merapi division of the Volcanology Center here, said the volcano released 150 gaseous clouds on Monday, compared with an average of 50 the week before.

"Residents living in the danger areas on the slopes of the volcano have again begun to evacuate," he said. "The danger is growing as activity increases."

South of Yogyakarta, the death toll from the earthquake on Saturday rose to about 5,000, with more than 15,000 injured and 100,000 displaced, according to government figures released Monday.

Puji Pujiono, the lead officer of the United Nations team in Bantul, said it was receiving no new reports of missing persons, a sign that the number of deaths might not increase much in the coming days.

Emergency teams previously deployed in Yogyakarta for the expected eruption of Mount Merapi have shifted their resources to Bantul, where a command center for the rescue effort has been established. A communications post there is monitoring the volcano's activity and keeping emergency workers informed of developments.

Activity at the command center in Bantul was high Monday afternoon as government, military and international aid workers, forming human chains, unloaded rice, water and other supplies.

The Indonesian Finance Ministry told United Nations officials on Monday evening that it would provide subsistence grants to survivors of the quake. The ministry also said it would provide grants to families, administered by local government, to help rebuild houses. It intends to complete a full action plan for rehabilitation in two weeks.

Despite heavy rain during the last three nights, officials said they did not expect large numbers of deaths from disease or hunger. Many residents are staying near their homes and in their villages, where they have been able to share salvaged food, clothing and shelter.

But villagers who were ill or injured continued arriving at seriously overburdened hospitals on Monday afternoon. Officials said medical workers and hospital supplies were now the most urgent need.

DOJ_NMG_0030260

To partly relieve overcrowding, the Indonesian Red Cross began transferring patients with minor injuries to hospitals in Yogyakarta and to emergency tents in the quake area. The United States military said it would provide 100 doctors, nurses and medical technicians.

A United Nations team from the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs began organizing the arrival of aid groups on Sunday. Daily meetings have been held to share information and coordinate the use of resources.

Electricity in Yogyakarta, a city of half a million, has been fully restored, and the airport, which was damaged during the quake, reopened Monday to emergency and commercial traffic. Aid shipments had been diverted to nearby airports in Solo and Semarang, where the relief groups loaded supplies and personnel onto trucks and vans bound for Bantul.

The convoy of trucks caused heavy traffic along the road to Bantul, further delaying aid. "There is a huge need here," said Mr. Pujiono, the United Nations official. "We are not lacking supplies, but they are being held up by a jammed distribution system."

On Monday, trucks, cars and motorbikes continued to wait in dense traffic on the one-lane road to Bantul, while villagers lined the street holding plastic cups and cardboard boxes begging for food and money.

Emergency shelters were only beginning to go up on Monday. Andi Hanindito, chief of disaster response for the Indonesian Social Welfare Ministry, said the delay was partly because local government workers, who were caught in the quake, were only now returning to work.

Relief groups, many of which were coming from Aceh Province in western Sumatra, where there was widespread destruction from the tsunami at the end of 2004, said their experience there helped them carry out the relief effort in Yogyakarta. Many aid group leaders are already acquainted with the United Nations staff members and government officials responding to the emergency here.

"Everyone is switched on here, and a lot of us know each other," said Rae McGrath, country director for International Medical Corps. "Authorities here have so far been sensible and supportive."

Local government officials have not been attending the daily coordination meetings, and the national government has yet to make a formal request for assistance from the United Nations. But Mr. Pujiono said he had been meeting regularly with local officials and communicating their concerns to other groups.

The Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, temporarily moved his offices to Yogyakarta on Sunday, bringing greater pressure on the provincial government to respond efficiently.

WHO Will Clarify Stages Of Pandemic-Alert System (WSJ)

By Nicholas Zamiska

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The World Health Organization plans to clarify its influenza-pandemic alert system after a cluster of human bird-flu cases in Indonesia, and the WHO's response to it, sent ripples through markets and media around the world last week.

The move highlights the challenges the United Nations health agency faces in keeping the public alert to the possibility of a human pandemic without panicking, or wearying, people.

"What we're going to fundamentally try to do is just to write out the phases and explain things so it's simpler for people to understand," Keiji Fukuda, coordinator of the WHO's global influenza program, said in an interview yesterday. "What's become clear to me over the past several weeks is that there's a lot of confusion."

The WHO has spent more than a year working to raise global awareness about bird flu, in hopes of preventing or limiting any world-wide human outbreak, while stressing that the virus hasn't yet acquired the ability to pass easily among people. But last week, the group found itself striving to tamp down concerns and explain why the Indonesian case cluster didn't necessarily mean the virus was now capable of sparking a human pandemic.

In that unusually large cluster, seven of eight relatives who fell ill died, and at least six of those seven fatalities were bird-flu cases. The Indonesian cluster briefly raised the possibility that the health agency might consider raising the alert level, which can trigger certain public-health responses and to which some companies have keyed employee-evacuation plans. At present, the alert level is at stage three of six, six being the full pandemic alert.

So far, the deadly virus has passed from birds to people in a relatively small number of cases and, even more rarely, may have passed among people. In the Indonesian case cluster, the virus may for the first time have set off a three-person chain of human transmission, from a woman to her nephew and then from the nephew to his father. Such an event might signal an incremental advance in the virus's ability to pass from human to human.

The WHO is still investigating the case. But last week the group decided against convening a global task force of experts to consider raising the alert level, even though the current guidelines outlining a change in the alert stages could, on their face, have fit the Indonesian cluster.

Dr. Fukuda said he doesn't expect any fundamental or wholesale changes to the alert system, which was introduced last year, after being revised from its 1999 form. He said he expects just further explanation and clarification.

The move to revise the system includes the distinction it makes between the virus's ability to pass between humans who have been in very close contact with one another -- caring for a dying family member, for example -- and its ability to pass easily between people who may have only sat next to one another at a restaurant and been exposed to a cough.

Stage three indicates that there have been human infections, "but no human-to-human spread, or at most rare instances of spread to a close contact," according to the WHO's guidelines. Stage four describes a small cluster or clusters "with limited human-to-human transmission, but spread is highly localized, suggesting that the virus is not well adapted to humans."

The difference between stages three and four hinges on how easily the virus can be passed between humans. But that has proved a subjective and difficult call to make.

Venezuela Fetes Bolivia, Cuba Trade (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

LA PAZ, Bolivia -- While Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez was pledging to invest $1.5 billion in Bolivia's newly renationalized gas industry last week, participants at a Venezuelan-financed trade fair here were plugging microcommerce among Venezuela, Bolivia and Cuba as a way of defying the U.S. and promoting regional integration.

The energy investment includes deals to build two gas-processing plants and to explore for natural gas together with Bolivia's resurrected national energy company, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos, or YPFB. The announcement marks Mr. Chavez's most ambitious and expensive attempt to increase his political clout in Latin America.

Mr. Chavez is keeping his eye on Bolivia's gas reserves -- the largest in South America after Venezuela's. The Venezuelan-backed trade fair shows Mr. Chavez is also fighting an ideological war in favor of his Bolivarian Alternative for the Americas, or ALBA, in every arena large or small.

The ALBA, signed by Mr. Chavez, Cuba's Fidel Castro and Bolivia's new president, Evo Morales, is a kind of socialist alternative to a U.S. proposal for hemisphere-wide free-trade zone. The trade fair late last week showed what the ALBA has become so far -- a heavy dose of ideology mixed in with a little business.

"We've come here, in cooperation and solidarity to get close to our brother people the Bolivians, from whom we have been distant," said Ramon Aguirre, a representative of Invepal, a Venezuelan maker of school notebooks, one of some 60 or so Bolivian and Venezuelan companies that set up booths at the fair. Once a private company, Invepal was expropriated by the Venezuelan government after the company went broke in 2004, Mr. Aguirre says. Now the Venezuelan government owns 51% of the company, while the workers who run it own the remaining 49%. Invepal bills itself as the first endogenous Venezuelan paper company -- endogenous being the term Mr. Chavez uses for domestic economic development that largely eschews traditional global trade and business practices.

Essentially, he would have the ALBA countries trade mainly among themselves -- except when it comes to oil and gas, which Venezuela sells on the world market.

Some of the basics of ALBA trade have yet to be worked out. When Bolivian entrepreneurs asked Mr. Aguirre the prices for his Venezuelan-made paper, he said he didn't know yet. "We have nothing concrete on that," he said. In the background of his booth was a poster of Mr. Chavez, his arm draped around Mr. Morales, while in the background a smiling Mr. Castro looked approvingly on both men.

DOJ_NMG_0030262

Elsewhere, Bolivian Indian women in traditional bowler hats met with Cuban trade officials and Venezuelan entrepreneurs, who encouraged them to sell alpaca sweaters and embroidered shawls in Cuba and Venezuela, although neither country is known for cold weather. Other booths offered Bolivian wine, vitamins made from soya, coffee, and quinua, a cereal that has been grown since Incan times in the Bolivian altiplano, but which is practically unknown outside of the country.

It was tough going, acknowledged Rina Zeballos, president of the 1,200-strong Movement of Indian Women of the Kollasuyo, a weavers' cooperative. "We are producing these shawls, but we don't have a market," Ms. Zeballos said. Nevertheless, she was hopeful. She had talked to her Cuban and Venezuelan counterparts who had told her to send a catalog. "Maybe this will be the start of our exporting to other countries," she said. South American nations should pull together with Central American nations and with the 500 Indian tribes in North America to "develop our economies," she said.

In the end, Bolivia's deputy minister of industry and exports, Gustavo Barbery, declared the fair to have been a success, with some $12 million of potential business deals discussed.

Letter On Korean War Massacre Reveals Plan To Shoot Refugees (WP)

Historian Discovers U.S. Envoy's Writings Relating to No Gun Ri

More than a half-century after hostilities ended in Korea, a document from the war's chaotic early days has come to light -- a letter from the U.S. ambassador to Seoul, informing the State Department that U.S. soldiers would shoot refugees approaching their lines.

The letter -- dated the day of the Army's mass killing of South Korean refugees at No Gun Ri in 1950 -- is the strongest indication yet that such a policy existed for all U.S. forces in Korea, and the first evidence that that policy was known to upper ranks of the U.S. government.

"If refugees do appear from north of US lines they will receive warning shots, and if they then persist in advancing they will be shot," wrote Ambassador John J. Muccio, in his message to Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk.

The letter reported on decisions made at a high-level meeting in South Korea on July 25, 1950, the night before the 7th U.S. Cavalry Regiment shot the refugees at No Gun Ri.

Estimates vary on the number of dead at No Gun Ri. U.S. soldiers' estimates ranged from fewer than 100 to "hundreds" dead; Korean survivors say about 400, mostly women and children, were killed at the village 100 miles southeast of Seoul, the South Korean capital. Hundreds more refugees were killed in later, similar episodes, survivors say.

The No Gun Ri killings were documented in a Pulitzer Prize-winning story by the Associated Press in 1999, which prompted a 16-month Pentagon inquiry.

The Pentagon concluded that the No Gun Ri shootings, which lasted three days, were "an unfortunate tragedy" -- "not a deliberate killing." It suggested panicky soldiers, acting without orders, opened fire because they feared that an approaching line of families, baggage and farm animals concealed enemy troops.

But Muccio's letter indicates the actions of the 7th Cavalry were consistent with policy, adopted because of concern that North Koreans would infiltrate via refugee columns. And in subsequent months, U.S. commanders repeatedly ordered refugees shot, documents show.

The Muccio letter, declassified in 1982, is discussed in a new book by American historian Sahr Conway-Lanz, who discovered the document at the National Archives, where the AP also has obtained a copy.

Conway-Lanz, a former Harvard historian and now an archivist of the National Archives' Nixon collection, was awarded the Stuart L. Bernath Award of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations for the article on which the book is based.

"With this additional piece of evidence, the Pentagon report's interpretation [of No Gun Ri] becomes difficult to sustain," Conway-Lanz argues in his book, "Collateral Damage," published this spring by Routledge.

The Army report's own list of sources for the 1999-2001 investigation shows its researchers reviewed the microfilm containing the Muccio letter. But the 300-page report did not mention it.

DOJ_NMG_0030263

Asked about this, Pentagon spokeswoman Betsy Weiner would say only that the Army inspector general's report was "an accurate and objective portrayal of the available facts based on 13 months of work."

Said Louis Caldera, who was Army secretary in 2001 and is now University of New Mexico president, "Millions of pages of files were reviewed, and it is certainly possible they may have simply missed it."

Former Washington Post diplomatic correspondent Don Oberdorfer, a historian of Korea who served on a team of outside experts who reviewed the investigation, said he did not recall seeing the Muccio message. "I don't know why, since the military claimed to have combed all records from any source."

Muccio noted in his 1950 letter that U.S. commanders feared disguised North Korean soldiers were infiltrating American lines via refugee columns.

As a result, those meeting on the night of July 25, 1950 -- top staff officers of the U.S. 8th Army, Muccio's representative Harold J. Noble and South Korean officials -- decided on a policy of air-dropping leaflets telling South Korean civilians not to head south toward U.S. defense lines and of shooting them if they did approach U.S. lines despite warning shots, the ambassador wrote to Rusk.

Rusk, Muccio and Noble, who was embassy first secretary, are all dead. It is not known what action, if any, Rusk and others in Washington may have taken as a result of the letter.

Muccio told Rusk, who was secretary of state during the Vietnam War, that he was writing him "in view of the possibility of repercussions in the United States" from such deadly U.S. tactics.

But the No Gun Ri killings -- as well as others in the ensuing months -- remained hidden from history until the AP report of 1999, in which soldiers who were at No Gun Ri corroborated the Korean survivors' accounts.

Survivors said U.S. soldiers first forced them from nearby villages on July 25, 1950, and then stopped them in front of U.S. lines the next day, when they were attacked without warning by aircraft as hundreds sat atop a railroad embankment. Troops of the 7th Cavalry followed with ground fire as survivors took shelter under a railroad bridge.

The late Army Col. Robert M. Carroll, a lieutenant at No Gun Ri, said in a 1998 interview that he remembered the order radioed across the warfront on the morning of July 26 to stop refugees from crossing battle lines. "What do you do when you're told nobody comes through? . . . We had to shoot them to hold them back."

Other soldier witnesses attested to radioed orders to open fire at No Gun Ri.

Since that episode was confirmed in 1999, South Koreans have lodged complaints with the Seoul government about more than 60 other alleged large-scale killings of refugees by the U.S. military in the 1950-53 war.

The Army report of 2001 acknowledged that investigators learned of other, unspecified civilian killings, but said these would not be investigated.

AP research uncovered at least 19 declassified U.S. military documents showing commanders ordered or authorized such killings in 1950-51.

In a statement issued Monday in Seoul, a No Gun Ri survivors group called that episode "a clear war crime," demanded an apology and compensation from the U.S. government, and said Congress and the United Nations should conduct investigations. The survivors also said they would file a lawsuit against the Pentagon for alleged manipulation of the earlier probe.

Gary Solis, a West Point expert on war crimes, said the policy described by Muccio clearly "deviates from typical wartime procedures. It's an obvious violation of the bedrock core principle of the law of armed conflict -- distinction."

Solis said soldiers always have the right to defend themselves. But "noncombatants are not to be purposely targeted."

But William Eckhardt, lead Army prosecutor in the My Lai atrocities case in Vietnam, sensed "angst, great angst" in the letter because officials worried about what might happen. "If a mob doesn't stop when they're coming at you, you fire over their heads. And if they still don't stop, you fire at them. Standard procedure," he said.

CHEBOKSARY, Russia — Albert Imendayev collected the signatures he needed to run for the legislature last fall in this city on the banks of the Volga River. He met with supporters, prepared his campaign material. He would have made the ballot had it not been for one thing: He was hauled off to a mental asylum.

Only days before he was required to appear at the local election commission to finalize his candidacy, an investigator from the prosecutor's office met Imendayev at the courthouse with three police officers. They kept him locked up until a judge could be found to sign the order committing him for a psychiatric evaluation.

"The hearing took place, and I was taken straight off to the asylum," said the businessman and human rights activist. By the time he was released nine days later, the election filing deadline had passed and he was out of the race.

Imendayev's act of insanity was filing a series of legal complaints against local officials, police, prosecutors and judges, alleging corruption, violation of court procedures and cronyism — charges that are far from rare in today's Russia. The prosecutor, a frequent target of Imendayev's darts, called his behavior "paranoia."

Through much of the Cold War, the Soviet Union waged a chilling psychiatric war against political dissidents. Critics of the communist authorities found themselves locked for months or years behind the barred windows of state asylums, drugged into tranquillity and prevented from talking to lawyers or family.

The end of the Soviet Union saw the adoption of laws that raised legal protections for psychiatric patients to international standards, granting potential mental patients guarantees of legal representation and commitment only on the orders of a court. But Imendayev's trip behind hospital walls last September was, human rights activists say, one of many signs that punitive psychiatry has not disappeared.

"This has only just resurfaced in recent years, and for a time we couldn't even believe it was happening. But now it seems quite clear that such abuses are on the rise, and that this is a trend," said Yury Savenko, president of the Independent Psychiatric Assn., an advocacy group of professional psychiatrists that has pushed for mental health reforms in Russia.

The ranks of the "insane" over the last three years have included women divorcing powerful husbands, people locked in business disputes and citizens, like Imendayev, who have become a nuisance by filing numerous legal challenges against local politicians and judges or lodging appeals against government agencies to uphold their rights.

Unlike during the Soviet era, when an all-powerful KGB locked up those who challenged the foundations of the regime, there appears to be no systematic federal repression of dissidents through the mental health system. Instead, citizens today fall victim to regional authorities in localized disputes, or to private antagonists who have the means, as so many in Russia do, to bribe their way through the courts.

"People are being institutionalized in psychiatric hospitals unlawfully, and on the most diverse grounds," the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights concluded in a 2004 study. "Not only did punitive psychiatry exist during the Soviet period, and not only does it exist today, unfortunately there are no grounds to hope that it will disappear in the foreseeable future."

In another case here in Cheboksary, a four-term opposition deputy in the regional parliament, Igor Molyakov, spent six months in jail on libel charges in 2004. While incarcerated, he was ordered committed for psychiatric hospitalization after a judge agreed with government lawyers that Molyakov's repeated writings about corruption among local authorities reflected an outlook so "somber" that it might constitute a "mental disorder."

In St. Petersburg, Ivan Ivannikov, who lectured for 38 years at the State University of Economics and Finance, found himself wrestled to the ground, handcuffed and dragged to the city psychiatric hospital in December 2003 after a protracted dispute with a well-connected contractor over repairs to his apartment. An influential state psychiatrist signed the recommendation for commitment without ever having met Ivannikov, deciding that his multiple legal complaints against the contractor constituted an "obsession" with "revenge." He was released after 60 days.

In Moscow, Natalya Kuznetsova was fired from her job at the federal audit chamber not long after charging that $140 million had been siphoned out of the federal budget in 2001 and 2002. A subsequent set of quarrels with her supervisors led to her firing, and when she filed suit seeking disability compensation, a state psychologist reported she had a mental disability.

"When they finally fired me on the 25th of January, 2005, they threatened to call a psychiatric ambulance for me," said Kuznetsova, who successfully fought against commitment. "This is all because of flourishing corruption. These corrupt people are using psychiatric persecution to destroy people."

In some cases, people who families and friends insist had no overt signs of mental illness have been committed for more than a year, sometimes drugged with sedatives and tied to their beds when they resisted, and prevented from attending the often-perfunctory court hearings that extended their hospitalization.

In many of these cases, patients were talked into signing consent forms. The rate of involuntary hospitalizations is so suspiciously low in at least 51 facilities across Russia that the Helsinki commission concluded that coerced consent through "persuading" and "falsification of signatures" was widespread.

State and regional mental health officials say improper hospitalizations are rare, and most psychiatrists say they follow the orders of the courts in conducting their reviews.

"Of course I have heard of such cases. The world over, there are dishonest people with bad consciences. But there are also people who are mentally ill but who do not appear so to non-specialists," said Vladimir Rothstein, a professor at a research center affiliated with the Russian Academy of Medical Sciences and head of the advocacy group Public Initiative on Psychiatry.

In 2004, doctors connected to the very institute that perfected the tools under which Soviet-era dissidents were hospitalized from the 1960s through the 1980s sought to roll back some reforms in Russia's landmark 1992 law on mental health. Proponents of mental health reform only narrowly beat back the effort by the doctors from the Serbsky Institute for Social and Forensic Psychiatry.

The proposed amendments included allowing doctors to keep patients under involuntary hospitalization longer without a court order and restricting the ability of patient-rights groups and nongovernment psychiatrists to advocate for clients in court or provide independent expert testimony.

Directors of the Serbsky Institute declined to be interviewed. The head of the state-run Republican Psychiatric Hospital in Cheboksary, however, said patients who accused officials of psychiatric abuse often painted a remarkably different picture than those who dealt with the cases.

"I've been the head doctor here for eight years, and I have not heard of a single case of pressure being put on doctors by law enforcement officials for a diagnosis," Alexander Kozlov said. "I can also assure you with 100% confidence that in this hospital, not a single dissident ever received treatment, and not a single dissident was ever given a diagnosis of schizophrenia or sent for compulsory treatment."

Human rights leaders say the government psychiatric apparatus has updated legal protections for patients but has changed relatively little in its mind-set since the Soviet era.

"It's important to note that the Serbsky Institute, like the majority of penal institutions in our country, was not obliterated after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The sign outside the door was modified. They even expressed some regrets that there had been 'isolated cases' when psychiatry had made some 'wrong decisions.' But ultimately, very little was changed," said Alexander Podrabinek, who wrote a book on psychiatric abuses in the Soviet era.

"Persecution that has to do with the intellect or the mind or one's psychological health is perceived as perhaps worse than physical punishment, or even torture, because it's more frightening to lose your mind than to lose your freedom," he said.

Cheboksary, a city of 420,000 people about 400 miles east of Moscow, is known as Russia's hops-growing center with a long tradition of beer-making. It is the capital of the republic of Chuvashia, governed since 1994 by former Russian Justice Minister Nikolai Fyodorov, who controls all levers of power in the republic, from the press to the police to the courts.

Members of Imendayev's organization, For Human Rights, and other opposition activists have long accused Fyodorov's allies of consolidating money and power through manipulation of elections and the court system. The case that landed Imendayev in the hospital began last year, while he was running for office and also acting as an advocate for a teacher who felt she had been improperly fired.

The case had gone to court, and he thought it was almost won. Then a police officer familiar with the case "came up to us ... and I recorded it on tape," Imendayev said. "The words were very crude. He literally said to her: 'You idiot, what are you trying to do battle with? The system? Everything here is under control. Everything has been bought.' What he meant was that people on the other side had given money to the judge."

Imendayev wrote a complaint to the prosecutor-general of Russia, mentioning the tape. At the end of the next court hearing, he was removed to the Chuvashia Republican Psychiatric Hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0030266

At least three other members of the local branch of For Human Rights have been hospitalized in the last few years, accused of having various forms of schizophrenia, paranoia and other mental disabilities requiring urgent diagnosis or treatment.

Fyodorov's administration dismisses the idea that anyone has been recommended for psychiatric treatment based on politics. "Our judicial branch of power is independent," said Boris Kuzmin, the president's spokesman. "Moreover, our president has a background in law. I think he would not tolerate any sort of violations or pressure on the courts."

Still, Fyodorov's own lawyers moved against Molyakov, the opposition lawmaker arrested on suspicion of libeling the president during his election campaign. In November 2004, they sought to have him hospitalized for psychiatric evaluation.

When federal Judge Oleg Zhukov overturned a lower court's psychiatric referral order, the president's lawyers appealed, arguing that Molyakov's accomplishments as an author and philosophy professor didn't mean he wasn't crazy.

"The court ought to know that even being a personal genius doesn't rule out a mental disorder ... (Van Gogh, F.M. Dostoyevsky, N.V. Gogol, etc.)," the lawyers asserted. "As has been established by scientists, the risk of a mental disease in gifted people ... is seven to eight times higher."

But of all the cases, the story of Sergei Zotov, a convicted extortionist and businessman-turned-political-gadfly, is unparalleled in its alternate melodrama and hilarity, reading more like "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," Russian-style, than the sorry episode in regional politics that it is.

Zotov, 47, got in trouble with the law in the early 1990s, when he flirted with the kind of speculation schemes that widely accompanied the collapse of communism. In 1991, he was brought up on organized-crime charges that originated with an alleged attempt to sell a car at black-market prices (and also involved Zotov's generous use of his skills as a boxer).

He was convicted and sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison, where he spent much of the time reading the law and filing appeals. Once he was released, Zotov turned his newfound legal expertise against the system, filing complaint after complaint demanding criminal prosecution of various alleged incidences of corruption and election fraud within the political establishment in Cheboksary.

Zotov would file challenges to the slightest infraction of court rules — judges who didn't wear their robes on hot days, or a state flag hung in the wrong direction. But he also filed complaints challenging purported misdeeds on the part of local authorities, including the alleged awarding of state property to ministers and judges and evidence that voters were paid and escorted to the polls by pro-government candidates.

"I'm like a bone stuck in their throats," Zotov, a pudgy, balding man who wears rose-colored sunglasses to cover up a bad eye, said cheerfully in a recent interview.

The war was already well underway in November 2002 when he entered a Supreme Court hearing room presided over by then-Chief Justice Pyotr Yurkin. Zotov, who was running for the regional legislature, had accused the judge of improperly taking title to a state-owned apartment, among other malfeasance.

As soon as Zotov stood to raise his endless procedural motions, Yurkin ordered him ejected. What happened next is like a Russian "Rashomon": It depends on who saw it.

What is clear is that a bailiff ended up on the floor and a large table was broken as Zotov was hauled from the courtroom. Zotov insists that the bailiff fell and that the table broke when he tried to hang on to it as he was being dragged away.

Some of the judges present testified that Zotov threw the bailiff over his shoulder, karate-style, and either kicked the table or landed on it hard with his hindquarters.

Yurkin sent Zotov to the Chuvashia Republican Psychiatric Hospital. He remained there and at other facilities for seven months and repeatedly was given psychiatric drugs, despite pleas by his family and colleagues that he was sane and should be released. Hearings to continue his hospitalization were held but neither Zotov nor his lawyers appeared. Doctors said he showed signs of hyperactivity, inflated self-importance and "nonsensical ideas of reform."

"It was awful there," said his wife, Natalya Semyonova. "I would go to the window, and Sergei was gathering information and trying to communicate it to us through the window about people who were being kept there illegally, about people who'd had their apartments taken away. There was one man who'd been there 25 years."

DOJ_NMG_0030267

After his release in April 2004, Zotov tried to run for the local legislature again. When he appeared on television, slamming local authorities, the court ordered him to undergo outpatient psychiatric treatment, a prospect he feared so much he went into hiding.

In February of last year, two dozen police officers and firefighters arrived at Zotov's apartment to take him back to the mental hospital. The order they were executing referred to him as "a person who had committed a socially dangerous act," according to the prosecutor's office. When Semyonova refused to answer the door, two officers scaled a ladder to the family's ninth-floor balcony, all to no avail — Zotov was not at home.

Dmitry Ivanov, deputy spokesman for the police, said law enforcement officers are no longer actively looking for Zotov, but "if he does show up, we will have to react." He denied any campaign against the human rights activist, and hinted that Zotov might have tried to have himself hospitalized to seek shelter from dangerous associates in the criminal underworld.

Prosecutors, in a written response, said Zotov's case "was handled in accordance with all legal procedures." They said psychiatrists at the Serbsky Institute had examined Zotov and his courtroom outburst and concluded that "when he committed his crime, he was unable to acknowledge its actual nature and social danger, he wasn't able to control his actions, and he requires mandatory treatment in an inpatient facility."

The doctors at Chuvashia hospital declined to discuss Zotov's case in detail. But they implied that Zotov's version of events was distorted.

"I think if the opponents of your main character were to turn to you and told you about the ways in which he'd offended or harmed them, you'd feel a sense of sympathy for them as well," said Lyudmila Karnilova, deputy chief psychiatrist.

"As for the idea of a psychiatric hospital hunting someone down and dragging them back here, this is certainly not the case. Our main responsibility is to treat patients who need our help," added Kozlov, the chief doctor.

Zotov, who rarely visits his own apartment, says he fears for his sanity if he has to go back to the hospital.

"People who fight for justice in our republic, it's already a trend that they become subjected to isolation in a psychiatric hospital," said Semyonova, his wife. "This entire case, from the beginning, was based on nothing more than personal antipathy toward my husband."

Bush Betrays Egypt's Democrats. For What? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

CAIRO -- In Washington this month, George Bush met with Gamal Mubarak, heir apparent to the Egyptian throne, and sent regards to Mr. Mubarak's father, President Hosni Mubarak. The House Appropriations Committee turned back an effort by Wisconsin Democrat David Obey to withhold a fraction of Egypt's $1.7 billion annual aid allocation. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned that any cuts would damage a "strategic partnership" that is "a cornerstone of U.S. policy in the Middle East."

Also this month, in Cairo, pro-democracy activists such as 39-year-old Ahmed Salah of the Egyptian Movement for Change and dozens of his colleagues were beaten, arrested and detained -- ostensibly for congregating publicly in groups larger than five. The emergency law through which Mr. Mubarak has ruled for 25 years was extended again. The judiciary -- the only semi-uncorrupted branch of government -- is under political assault. And Ayman Nour, the imprisoned liberal politician who ran second to Mr. Mubarak in last September's rigged presidential election, lost his final appeal against a five-year prison sentence on forgery charges.

Maybe there is no connection between the first and second set of events. Maybe Mr. Mubarak did not need tacit American acquiescence to embark on his latest campaign of repression. Maybe there are plausible reasons for the administration to go soft on the regime for now. But speak to opposition figures here and the sense of American betrayal is palpable.

Few Egyptians have felt this betrayal more keenly than Gameela Ismail, a prominent journalist and Mr. Nour's wife of 17 years. President Bush, she says, "made a very encouraging statement," referring to the line in his 2005 State of the Union address where he called on Egypt, "which showed the way toward peace in the Middle East, [to] show the way toward democracy." Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0030268

Nour, an independent member of parliament, heard from then-U.S. Ambassador David Welch that the administration was, in Ms. Ismail's words, "very interested in political reform in the Middle East and would support calls for democracy."

Mr. Nour was then launching a new political party as well as a newspaper, both called "Ghad" (Tomorrow), which he hoped would appeal to younger voters, political liberals, the middle class, Coptic Christians and moderate Muslims. "It was such a bright, clear, sunny prospect," Ms. Ismail says. "We had all sorts of confidence in the future."

That confidence ended abruptly on Jan. 28, 2005, when Mr. Nour was stripped of his parliamentary immunity and detained for 43 days on forgery charges. The story of his release (under heavy U.S. pressure), his bid for the presidency and his subsequent conviction are matters of public record. Less well known is the ferocity and manic persistence of the regime's effort to discredit Mr. Nour and Ms. Ismail.

"Fourteen security people arrived in our house that morning," Ms. Ismail recalls. "They went through every paper, every book, CDs, videos, our children's belongings. They opened the safe box, went through our checkbooks, sniffed his cigars. . . . I asked them, 'What does this have to do with the charges?' It was clear they were looking for anything at all that might be incriminating."

The harassment, both petty and serious, has never let up. Ms. Ismail says security officers have infiltrated the Ghad, forming a breakaway faction and an alternative newspaper. Ask for a copy at a Cairene newsstand, and you'll be asked whether you want "Security Ghad or Nour's Ghad." Ms. Ismail's TV shows have been canceled, and she is being charged, preposterously, with assaulting a state security officer.

The culprit here, Ms. Ismail insists, isn't simply the regime but Gamal Mubarak, who despite avowals to the contrary is setting himself up as his father's successor. "What provoked Gamal," she explains, "is that he and Nour are the same age, but Nour's been elected to parliament twice, he takes buses, he takes the metro, he knows what's happening with the people. He did not just say, 'Down with Mubarak.' He did more: He offered himself as an alternative."

It's partly for this reason that Ms. Ismail can hardly account for why Mr. Bush would receive Gamal so cordially, even as she says she never once has been personally contacted by Francis Ricciardone, the current U.S. ambassador. "Everyone is asking what Gamal did in Washington: Were we sold out in exchange for something?" She also notes that despite the billions the U.S. provides Egypt, the Mubarak regime continues to stoke anti-American sentiment in its press campaigns against Mr. Nour. "They call my husband, 'Nour, the spy of the U.S.' 'Nour, the friend of Rice.' 'Nour, the child of Madeleine Albright.'"

As for the regime, its game plan is clear: It needs to destroy liberal opponents such as Mr. Nour so that Hosni Mubarak, and eventually his son, can present themselves to the U.S. as the only viable bulwark against the Muslim Brotherhood. Little wonder that, despite being officially banned, a visitor has no trouble finding the Brotherhood's headquarters and interviewing its leadership at locations that are anything but secret. Beneath the surface tension, the regime and the Brotherhood depend on one another to exclude any decent middle way.

Meanwhile, Mr. Nour sits in the hospital ward of Cairo's Tora prison, recovering from a 25-day hunger strike. Ms. Ismail says he's in somewhat better spirits, and there are rumors of a presidential pardon on July 23, a national holiday. Ultimately, however, it's not her husband Ms. Ismail worries most about. "Nour is getting plenty of attention; he knows the law; he has experience; he's paying the price for the course he has chosen. It's the young [activists] I'm worried about. They don't have experience; they don't know the law; nobody knows them. What's happening to them is . . ." She trails off.

Maybe next time, President Bush can give Gamal Mubarak a miss and acquaint himself a little better with "them." As with Republican voters in the U.S., Egypt's democrats are part of his base -- and he's fast losing them, too.

A Plague Of Orphans And Lonely Grandmothers (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

MANZINI, Swaziland

In the early years of AIDS, the virus didn't get attention because the victims were marginalized people: gays, Haitians and hemophiliacs.

DOJ_NMG_0030269

Then when AIDS did threaten mainstream America, it finally evoked empathy and research dollars. But now it has slipped back in our consciousness because once more the primary victims are marginalized people — this time, Africans.

Nearly three million people die from AIDS each year. Among them are half a million children under the age of 15, mostly Africans infected during childbirth.

The numbers are numbing, even paralyzing. So for a window into southern African village life today, meet two of those African kids whose lives are being destroyed by the world's inattention to AIDS: Wandile Shongwe and his sister, Temdoline.

Wandile, an 11-year-old boy speaking shyly in front of his hut in central Swaziland, told me his story. First his mother died, and then last year his father followed, along with his older brother.

So Wandile and Temdoline, who is 9, moved in with their grandmother, but a month ago she died of AIDS. They were shuffled off to their last surviving relative, an aunt, and now she is dying as well, and is too ill to care for them.

"Nobody will take care of them after my death," said the aunt, Buduzile Ngcamphalala.

But in fact, no one is really caring for them now. The aunt was too sick to plant corn in the family plot, so there is no food. She cannot buy clothes, so Temdoline's only dress is a school uniform so tattered that it has no seat and completely shows her underwear.

To preserve even that remnant of a dress, she takes it off when she gets home from school and puts on her only other bit of clothing: a pair of shorts, with no shirt. That would be too scandalous to wear to church, so she does not go.

To live such a childhood means not only unending trauma, but also unrelenting hunger. I asked the children whether they had had breakfast that morning. No. Dinner the night before? No. The only meal they regularly get is lunch at school, provided by the World Food Program's outstanding school-feeding program (www.wfp.org).

"Every day I go to school without breakfast," Temdoline said, "and every day I go to bed without dinner."

The children gather the firewood and water, and they wash their own clothes — as well as caring for their aunt. And soon the two orphans will be left to bury their aunt and then try to survive all alone.

"I feel very painful when she is sick," Wandile said of his aunt. "Because after she dies, no one is going to take care of us." (See video of Wandile, if you dare, in my multimedia report on AIDS at www.nytimes.com/kristof.)

After traveling in southern Africa to report on AIDS, on the 25th anniversary of the detection of the virus, I feel a compulsion to share stories of people like Wandile and Temdoline. They spill out of me.

The life expectancy in Swaziland, which has the highest infection rate in the world, with nearly 40 percent of adults infected, has fallen from 55 to 34. This is a land where parents routinely bury their children, and where mothers constantly learn that they have given their babies a death sentence — the AIDS virus — during childbirth or breastfeeding.

In rural Swaziland, a 74-year-old woman named Maria Shongwe told me that 9 of her 11 children have died, along with many of her grandchildren. (It's not certain that all died of AIDS, because so few people are tested that the cause of death is not always known.) I met her as she returned from preparing the body of a 24-year-old granddaughter for a funeral.

The only comparable apocalypse in historical times was the Black Death 650 years ago. But there is a difference.

In the 14th century, we didn't know how to fight the Plague. Today we know what to do, and we have the tools to overcome AIDS — and yet we still don't use them. A $4 dose of a medicine called nevirapine mostly blocks mother-to-child transmission of H.I.V. during childbirth, and yet because of poverty and governmental incompetence, at last count only 10 percent of pregnant African women with the virus got such a drug.

Maybe that's the saddest thing of all. Twenty-five years after we allowed AIDS to spin out of control because its victims were marginalized people, we're doing the same thing all over again. And so today, as every day, another 7,900 people will die of AIDS.

Still A Genocide (WP)

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

IT'S BEEN MORE than three weeks since a Darfur peace accord was signed, bringing hope for an end to the genocide in Sudan's western territory. Since then the news has been terrible. The two rebel factions that refused to sign the peace deal have continued to snub it. Violence between rebel factions has generated blood-curdling attacks on civilians. Human Rights Watch has reported fresh evidence of atrocities committed by government-backed Janjaweed death squads across the border in Chad.

DOJ_NMG_0030270

The cash-strapped U.N. World Food Program has been forced to reduce the already meager rations it distributes to 6 million Sudanese, including 3 million in Darfur. And Sudan's government has waffled on the crucial question of whether it will allow in an expanded peacekeeping force, without which violence, hunger and mass death are likely to continue.

The only external force at present is a 7,000-strong African Union contingent. It is too small and ill-equipped to cover a territory the size of France, and its mandate allows it to monitor violence but not actually stop it. Gunmen in Darfur have learned that it is toothless. Even the displaced civilians whom the African Union is trying to help have staged violent demonstrations against the force out of frustration with its shortcomings. There is no way that this contingent can oversee the implementation of Darfur's peace treaty, which envisages the complex demobilization of combatants and the eventual repatriation of some 2 million displaced people. Recognizing this, the African Union has agreed to fold its soldiers into a larger U.N. peacekeeping force.

After much prevarication, Sudan's government appeared to agree last Thursday to allow in a team of U.N. military planners. But that concession came just a day after the speaker of Sudan's parliament ruled out a foreign deployment in Darfur, and it was undermined by the foreign minister's simultaneous statement that "any forces, if that is agreed upon, would be a force for supervision and not a force for peace implementation." In a repeat of its tactics toward humanitarian workers, Sudan's regime plainly means to stall peacekeepers for as long as possible -- and never mind that the aid workers and peacekeepers are trying to save the lives of Sudanese civilians.

The U.S. government has described the killing in Darfur as genocide, a term that Sudan's government rejects and that the United Nations and Europeans have also shrunk from using. The more that the conflict in Darfur features infighting between rebel factions rather than just atrocities by the government's militia, the more observers may resist pointing the finger at the government and accusing it of genocide. But the reason that Sudan's government is culpable, today as in the past, is that it is deliberately creating the conditions in which thousands of civilians from rebel-aligned tribes are likely to die. First the government and its militia drove these people from their villages. Then it impeded humanitarian workers so that thousands of them fell prey to disease or starved. Now it is obstructing a serious peacekeeping deployment, with the result that its victims will continue to face shortages of medicines and food.

This may not be genocide by gas chamber or machete. But it is still a calculated policy of targeting ethnic groups and planning, meticulously, to eliminate them.

A Violent Detour In Turkey (NYT)

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, said last week that recent violence in Turkey did not presage a return to the "old days" of coups and military rule. We hope he's right.

In recent years, there has been much debate in Turkey over the conflicts between its secular constitution and many Turks' conservative Muslim impulses. Lately those confrontations have taken some troubling turns.

This month, a gunman shot five judges in a courthouse, killing one and wounding the others. Initial reports indicated that the assailant was enraged about a decision by the judges that strictly upheld Turkey's ban on wearing head scarves in public buildings. The news further polarized the debate over the role of religion in public life, and the judge's funeral turned into a mass demonstration in support of staunch secularism.

The outcry was seen as a setback for Turkey's ruling party, in power since 2002, which supports a greater public role for religious expression.

Since the funeral, however, the motive behind the attack has become increasingly unclear, and sorting out the facts will take time. But the overriding question is: Are the bad old days coming back?

Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, is a conservative Muslim, but he also has overseen the pro-Western reforms that qualified Turkey to open membership talks with the European Union. During the reform process, he stressed that more democracy was the best way to resolve Turkey's polarizing issues. He was right, and now is the time for him to forcefully reassert that view. Washington can help promote Turkish democracy by using its longstanding ties with Turkey's generals to communicate zero tolerance for military meddling.

DOJ_NMG_0030271

Turkey borders Iran, Iraq and Syria, and is an ally of Israel, a member of NATO and a candidate for the European Union. The world can ill afford for it to become less democratic.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says U.S. Must Honor War Dead (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 29, 2006

President Bush, delivering a Memorial Day message surrounded by the graves of thousands of military dead, said Monday that the United States must continue fighting the war on terror in the name of those have already given their life in the cause.

"The best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," Bush said, quoting from a letter that Lt. Mark Dooley wrote to his parents before being killed last September in the Iraqi city of Ramadi.

Noting that some 270 fighting men and women of the nearly 2,500 who have fallen since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, are buried at Arlington National Cemetery, Bush said, "We have seen the costs in the war on terror that we fight today."

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," the president declared, drawing a long standing ovation from the troops, families of the fallen and others gathered at the cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater.

"Here in the presence of veterans they fought with and loved ones whose pictures they carried, the fallen give silent witness to the price of liberty and our nation honors them this day and every day," he said.

The nation can best honor the dead by "defeating the terrorists. ... and by laying the foundation for a generation of peace," Bush said.

The president spoke after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. He ventured across the Potomac River on a sun-splashed Memorial Day just a short time after signing into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals.

At the White House, Bush signed the Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act," passed by Congress largely in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths symbolized God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals.

The new law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. This restriction applies an hour before until an hour after a funeral. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Monday's observance at Arlington National Cemetery was not a funeral, so demonstrators were free to speak their minds at the site. Bush's motorcade passed several on the way in, including a small group that held signs saying, "Thank God for dead soldiers" and "God hates fags."

Approximately 10 people from the Washington, D.C., chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a self-styled grass roots conservative group, stood across the road with signs supporting U.S. troops. A large sign held by several people said, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

The FreeRepublic.com group was trying to counter demonstrations by the Kansas-based group, led by the Rev. Fred Phelps. He previously had organized protests against those who died of AIDS and gay murder victim Matthew Shepard.

In an interview when the House passed the bill that Bush signed Monday, Phelps accused Congress of "blatantly violating" his First Amendment rights. He said that if it became law, he would continue to demonstrate but would abide by the law's restrictions.

Bush signed a second bill Monday that allows combat troops to deposit tax-free pay into individual retirement accounts. Supporters of the legislation argued that rules governing these accounts were punishing soldiers in Afghanistan and Iraq who earn only tax-free combat pay.

Bush Invokes The Fallen, Past And Present (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va., May 29 — President Bush paid homage to fallen members of the nation's military on Monday, using his annual Memorial Day speech at Arlington National Cemetery to draw a link between those who fought in an earlier era and those killed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," Mr. Bush said, a remark that brought more applause than any other in his eight-minute speech. "Our nation is free because of brave Americans like these, who volunteer to confront our adversaries abroad so we do not have to face them here at home."

DOJ_NMG_0030275

Mr. Bush spoke at the cemetery's marble-columned amphitheater after placing a floral wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns, on a hillside overlooking the Potomac. The president vowed to honor those who had died in Iraq and Afghanistan "by completing the mission for which they gave their lives: by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans."

Seeking to draw a connection to wars past, the president quoted from two similar letters written more than half a century apart, the first by Second Lt. Jack Lundberg, who died two weeks after D-Day, the other by First Lt. Mark Dooley, killed by a bomb last September in Ramadi, Iraq. Lieutenant Lundberg wrote his parents to say, "The United States of America is worth the sacrifice."

"That same feeling," Mr. Bush said, "moves those who are now fighting the war on terror."

Though polls suggest the public is uneasy about the war in Iraq, none of that unease was evident in Arlington on Monday. More than 4,500 people gathered in sweltering sun to catch a glimpse of the president, who was introduced by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld as "an historic leader, a selfless leader."

The crowd, waving tiny American flags, was both enthusiastic and somber: aging veterans in Pearl Harbor Survivor caps, grieving mothers with their children's dog tags dangling from their necks, little boys and girls in red T-shirts, a sign of membership in the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors, a group helping youngsters whose parents have died in military service. Afterward, they wandered the grassy knolls and the rows of white headstones.

The president began his day at the White House, where he signed bills to prohibit certain demonstrations at military cemeteries and to help military personnel in combat zones save for their retirement. He was joined at the cemetery by members of his administration and prominent lawmakers, including Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader. Former Senator Bob Dole of Kansas, badly wounded in World War II, was also there.

Of more than 300,000 people buried at Arlington, more than 270 have been killed since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and Mr. Bush singled them out for particular praise. Nearly 2,500 Americans have died in Iraq, according to Pentagon statistics, and more than 18,000 have been wounded there since the invasion in March 2003.

"In this place where valor sleeps, we are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly: because we know the costs of war," Mr. Bush said. "We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

Later, more than 600 members of the military who had served in Iraq or Afghanistan marched in a Memorial Day parade down Constitution Avenue in Washington. This was the first time that personnel returning from either of those two zones had participated in the event, which also featured veterans of other wars, high school bands, representatives of American Legion posts and banners promoting corporate sponsors.

Richard Rodriquez, a 23-year-old Navy petty officer from Union City, N.J., was one of the sailors selected by his commanders to take part. With the Army stretched thin, some of its ranks have been filled out by the Navy, and Petty Officer Rodriquez, who had been serving on a destroyer, left it to be a machine-gunner guarding Army convoys in Iraq.

He said Monday that he had decided to go out of a sense of solidarity with the troops there. "I lost a lot of friends," he said. "I know I could have helped somebody come home."

Bush Gets More Bad News From Iraq (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 29, 2006

Just when President Bush was trying to accentuate the positive in Iraq and declare a new beginning in the war on terror, a rash of bad news comes from multiple fronts in the global struggle.

New details are emerging in the killings of two dozen Iraqi civilians at the hands of Marines. Anti-American protesters are staging riots in Afghanistan after a U.S. military convoy rammed into several civilian cars. And a reported 75 military detainees at Guantanamo Bay are on a hunger strike to protest their continued imprisonment without charges.

Add the trouble to the continuing daily violence in Iraq — at least 40 were killed in a series of bombings Monday, including two from a CBS News crew — and Bush could be in danger of losing even more support for his mission.

Bush has tried to keep the nation behind him with repeated talk about the importance of defeating the terrorists abroad so they cannot attack the United States again. He has expressed confidence that the U.S. will prevail and spread democracy. And he has acknowledged costly mistakes along the way.

In the past week, Bush has spoken about a new chapter in the nation's relationship with Iraq since a new government has taken control. But that hasn't kept the violence and unrest out of the headlines every day, and some in the White House have been arguing that he needs to do more to push back. His public relations blitzes on the war have helped build support in the past, according to public opinion polls taken before and after his campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0030276

At a press conference last week, Bush said the war has featured personal mistakes — specifically his "tough talk" about capturing Osama bin Laden "dead or alive" and challenging U.S. foes to "bring it on." And he said the worst mistake the country has made in Iraq was the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal. "We've been paying for that for a long period of time," Bush said.

He has not yet commented publicly on an incident in Iraq that Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record), a decorated Marine war veteran and prominent critic of Iraq policy, has contended could undermine U.S. efforts there even more than Abu Ghraib did.

Murtha, D-Pa., has spoken critically about reports that Marines killed two dozen unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, last November in Haditha, a city western Iraq that has been plagued by insurgents. The congressman also believes that the deaths were initially covered up by the military.

The killings came after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into homes and shot other people, according to Murtha, who has been briefed by officials.

The Pentagon is investigating the deaths in Haditha, along with the events in Afghanistan that sparked rioting there Monday.

Witnesses said the incident began when a convoy of at least three U.S. Humvees came into the city from the outskirts, then rammed into a rush-hour traffic jam, hitting several civilian cars. There were disputes about the number of deaths, but at least one person died.

The crash sparked a riot by dozens of stone-throwing Afghans who shouted "Down with America." Witnesses said U.S. forces then fired on the crowd, and the violence escalated.

Hundreds of Afghan army troops and NATO peacekeepers in tanks were deployed around the city, as chanting protesters marched on the presidential palace and rioters smashed police guard boxes, set fire to police cars and ransacked buildings.

The military also is dealing with defiant prisoners at Guantanamo Bay who are trying to draw attention to the fact that some have been held for up to 4 1/2 years without charges and with little contact with the outside world.

The U.S. military holds about 460 men at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. Human rights groups say many innocent people have been swept up in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and sent to the prison at the Cuban base in Guantanamo Bay, with no end in sight to their incarceration. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

Their military trials, the first held by the United States since the World War II era, are set to begin within months. The Supreme Court, however, is expected to rule in June on whether Bush overstepped his authority by ordering war-crimes trials for some of those held at Guantanamo Bay.

Bush, Rumsfeld Honor Dead At Arlington Cemetery (WP)

By William Wan

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

With their hands over their hearts, in salute and waving flags, thousands gathered at Arlington National Cemetery yesterday to remember those who had died for their country.

Under a sweltering sun, they watched as prayers were said, speeches were given and a wreath was laid at the Tomb of the Unknowns. For some, it was a well-timed tourist destination; for others, an annual pilgrimage through the rows of alabaster-white markers toward the cemetery's amphitheater.

There, shortly before noon, President Bush and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld spoke to the standing-room-only crowd. Rumsfeld urged audience members to renew their resolve against U.S. enemies and to count the country's many soldiers as blessings.

Following him, Bush said: "We are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly, because we know the costs of war. We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

Standing in the shade outside the amphitheater, Diane Cameron, 59, said it was her 15th year to make the journey from Texas. She has sat through similar speeches by Ronald Reagan, Bush's father and Bill Clinton.

"You don't come here for the politicians," she explained. "The politicians are the ones who get us into war. Our military gets us out."

After the ceremony, she planned to visit the grave of her brother, a Navy pilot whose jet had been shot down over Vietnam in the 1960s.

"This is the right way to celebrate Memorial Day," she said. "It's something I can only do here in Arlington."

DOJ_NMG_0030277

A few paces away, Air Force Maj. Robert Grazulis, dressed in civilian shorts, took in the spectacle with his 6-year-old son, John, at his side. It was John's first visit to Arlington, and Grazulis, who works at the Pentagon, said he had brought him hoping to teach him about the duty and sacrifice required in a soldier's life.

"He's still young, so I don't know if he completely understands it all: life and death, honor and duty," Grazulis said. "He knows the white stones are for soldiers who aren't alive anymore."

They would take pictures, he said, so that on future Memorial Days they could look back and remember.

Bush Vows To Win War For Fallen (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

President Bush stood among the graves of nearly 300,000 veterans at Arlington National Cemetery yesterday and said that the United States must continue fighting the war on terror in the name of those who have already given their lives in the cause.

"The best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," the president said in a Memorial Day speech, quoting from a letter that Army 1st Lt. Mark Dooley wrote to his parents shortly before he was killed in September in the Iraqi city of Ramadi.

Mr. Bush noted that some 270 of the nearly 2,500 service members who have fallen since the September 11 terror attacks are buried at the nation's most famous military cemetery, which he called several times a "place where valor sleeps."

"On this Memorial Day, we look out on quiet hills and rows of white headstones -- and we know that we are in the presence of greatness. Here, in the presence of veterans they fought with and loved ones whose pictures they carried, the fallen give silent witness to the price of our liberty -- and our nation honors them, this day and every day," Mr. Bush said.

While he said that America has "always gone to war reluctantly," he added that the costs of the war against terror begun after the September 11, 2001, attacks are clear today.

"Our nation is free because of brave Americans like these, who volunteer to confront our adversaries abroad so we do not have to face them here at home. Our nation mourns the loss of our men and women in uniform; we will honor them by completing the mission for which they gave their lives -- by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans," he said to applause from troops, families of the fallen and others gathered at the cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater.

The president also referred to soldiers from wars past and those still missing from the Vietnam War. "With us here are veterans who fought alongside them -- and who have come today to pay their respects. They are joined by veterans of World War II, Korea, Vietnam and other conflicts across the globe, whose friends and comrades also lie in this sacred ground. As we pray for their fallen friends, we also remember those who went to war and are still missing, and we are determined to account for them all," he said.

Mr. Bush remembered 2nd Lt. Jack Lundberg, killed two weeks after D-Day in World War II. "He wrote his Mom and Dad a letter to be opened in the event he did not come home. He wrote, 'I am sorry to add to your grief ... but we of the United States have something to fight for -- never more fully have I realized that. The United States of America is worth the sacrifice.' "

The president spoke after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. In his speech, he said: "The names of those buried there are known only to God, yet their souls have entered into the spirit of America, and they will never be forgotten by our nation."

Mr. Bush visited the cemetery shortly after signing into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals.

At the White House, Mr. Bush signed the "Respect for America's Fallen Heroes Act," passed by Congress largely in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths symbolized God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals.

The new law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. This restriction applies an hour before a funeral until an hour afterward. Those violating the act would face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Yesterday's observance at Arlington National Cemetery was not a funeral, so protesters were free to demonstrate. Mr. Bush's motorcade passed several on the way in, including a small group that held signs saying, "Thank God for dead soldiers."

About a dozen people from the Washington chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a grass-roots conservative group, stood across the road with signs supporting U.S. troops. A large sign held by several people said, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

Some 296,000 military members are buried at Arlington, most from the two World Wars and the Vietnam and Korean wars.

Tribute Paid To Fallen Soldiers In USA And Abroad (USAT)

USA Today, May 30, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. — President Bush honored Americans killed in action Monday by vowing to complete "the mission for which they gave their lives — by defeating the terrorists."

Marking Memorial Day at Arlington National Cemetery for the fifth time during his presidency, Bush noted that 270 of the 296,000 men and women buried there died in the "war on terror" that followed the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

He singled out two of them: 1st Lt. Mark Dooley, killed in Iraq in September, who wrote his parents that "the best way to pay respect is to value why a sacrifice was made," and Lt. Col. Joseph Fenty Jr., killed in Afghanistan this month, one of whose comrades said they "were all in awe of him."

"I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," Bush said, to sustained applause.

"We will honor them by completing the mission for which they gave their lives — by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty, and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans," he said.

Across the country and overseas, Americans honored their war dead in a variety of ways:

·In New York City, the chairman of the city's top military museum apologized to the nation's servicemembers and veterans for what he said was the lost meaning of the once-solemn holiday.

"We Americans have become less concerned about those who died for us than we are about the menu being planned for the family picnic," Arnold Fisher said on the flight deck of the USS Intrepid Sea, Air & Space Museum. "I apologize to you for carrying the burden of this nation's commitment to freedom and liberty alone."

·In Topeka, Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said her generation learned a lesson from the Vietnam War: Even if Americans question or oppose a war, they must stand behind the troops who fight it. "The most important lesson from the era I grew up in is to remember that, as we debate the causes and outcomes of armed conflicts, we must remain united in our resolve to support and honor our troops and their families," Sebelius said.

·In Europe, members of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee laid wreaths near the graves of thousands of servicemembers killed in World War I and World War II, including many who died storming the beaches of Normandy on D-Day in June 1944. Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, the panel's chairman, said the delegation was the first to survey the condition of American cemeteries in France, Belgium, the Netherlands and North Africa.

Bush spoke at the Arlington cemetery's 5,000-seat white marble amphitheater, its first rows filled with family members of servicemembers killed in Iraq. Before his eight-minute speech, the president laid a wreath of red and white carnations and blue irises at the Tomb of the Unknowns.

Earlier, he signed into law a bill that restricts protests at military funerals. It was passed by Congress in response to the activities of a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming the deaths are evidence of God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuality.

The law bars protests within 300 feet of the entrance of a national cemetery and within 150 feet of a road into the cemetery. Violators face up to a $100,000 fine and a year in prison.

Monday's observance was not a funeral, so demonstrators were free to speak their minds. Several did, including a handful from Westboro Baptist Church of Topeka, the target of the new law. They sang, "God hates America" to the tune of God Bless America and held signs reading "You're going to hell" and "Bush killed them."

About 10 people from the Washington, D.C., chapter of FreeRepublic.com, a grass-roots conservative group, responded with their own signs at the cemetery entrance supporting U.S. troops. One sign read, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes."

Bush Aligns Nation's Past And Present Wars (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel
The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Invoking the memory of more than 270 service members buried at Arlington National Cemetery who have died in combat since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, President Bush vowed Monday to honor them by "completing the mission for which they gave their lives."

Speaking at Arlington after laying a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns as part of annual Memorial Day remembrances, Bush drew parallels between the forces felled in Iraq and Afghanistan and their predecessors who were killed in Korea, Vietnam and the two world wars, saying they all died fighting enemies abroad so the United States would not have to face them at home.

"In this place where valor sleeps, we are reminded why America has always gone to war reluctantly, because we know the costs of war," Bush said. "We have seen those costs in the war on terror we fight today."

DOJ_NMG_0030279

Bush added that even as Americans mourned the deaths of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, the United States would continue the fight, saying the country could best honor those killed "by defeating the terrorists, by advancing the cause of liberty, and by laying the foundation of peace for a generation of young Americans."

As of Monday, 2,466 U.S. soldiers have died in Iraq and 292 in Afghanistan, according to Defense Department figures.

Speaking on a hot, cloudless day, Bush was greeted warmly by friends and relatives of fallen soldiers and by the veterans in attendance. The loudest applause came when he told the story of Army Lt. Col. Joseph J. Fenty Jr., who was buried at Arlington last week after being killed in a helicopter crash in Afghanistan before ever meeting his newborn daughter.

One of Fenty's soldiers described his unit as being in awe of its leader, said Bush, adding he shared that feeling. "I am in awe of the men and women who sacrifice for the freedom of the United States of America," the president said to loud cheers.

Bush's remarks came on the same day that car bombs in Iraq killed at least 33 people, including one American soldier and two CBS journalists embedded with the U.S. military. The president's comments were preceded by short addresses from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, both of whom thanked the soldiers who had died and offered strong endorsements of Bush's stewardship.

Pace said Bush and Rumsfeld were providing soldiers "the very finest" leadership, and Rumsfeld called Bush "a historic leader, a selfless leader."

Rumsfeld also indirectly addressed public criticism of the war in Iraq, arguing that although naysayers had existed during most American wars, the U.S. military had always done its duty professionally and with honor.

"In whatever era they lived, it was said by some that America was a fading nation; in whatever era they fought, it was said by some that their fighting was not worth the cost," Rumsfeld said of the generations of soldiers buried at Arlington. "Yet every time, in every era, these citizen-soldiers answered those who doubted our country's cause with grit and gallantry."

The strong backing of Bush comes as his handling of the war in Iraq has increasingly been questioned by the American public. In an ABC News/Washington Post poll released this month, 66% of those surveyed said they disapproved of his handling of the war, the highest percentage to date.

Bush also used Memorial Day to sign two pieces of legislation aimed at helping military personnel and their families. One bill revises the Internal Revenue Service code to allow service members to deposit tax-free combat pay into individual retirement accounts, and the other bans some demonstrations at government-run cemeteries.

The ban was passed by Congress last week in response to a Topeka, Kan., church group that has been demonstrating near funerals of soldiers killed in Iraq, holding placards claiming that God was punishing the U.S. for its tolerance of homosexuals. Ban violators face up to a $100,000 fine and up to a year in prison.

Memorial Day Demonstrators Face Off (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, May 29, 2006

As throngs came to the hallowed grounds of Arlington National Cemetery to honor the fallen on Memorial Day, a handful of protesters from an anti-gay group stood across a four-lane highway from a conservative group supporting the troops.

The two groups, separated by a line of police cars, were faced off about 300 feet from the entrance to the cemetery. They held signs making competing arguments. But because of noise from approaching motorcycles and cars, they could not hear one another.

A small group of members of the Westboro Baptist Church of Topeka, Kan., who have been demonstrating around the country at military funerals, sang "God hates America" to the tune of "God Bless America" and held signs that read "God is America's terror", "Thank God for dead soldiers", "You're going to hell", and "Bush killed them."

Across the street, a handful of people from the conservative group known as FreeRepublic.com held a large sign saying, "God bless our troops, defenders of freedom, American heroes." Other signs said, "God does love our defenders of freedom" and "This Memorial Day, thank a soldier for your freedom."

As people walked to the cemetery past the Westboro church group, many looked at them and scowled and several shouted insults.

A Marine lance corporal in uniform, passing by on the sidewalk, suddenly lunged toward one of the church protesters. A policeman put his arm around the Marine and led him away before there was any physical contact.

"Shut your mouth," one woman yelled at them, and a man passing by said, "Read your Bible." A spokesman for FreeRepublic.com, Kristinn Taylor, said his group showed up to demonstrate because they knew the church group was coming. He said they have staged counter demonstrations on several occasions when Westboro protesters disrupted military funerals.

"They're out of line," Taylor said. "Their hateful message isn't welcome here. Many of us have loved ones buried here."

DOJ_NMG_0030280

"We wanted to send a positive message of support for troops serving now and their families and those who made the ultimate sacrifice," he said.

Margie Phelps, spokeswoman for the Westboro church group, said the group was protesting because "Congress doesn't have the power and can't pass enough laws to stop the wrath of God" against homosexuals.

"America is doomed because she has institutionalized sin and exalted homosexuality," she said.

Many people in cars and on motorcycles honked and gave friendly waves to the FreeRepublic group as they drove by.

A passerby got close to one of the protesters and yelled, "Thank God for America." A policeman stepped between them and the incident ended.

NSA Cases May Hinge On Issue Of Standing (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, May 30, 2006

Carolyn Jewel says the federal government's warrantless wiretapping program is giving her writer's block.

"I have recently begun to write in a new genre (action and futuristic romance)," the Petaluma, Calif., database-administrator-cum-novelist -- and named plaintiff in a class action against AT&T for cooperating with secret government eavesdropping -- wrote in court papers earlier this year.

"I feel that certain plots or subplots that would otherwise be of significant interest to me may be unwise since they would require research into weapons, arms and military and paramilitary operations. As a result, I do not plan to use my Worldnet service to do this research," continued Jewel, the only AT&T named plaintiff to specifically state how she was affected by the wiretaps.

"I suppose that's a claim," said Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law. "It's not as strong as saying they were definitely wiretapped."

A lawyer for the plaintiffs said Jewel and other AT&T customers suffered real harm.

"She actually chose not to pursue certain areas of writing," said Lee Tien, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

Lawyers for AT&T and the government are trying to convince U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker that chilling effects on customers -- such as Jewel's reticence to research upcoming books (one of which, "Rake," promises: "Romantic sensualist meets widowed novelist. Hot. Hot. Hot. Proposal is done and with my agent," according to her Web site, carolynjewel.com) -- don't amount to enough harm to give them standing.

While Walker mulls over the standing question, a similar case in Oregon federal court probably won't have that problem.

The suit, which has received less recent publicity than the AT&T class action, has a more direct complaint -- and fewer standing issues.

In late February, the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation says it was directly harmed through illegal wiretaps -- and it has proof, according to court filings.

"This case is unique among the various pending lawsuits challenging the president's warrantless electronic surveillance program in that only these plaintiffs possess incontrovertible proof -- the document filed under seal -- that they were victims of the president's program, and thus have standing to sue," wrote Thomas Nelson, a lawyer for Al-Haramain, in papers filed Monday.

Jon Eisenberg, an Oakland, Calif., lawyer and Nelson's co-counsel, said he was "immediately excited to see this case because there's standing." Eisenberg said he expects core issues in the case to be litigated faster than in the AT&T suit.

"They have a standing issue to overcome that we don't have," he said. "They're seeking to say the administration violated the law without having a specific instance of violation, which spills over into policy. That's problematic."

Tien said he expects Walker to rule that the class plaintiff have standing nonetheless. But in the meantime, he and the Oregon lawyers are facing a similar set of problems posed by government lawyers.

In both cases, the government has insisted that documents at the core of the case, as well as government pleadings, should remain confidential. Anthony Coppolino, the lead Department of Justice attorney in both cases, could not be reached by press time.

In the AT&T suit, the key evidence is documents provided by a former AT&T engineer that, plaintiffs lawyers say, show communications were routed through government computers. The documents are filed under seal, and Walker has agreed to keep them in a secure case as the litigation continues.

The most important piece of evidence in the Oregon suit is a secret document accidentally disclosed by the FBI in 2004 through discovery in another lawsuit. It's currently being held in a secure location in Seattle, despite efforts by the federal government to take it back.

DOJ_NMG_0030281

The judges in both suits are now trying to decide whether that information should remain secret -- and whether to consider government motions kept concealed from plaintiffs lawyers. The secret papers, government lawyers said, argue that the suits should be thrown out because they jeopardize state secrets.

In a hearing in the AT&T suit last week, Walker seemed disturbed by the notion that plaintiffs would be unable to see their opponents' arguments, and asked for briefing on the issue. Similar briefs have been submitted in the Oregon case, too.

In both suits, defense lawyers say the Justice Department has a longstanding right to submit ex parte, in camera documents in sensitive cases.

"Contrary to plaintiffs' arguments, AT&T does not believe that an assertion of state secrets may blithely be dismissed without even considering the basis for it," wrote lawyers for AT&T.

Such arguments don't sit well for the plaintiffs in either case. As lawyers for the Oregon plaintiffs wrote, "Secret court filings are repugnant to a free society."

As the issues continue to be litigated, the judges in both suits will have to decide whether to open the heretofore secret documents, whether plaintiffs have standing, and if the suits would indeed unearth secrets vital to national security.

In the AT&T case, plaintiffs are hoping that Walker's decision on these issues will ultimately lead him to consider their motion for an injunction that would keep the government out of AT&T's network.

Until that decision is made this summer, Jewel -- judging by her Web site -- seems to have plenty to work on that won't bring government suspicion upon her.

One title in development is called "The Barbarian."

In that book, her Web site says, "a Highlander ends up married to the daughter of an English lord. He speaks only Gaelic and she doesn't. She thinks he's the muscle, not the bridegroom." That book, she wrote, will only require her to study Gaelic.

75 Now On Hunger Strike At Guantanamo (AP)

By Ben Fox

AP, May 29, 2006

The number of Guantanamo Bay detainees participating in a hunger strike has ballooned from three to around 75, the U.S. military said Monday, revealing growing defiance among prisoners held for up to 4 1/2 years with no end in sight.

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand called the hunger strike at the U.S. naval base in southeastern Cuba an "attention-getting" tactic to step up pressure for the inmates' release and said it might be related to a May 18 clash between detainees and guards that injured six prisoners.

"The hunger strike technique is consistent with al-Qaida practice and reflects detainee attempts to elicit media attention to bring international pressure on the United States to release them back to the battlefield," Durand said from Guantanamo Bay.

The United States now holds about 460 people at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. But human rights groups say innocent people have been sent to the jail.

Defense lawyers said the hunger strike, which began last year, reflects increasing frustration among men who have little contact with the world outside the remote prison.

"I think it is escalating because the people down there are getting more and more desperate," said Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees. "Obviously, things have reached a crisis point."

The military did not release the names of the striking detainees, and lawyers said they have no way of learning whether their clients are involved until they can visit the base.

"All these men want is a chance to have a trial," said Zachary Katznelson, an attorney for Reprieve, a British human rights group that represents 36 Guantanamo detainees. "If they are guilty, punish them. If not, then send them home."

Only 10 of the prisoners have been charged and face trial before military tribunals. The U.S. Supreme Court is expected to rule in June whether President Bush overstepped his authority in ordering the tribunals.

Durand said the number of hunger strikers reached about 75 over the weekend. U.S. officials classify detainees as being on hunger strike when they have missed nine consecutive meals.

Some 76 detainees began the strike last August to protest their confinement, with their ranks peaking at 131 in the fall, the military has said.

Defense lawyers have accused the military of underreporting the number of hunger strikers.

The lawyers say the number of strikers dwindled to three earlier this year after the military adopted more aggressive measures to force feed them, including using a restraint chair. U.S. officials said the measures are "safe and humane" and have been used in American civilian prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0030282

Four of the detainees on hunger strike are being force-fed, including the three who were participating in the protest before the recent increase, Durand said.

Military officials believe the increase in hunger strikers was timed to coincide with the arrival of journalists and lawyers for the next round of pretrial hearings for Guantanamo detainees in June, Durand said.

He added it also could be related to the clash earlier this month in which, according to the military, a detainee pretended to commit suicide to lure guards into a cellblock, where they were attacked by prisoners armed with makeshift weapons.

Earlier that day, two detainees overdosed on antidepressant drugs they collected from other detainees and hoarded in their cells. The men have since regained consciousness.

75 Prisoners Join In Hunger Strike At U.S. Base In Guantanamo Bay (WP)

By Jane Sutton

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

MIAMI, May 29 -- Seventy-five prisoners at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were on a hunger strike Monday, joining a few who have refused food and been force-fed since August, a military official said.

Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman for the Guantanamo Bay detention operation, called the hunger strike an attempt by the prisoners to gain media attention and pressure the United States to release about 460 men held there as enemy combatants.

Detainees are counted as hunger strikers if they miss nine consecutive meals, and most of the 75 hit that mark Sunday, Durand said. Most are refusing food but continuing to drink liquids, he said.

One of the recent group is being force-fed through a tube inserted through the nose and into the stomach, as are three others who have been on a hunger strike since Aug. 8, Durand said.

Hunger strikes have occurred periodically since the first suspected al-Qaeda and Taliban prisoners were taken to the U.S. base in southeast Cuba in 2002.

Durand said the current hunger strike may be timed to a series of hearings scheduled in June by the U.S. war crimes tribunals at Guantanamo Bay, which are formally called commissions.

"This new hunger strike is likely a coordinated, but short-term, effort designed to coincide with the military commissions hearings scheduled for the next several weeks, as defense attorneys and media normally travel to Guantanamo to observe this process," Durand said by e-mail.

He said it may also be related to an outbreak of violence on May 18, when two detainees tried to commit suicide by overdosing on hoarded medicine. Several others attacked guards who rushed into a communal barracks to stop an attempted hanging that was later determined to be a ruse.

The two who overdosed are expected to recover fully, and they remain under observation at a hospital inside the detention camp, Durand said.

"They are alert, talking, walking and recovering," he said.

Human rights groups have long criticized the indefinite detention of foreign captives at Guantanamo Bay. President Bush said recently he would like to close the base, but administration officials said many of those held there are dangerous men who should remain locked up somewhere, if not at Guantanamo Bay.

Military officials said 287 Guantanamo Bay prisoners have been freed or transferred to other governments, and negotiations are ongoing to return more than 100 others to their homelands for continued detention.

Excluding Friends (WP)

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

THE SENATE HAD an opportunity last week to fix the horrendous mess Congress has inadvertently made out of the law governing the admission of refugees to the United States. In an overwhelming, bipartisan vote, it passed it up -- much to its shame. The body voted 79 to 19 to reject an amendment put forth by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) that would have restored discretion to the government to admit human rights victims bizarrely branded under current law as terrorists or supporters of terrorism.

The vote followed gross misrepresentations of the proposal by Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). Indeed, given their descriptions, it's a wonder even 19 senators voted for it. Mr. Kyl portrayed it as permitting the admission of Taliban fighters; Mr. Specter warned of members of Hamas and other terrorists showing up on American shores.

The proposal would have done nothing of the kind. The government has wide latitude to exclude people who pose a national security threat. The problem with the existing laws are that they define a terrorist group so broadly as to include virtually any organization that has ever used weapons. And they not only permit but also require the exclusion of all members and material supporters of such groups -- with no exceptions for people who acted under the threat of violence. So a Liberian woman used as a sex slave in her own house or a Northern Alliance soldier who fought alongside American troops in Afghanistan would both be excluded -- the former for providing shelter to terrorists, the latter for membership in a "terrorist" group. Tens of thousands of refugees around the world are held up because of these strictures, many of them for affiliations with armed groups this country has actively supported and certainly never regarded as terrorists.

The Leahy proposal would have clarified that the bar applies only to groups the government has designated foreign terrorist organizations, and it would have created an exception for people who were forced to provide support to such organizations. Its rejection puts a huge burden on the administration -- which also shamefully opposed Mr. Leahy's amendment -- to exercise its very limited discretion under existing law aggressively. Current law allows the government to waive the ban for supporters, though not members, of terrorist groups. Following a lengthy intra-governmental skirmish, the administration has finally begun using this power -- permitting one large group of ethnic Karen victims of Burmese oppression to move forward in the process. But it won't be enough. The Senate needs to revisit this.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

For Some Katrina Evacuees, Another Displacement Looms (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

AUSTIN -- In the nine months since their New Orleans home was flooded with nine feet of water, Dianne Jeanpierre has worked hard to put her life and her daughters' lives back in order.

Their orderly apartment here is filled with gently worn donated furniture. The new routine for this Catholic family includes weekly inspirational services at a Baptist church.

Ashley, 17, attended her junior prom through the generosity of a department-store dress giveaway to children affected by Hurricane Katrina. Brittany, 14, had been enrolled in a high school for academically gifted students in New Orleans when the hurricane hit Aug. 29; she stayed focused and last week finished the school year with two citations for scholarship.

But the family's fragile stability is threatened. Jeanpierre has run out of unemployment insurance benefits from her former job as a security guard in New Orleans and cannot work because of debilitating asthma. Earlier this month, she got a notice that she would lose her housing benefits from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Soon thereafter, her car was repossessed.

"I tried to make a home," said Jeanpierre, 46. "Now they're trying to eat you up, I tell you. Everything is just going downhill."

Jeanpierre's family is among about 55,000 nationwide facing the end of a FEMA-funded rental assistance program, in which local governments issued 12-month housing and utility vouchers.

Last month, FEMA began issuing letters to thousands of evacuees telling them their aid would be terminated. The vouchers are to end Wednesday in most of the country and on June 30 in 11 Texas jurisdictions, including Austin, Dallas and Houston.

That decision, says a class-action lawsuit filed by the Houston law firm of Caddell & Chapman and a consortium of public interest law groups, will create "widespread homelessness" and violates FEMA's statutory obligations to provide temporary housing assistance to hurricane victims.

FEMA's decisions on which evacuees to move into a housing assistance program with more rigorous requirements are "arbitrary, inconsistent and inequitable," the lawsuit contends. "As a result, FEMA is creating an opportunity to discontinue its housing assistance for tens of thousands of people."

Sixty-two members of the House filed a brief last week supporting the suit. It says that FEMA "continues to engage in a process that is marked by inefficiency, a lack of discernable standards and seeming disregard for the plight of the vulnerable survivors who are depending on the aid that FEMA is statutorily obligated to provide."

U.S. District Judge David Hittner is expected to rule Tuesday on a request to stop FEMA temporarily from shutting down the housing assistance program and to hold a trial on the lawsuit's merits.

"This process is broken, and FEMA is not following its mandates," said John B. Scofield Jr. of Caddell & Chapman. "Some people have extensions [to June 30], but still there are multiple thousands that are being left in the dust."

Aaron Walker, a FEMA spokesman in Washington, declined to comment on the lawsuit, citing agency policy regarding pending litigation. But, Walker said, reviews of evacuees' cases -- appeals and application updates -- are being conducted continually.

"There's a number of reasons, reasonable and logical reasons, people are found ineligible" for continued housing assistance, Walker said. "We genuinely aren't in an effort to have people without housing."

FEMA officials say that about 50,000 households are in the housing assistance program and that 12,000 have been informed they are ineligible for continued aid. The lawsuit contends that about 55,000 households are in the program nationwide and that "at least 17,000 households or at least 50,000 people of all ages have been deemed ineligible for further housing assistance and/or have not received a final determination of eligibility."

Of the households deemed ineligible, 7,600 are in Houston, where the majority of displaced Katrina evacuees live, and 2,100 are in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the suit says.

Many rulings of ineligibility were wrong, according to the lawsuit and officials working with evacuees. Some evacuees were told that their homes in New Orleans were not damaged enough to qualify them for continued assistance or that their old houses or apartments are habitable. Some were told that their paperwork was incomplete or that they did not meet certain requirements. Others were given no reason.

Those determinations, said LaTosha Brown, executive director of the Saving Our Selves Coalition in Atlanta, has displaced Louisianans panicked and landlords -- who were told by FEMA that it will no longer honor the housing vouchers -- sending eviction notices for next month.

"Instead of the government helping, it exacerbates the problem," said Brown, co-founder of the coalition, which is working with Katrina evacuees throughout the Gulf Coast and in Georgia. "There's an insensitivity to where people are emotionally. This is not business as usual. People are still damaged from the debacle."

Jeanpierre found out she was ineligible for continued rental assistance after her landlord received a notice from FEMA that it would stop paying her rent and utilities on Wednesday (an extension to June 30 was granted last week). The insurance settlement she received for her destroyed home in the Gentilly neighborhood went to the bank to pay off the mortgage.

She has applied for federal disability benefits through the Social Security Administration because of her health, but the case is pending. An urgent request to FEMA by a lawyer representing her asked the agency not to terminate her housing assistance until her case is settled. The request has not been answered.

"I'm just going to stay here until they send the police to put us out," Jeanpierre said. "There's nowhere for me to go."

After Katrina, New Fear Along Coast (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

VIOLET, La. -- When the floodwaters of Katrina reached the second floor of his home, Jesse Reed decided it was time to flee. He grabbed a shotgun, climbed onto the roof from a second-floor dormer window and jumped into his bass boat, which he kept nearby just for that purpose.

The 51-year-old, an outdoorsman and a plumber by trade, was proud of having ridden out previous storms with a certain woodsy elan.

Now, he says, "I wouldn't stay here for a goddarn hard rain."

All along the coast of the southeastern United States, even in those places untouched by its rage, Hurricane Katrina has obliterated long-held certitudes. Last year's destructive storm eroded the almost innate self-confidence of residents who once viewed hurricanes as tempests that could be weathered, not unimaginable catastrophes.

On the verge of what forecasters say will be a "very active" hurricane season, the result is a hovering fear. The wariness is a key but often unspoken cause for the slow recovery in towns wrecked last year -- residents are too afraid to return -- and a source of widespread anxiety everywhere else along the southeast coast.

Tony Fernandez, a sheriff's office official for St. Bernard Parish here, said that throughout the community there is a new reverence for "nature's strength and fury."

"Before we were all like doubting Thomases -- we had to see it," he said, shrugging. "Now we saw it."

The new faith is pervasive. Since Katrina, emergency managers from Houston to Biloxi, Miss., to Charleston, S.C., have chucked or revised evacuation plans that were long thought to have been adequate.

Dillard University in New Orleans has moved the start of classes from mid-August to late September to miss most of hurricane season. Some Florida residents have banded together to buy enormous generators capable of running entire households.

And civil engineers from around the country are similarly gripped by a new sense of the perils. They have reported widespread and long-standing flaws in the New Orleans levees, called for investigations into every levee in the United States and identified flaws in the dike that keeps Lake Okeechobee from overflowing South Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0030285

"Katrina was a defining experience for many people, and that's no less true for engineers," said Steven G. Vick, a Colorado engineer and one of the investigators who reported that the Lake Okeechobee dike is unsafe. The news spurred state leaders this month to create an evacuation plan for thousands of nearby residents who had long thought there was nothing to fear.

"You just don't do engineering in the same way after you've seen New Orleans. You don't take it as an abstraction, lines on a map," he said. "You recognize that you're dealing with people's lives."

While federal, state and local leaders have assured an anxious coastal public that every possible measure is being taken to avoid the calamitous evacuations and bungled responses during the last season, there are clearly unbridgeable gaps in the preparations.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff expressed concern last week that the "greatest vulnerability" remains in areas that were hardest hit last year because the ubiquitous trailers that house storm victims cannot withstand high winds and because work on the protective levees has not been completed.

In Louisiana, about 200,000 people are living in 100,000 trailers, and a scattering of them dots this flood-wrecked town.

After Katrina passed by, Violet was inundated in a matter of minutes by water flowing over what was left of the levees protecting it from the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet. The surrounding area of St. Bernard Parish took some of Katrina's worst punishment.

Nearly every one of the 27,000 homes in the parish was severely flooded, and residents have taken to a rueful joke: One guy says, "How'd you do in the flood?" And the other guy says, "Not bad, just four feet -- on the second floor."

Of the several thousand people who did not evacuate, many languished for days without adequate food, water and medical supplies, and today, debris and wrecked houses still line roadways. Many stoplights don't work, and most businesses remain closed.

"We're living in a monument to why you need to get out when a hurricane is coming," Fernandez said.

On Friday, at Our Lady of Prompt Succor here -- the only Catholic church of eight in the area to have reopened -- parishioners will fast and pray for safety during the hurricane season, responding to a statewide call by the bishops of Louisiana. Churches elsewhere in Louisiana and in Florida have held services to ask for God's mercy this season.

"There's a tremendous anxiety here," said the Rev. William Maestri, spokesman for the Archdiocese of New Orleans. "We have to avoid despair, and we have to avoid the presumption that God will handle everything. We have to offer hope."

The specter of Katrina, combined with the warnings from the National Hurricane Center last week predicting eight to 10 hurricanes this season, has created an atmosphere of suspense and vulnerability.

St. Bernard Parish leaders announced last week that in the event of a hurricane, they will call for evacuations 24 hours earlier and store emergency supplies on higher ground, and that they had decided it is too dangerous to open any local shelters.

Because so many now say they will obey evacuation orders, the fear is not for lives but for the community itself. Many people are not returning. Fewer than 1 in 10 houses in Reed's neighborhood have trailers out in front; the others are unoccupied.

Despite assurances by the Army Corps of Engineers, many here believe the levees are inadequate.

Last week, Corps contractors were repairing the levees damaged by Katrina, piling them up to 20 feet with dirt floated in on barges, but officials acknowledged that even once that job is complete, another storm like Katrina could inundate the area again. More funding for the levees is pending before Congress.

Among those distrustful of the levees -- and not returning -- is Warren Duvieilh, 47, an electrician. He and his wife and daughter, all natives of the Violet area, have moved north of New Orleans. He rode out the storm at home and when the flood came, ran to the second floor of a house next door, where he was rescued 24 hours later. Then, like hundreds of others, he was stranded for days at a nearby improvised evacuee camp, where water and food had to be rationed.

"We've been married for 26 years and we lost everything," Duvieilh said. "No one could ever imagine the water could get that high. I'll never doubt it again."

Most of his family's friends, he said, have already moved out of harm's way.

"It is very difficult for some to leave," he said. "But they don't feel they could go back and risk everything again."

When Katrina flooded this small town, Jesse Reed rescued neighbors with his boat before heading toward dry land a few days later. Like a hardy few, he is planning to give the area one more chance. But just one.

"If the water comes back," he said, "I ain't coming back."

Levee Progress Report: Much Done, More To Do (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, May 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0030286

NEW ORLEANS - With meteorologists predicting another severe round of hurricanes this summer, the US Army Corps of Engineers is hastily working to finish repairs to the New Orleans' levee system by June 1 - the official start of hurricane season - calling the end product "stronger and better than before."

But independent engineers and scientists say that even with $800 million in repairs and re-inforcements, the levee system is not safe yet, and they caution residents in badly damaged areas against "buying promises" and returning too soon.

The result is that many evacuees remain uncertain about whether to rebuild and move home, adding to the trepidation about the approaching hurricane season.

"People need to have confidence in their protection system in order to come back," says Col. Lewis Setliff, the engineer overseeing the levee repairs for the corps.

Currently, his team is installing three new floodgates where New Orleans meets Lake Pontchartrain, to block tidal surges, as well as auxiliary pumps to help prevent inland flooding when the gates are closed. But the massive floodgates - at a cost of about $35 million each - are only temporary, says Colonel Setliff as he watches the work being done on the 17th Street Canal.

Congress is debating a more permanent solution, the building of which could take years and cost significantly more than the $3.1 billion now allotted for repairs to the protection system.

After the corps completes initial repairs, the integrity of the entire system is not certain, corps officials acknowledge. They are working to have a full assessment by September - two-thirds of the way through hurricane season.

That's especially disconcerting, says Raymond Seed, a civil engineer at the University of California, Berkeley, and head of the Independent Levee Investigation Team, which presented its final report this week. "During Katrina, the weakest link in the chain broke, and the next weakest link is the one we now have to worry about," he says.

Across from the breach at the east side of the 17th Street Canal, for instance, the west bank's floodwall is now off center about 3-1/2 inches. "It was about to fail," says Dr. Seed.

His group is calling for a Federal Flood Protection Authority similar to local flood-protection authorities and a reorganization of the corps similar to what occurred at NASA after the space shuttle Columbia went down.

"I myself would not purchase property and move in now if the commitment of the state and federal government is to continue with business as usual," he says.

Pam Dashiell, for one, is taking his advice. About 250 people have returned to her historic neighborhood in the Ninth Ward's Holy Cross area, but she is not one of them.

"I'm waiting to see whether the levees will hold," she says, adding that she does not trust the corps when it says the levees will be stronger and better. "They told us it was safe before."

Residents should be concerned, says Robert Bea, an expert in technical forensics and a member of the Independent Levee Investigation Team. "The corps has made some really substantive and good repairs to the system since Katrina, but it is essentially the same system," he says. "If it is challenged again, it will suffer the same outcome, which is catastrophic failure."

For a new system to work, says Dr. Bea, new technologies and new ideas must be incorporated. "Beyond sheet pilings and floodgates," he says, the corps needs to bolster the barrier islands, plant trees and other vegetation, eliminate drainage canals, build underground culverts, and turn some backyards into fields.

"In some places, you are going to have to surrender land, because either you can't defend it or it should be part of the defense system," says Bea.

Recently, the corps announced that two of the new floodgates and pumps won't be ready until July - though Setliff stresses there are adequate fallback plans in case of an early hurricane.

Sandy Rosenthal, with levees.org, says her watchdog group was not surprised to hear of the delay.

"The organization that is responsible for this catastrophe is still in charge," she says, referring to the corps. Ninety percent of what went wrong lies at the feet of the federal government, and more specifically, the corps, which built the levee system, she says.

But Seed, who has been a critic of the corps' performance, cautions against that view. "Everybody's looking to blame the Army Corps of Engineers, but this is very much a layered cake with regards to responsibility."

The levee along the Orleans Avenue Canal, for instance, did not fail during Katrina. But because a 400-foot section was simply unfinished, it became a spillway, inundating nearby neighborhoods with water.

It was up to the city to complete that section, but the levee board and the reclamation district could never agree on how to finish it.

"There seems to be a rule down here that two agencies have to be in conflict. And their failure to get together in the interest of the public good caused catastrophic damage," says Seed.

Acknowledging local failures, Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a city councilwoman whose district includes hard-hit Gentilly and Pontchartrain Park, says everyone needs to take part in the solution.

DOJ_NMG_0030287

"But it's the responsibility of the federal government to provide the funding for safe levees," she says. She is satisfied that the corps' repairs will prevent storm surge, "but what about overtopping, what about heavy rains, what about the long-term solution? We need a comprehensive plan."

The Catastrophe Wasn't Katrina (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The evidence, by now, is overwhelming: Beautiful, decadent New Orleans wasn't doomed by Hurricane Katrina but by decades of human incompetence and neglect. As far as the drowned city is concerned, the greatest natural disaster in the nation's history would have been just a messy inconvenience if not for the fumbling hand of man.

The mortal threat to New Orleans, as Katrina plowed into the Gulf Coast, was not the powerful winds -- Mississippi took the brunt of those -- but the massive storm surge the hurricane generated. We now know that the levees, floodwalls and other barriers protecting the city were, for the most part, plenty tall enough and theoretically strong enough to keep the waters at bay. On paper, New Orleans should have ended up wet and wounded, but basically intact.

What happened instead was "the single most costly catastrophic failure of an engineered system in history," according to a report issued last week by the Independent Levee Investigation Team, a blue-ribbon panel led by experts from the University of California at Berkeley and funded by the National Science Foundation.

Some of the flood barriers were built using inadequate materials, the report says. Others were designed so poorly that they provided weak spots for the waters to exploit. Still others were left unfinished for lack of funds.

The Army Corps of Engineers, which was responsible for building the levees that failed, has not yet issued its own final report on the flood and likely will dispute some of the independent team's conclusions. But Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff remarked last week that "had it not been for what appear to be structural problems in the building of the levees, Katrina would have been a bad hurricane" but not an unparalleled catastrophe.

The report of the independent team, which was led by UC Berkeley engineering professor Raymond B. Seed, cites these examples of cause and effect:

Earthen levees stretching east from the city were built with "highly erodible sand" and other "lightweight" materials that could be found locally, rather than more "cohesive" clay soils that would have had to be trucked in. "When the storm surge arrived, massive portions of these levees eroded catastrophically," the report says. "The resulting carnage in St. Bernard Parish was devastating," with a "wall of water . . . pushing homes laterally, flipping cars like toys and leaving them leaning against buildings, and driving large shrimp boats deep into the heart of residential neighborhoods."

Floodwalls lining the east side of the Inner Harbor Navigation Canal, known to locals as the Industrial Canal, were not engineered to keep water from seeping beneath and undermining them. "The result was two massive breaches that devastated the adjacent Ninth Ward neighborhood, and then pushed east to meet with the floodwaters already rapidly approaching from the east from St. Bernard Parish."

Surging water pushed by the hurricane's winds from Lake Pontchartrain into the 17th Street and London Avenue drainage canals remained "well below the design levels, and well below the tops of the floodwalls." Nonetheless, the floodwalls suffered "catastrophic" failures; the designers apparently had not fully understood the weakness of the foundation soils on which the walls were built. So even though little if any water lapped over the walls, sudden breaches inundated central New Orleans -- residential neighborhoods, business districts, the streets around the Superdome.

The report notes that "no one group or organization had a monopoly on responsibility" for the disaster. Local, state and national government officials were rarely on the same page. In terms of pure engineering, there should have been independent review of some of the Corps of Engineers' assumptions and methods.

The most chilling sentence in the report is this one:

"A number of these same problems appear to be somewhat pervasive, and call into question the integrity and reliability of other sections of the flood protection system that did not fail during the event."

In other words, there are many miles of levees around New Orleans that were built with the same questionable design principles and materials that were used in the barriers that gave way. The Corps has patched the levee system so that it could probably prevent the last flood, but what about the next one?

Chertoff worries about a storm hitting next-door Jefferson Parish, which has seen its population swell with evacuees and reconstruction workers. He worries that with so many people living in flimsy trailers, even an approaching tropical storm might necessitate an evacuation. With New Orleans still crippled and the jury not yet back on whether it can ever fully recover from Katrina, no one wants to flip the calendar. Hurricane season officially begins on Thursday.

DHS Personnel Officer Resigns As Department Tackles Crucial Workplace Issues (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, May 30, 2006

The top personnel officer at the Department of Homeland Security, on the job about eight months, has resigned and will leave June 9, a department spokesman said.

K. Gregg Prillaman , who has more than 30 years of experience in personnel and management issues, had been tapped to oversee an ambitious revision of pay scales and workplace rules at Homeland Security, which has about 185,000 employees.

His departure is another jolt to the department, which has been coping with turnover in its senior executive ranks. "I was surprised by his resignation," said Michael Jackson , deputy secretary for Homeland Security. "He had done some good work for us. He just made a decision to make a change, and that was his call."

Department spokesman Larry Orluskie said Prillaman had no comment on his resignation. "We will pass on the opportunity at this time to do an interview," Orluskie said.

Prillaman's departure comes as the department wrestles with a series of critical workplace issues. A lawsuit brought by federal unions has blocked new rules that would curtail union rights and an appeals court ruling could come within the next few weeks. The House has voted to take money from the department's management account and shows little interest in providing funds to develop a new personnel system. And the merger of 22 agencies into Homeland Security, although three years old, continues to drain employee morale.

The department is behind its original schedule for changing how employees will be paid, deployed and disciplined. Officials now hope to introduce a new pay-for-performance system in February 2007 and continue in phases through 2008.

Some officials fear that the changes, although a priority for the administration, may continue to slip because of more pressing issues, such as improving immigration and border controls, and preparing for the summer hurricane season.

Prillaman's position -- chief human capital officer -- is relatively new in the government. Congress created the position in 2002 as a way to elevate workforce issues and put them on the table at senior leadership meetings.

But the job did not work out for Prillaman, according to current and former colleagues.

Prillaman and Janet Hale , the department's undersecretary for management, clashed over policy and operational issues, colleagues said. Strong philosophical differences so strained their relationship that they could not work together, said the colleagues, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to publicly discuss an internal matter.

Jackson suggested that the accounts were off base. "I would not oversubscribe to any sort of internal discussions here about people pushing on each other, because that happens in any organization," he said.

Hale also is leaving the department; her last day was Friday. She had been at Homeland Security since its founding. . She declined to be interviewed, Orluskie said.

Jackson said being Homeland Security's undersecretary of management "is one of the toughest jobs in the U.S. government. . . . It is a contact sport sometimes. It is a lot of complex issues, and people who bring a passion to the job like Janet did are the solution to what we need."

Searches are underway for successors to Prillaman and Hale, and an interim replacement for Prillaman has been found, Jackson said.

Scott Charbo , who oversees technology issues for the department, will be acting undersecretary for management.

Other key vacancies also have been filled, Jackson said.

On Friday, the Senate confirmed W. Ralph Basham , a 29-year veteran of the Secret Service, as the commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, which has 41,000 employees and is one of Homeland Security's largest agencies.

The Senate also confirmed R. David Paulison as undersecretary for federal emergency management and David Norquist as the department's chief financial officer.

"We are attracting strong public servants," Jackson said.

WAR NEWS:

Marine Probe Poses A Crucial Test For Iraqi Leaders (WSJ)

By Yochi Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The killing of unarmed Iraqi civilians allegedly by U.S. Marines could become a flash point between the U.S. and the new Iraqi government, which faces the question of whether to seek the extradition of American military personnel who may have been involved in the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0030289

When Nouri al-Maliki was sworn in as Iraq's prime minister earlier this month, the Bush administration expressed hope that the installation of Iraq's first democratically elected government would reduce tensions there and pave the way for a U.S. military withdrawal. But the possibility that Marines in the Sunni city of Haditha killed 24 Iraqi civilians and tried to cover up the shootings could inflame conditions during Mr. Maliki's first days in power.

U.S. military investigators opened a pair of formal probes into the mid-November incident in Haditha, and civilian and military officials familiar with the matter said photos, videos and other evidence in the possession of military authorities indicate the Marines killed unarmed civilians, including women and children, without provocation. The evidence also indicates the Marines tried to cover up the incident by blaming the deaths on insurgents, these officials said. Investigators are likely to charge several Marines with murder, which carries the death penalty under military law, and other Marines are likely to be charged with attempting to cover up the incident, the officials said.

U.S. officials say they are bracing for the possibility that Mr. Maliki will demand that any Marines involved in the incident be turned over to the Iraqi justice system for trial as a way of burnishing his credentials as leader and addressing outrage over the incident.

Under the U.S. government's "status of forces" agreements with Iraq, U.S. military personnel accused of wrongdoing can be tried solely under the U.S. military justice system. As a political matter, however, an Iraqi extradition demand would almost certainly spark a standoff between the two governments.

Gen. George Casey, the top military commander in Iraq, said in an interview that he hadn't discussed the Haditha incident with the new prime minister or his Iraqi counterparts, and they hadn't asked about it. Once the investigation is complete, Gen. Casey said, he likely would discuss it with them. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad referred questions about Haditha to the military. A spokesman for Mr. Maliki said the government is "considering all its options," but declined to comment further.

Allegations of the incident in Haditha, where dozens of U.S. forces have been killed in ambushes and other attacks since the 2003 invasion, prompted several U.S. lawmakers to warn that the deaths could damage America's efforts in Iraq and its moral standing in the Arab world more deeply than the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal. Republicans pledged to hold public hearings to investigate the military's handling of the deaths.

"There is this serious question...of what happened and when it happened and what was the immediate reaction of the senior officers in the Marine Corps when they began to gain knowledge of it," Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday on ABC's "This Week."

Iraqis have complained that the U.S. military rarely investigates the accidental killings of Iraqi civilians in raids or at military-run checkpoints. The belief that Mr. Maliki's predecessors as premier have been unable or unwilling to confront the issue has fueled Iraqi skepticism about the political transition.

Thousands of Iraqi civilians have been killed in recent months in sectarian violence carried out by insurgents, militia fighters, and death squads linked to the new U.S.-trained Iraqi military and paramilitary forces. With fears of sectarian bloodshed escalating, Sunnis and Shiites who have lost faith in the new federal government and its forces see U.S. troops as the only semihonest broker in the country. Many Iraqi leaders have expressed outrage over the incident, but broader concerns of sectarian violence could help reduce a public backlash against U.S. forces.

"None of the locals here trust the new government at all," said Capt. Rick Montcalm, who leads a reconnaissance platoon in a largely Sunni area north of Baghdad.

General Pledges ‘appropriate Action' In Probe Of Iraqi Deaths (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, May 30, 2006

The chairman of the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff said Monday that “it would be premature for me to judge” the outcome of a Pentagon investigation into the killing of as many as a dozen Iraqi civilians by Marines.

However, Marine Gen. Peter Pace said he believes it's critically important to make the point that if certain servicemembers are responsible for an atrocity there, they “have not performed their duty the way that 99.9% of their fellow Marines have.”

Interviewed on CBS' The Early Show as the nation observed Memorial Day honoring men and women lostin war, Pace pledged that “we'll get to the bottom of the investigation and take the appropriate action.”

Pace's interview came a day after Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine war veteran and critic of Iraq policy, said the incident could undermine U.S. efforts there more than the Abu Ghraib prison scandal did.

Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, also charged that the shootings last November at Hadithah, a city in the Anbar province of western Iraq that has been plagued by insurgents, were covered up.

DOJ_NMG_0030290

“Who covered it up, why did they cover it up, why did they wait so long?” Murtha said Sunday on This Week on ABC. “We don't know how far it goes. It goes right up the chain of command.”

A bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine. Marines then shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi at the scene and went into two homes and shot other people, according to Murtha, who has been briefed by officials.

One of the Marines in Hadithah that day, Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones of Hanford, Calif., told the Los Angeles Times that he took photos and carried out bodies as part of a cleanup crew dispatched to the homes after the shootings. He said he did not witness their deaths.

“They ranged from little babies to adult males and females. I'll never be able to get that out of my head. I can still smell the blood. This left something in my head and heart,” Briones, 21, told the Los Angeles Times for a story published Monday.

Murtha said Sunday that high-level reports he received indicated that no one fired upon the Marines or that there was any military action against the U.S. forces after the initial explosion. Yet the deaths were not seriously investigated until March because an early probe was stifled within days of the incident, he said.

Said Pace on Monday: “This investigation is ongoing. It would be premature for me to judge the outcome.”

Asked how such a thing could have happened, he replied, “Fortunately, it does not happen very frequently, so there's no way to say historically why something like this might have happened. We'llfind out.” Murtha repeated his view that the war in Iraq cannot be won militarily and needs political solutions, which he said were damaged by such incidents involving the United States.

“This is the kind of war you have to win the hearts and minds of the people,” he said. “And we're set back every time something like this happens. This is worse than Abu Ghraib.”

The U.S. effort to win over Iraqis and others in the Arab world by fostering a democratic government was damaged when it was revealed that U.S. military personnel had abused and humiliated people held at Abu Ghraib, a prison outside of Baghdad.

Bloody Scenes Haunt A Marine (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, May 29, 2006

HANFORD, Calif. — Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones says he is tormented by two memories of Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha, Iraq.

The first is of the body of his best friend and fellow Marine blown apart just after dawn by a roadside bomb. The second is of the lifeless form of a small Iraqi girl, one of two dozen unarmed civilians allegedly killed by members of his Camp Pendleton unit — Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division.

Briones, a wiry, soft-spoken 21-year-old interviewed Sunday at his family home in this Central Valley city, said he was not among the small group of Marines that military investigators have concluded killed the civilians, including children, women and elderly men.

However, Briones, who goes by Ryan, said he took photographs of the victims and helped carry their bodies out of their homes as part of the cleanup crew sent in late in the afternoon on the day of the killings.

"They ranged from little babies to adult males and females. I'll never be able to get that out of my head. I can still smell the blood. This left something in my head and heart," Briones said.

He said he erased the digital photos he took at the scene after first providing them to the Haditha Marine command center. He said Navy investigators later interrogated him about the pictures and confiscated his camera.

At least two military investigations are underway into the incident at Haditha, which is emerging as possibly the worst case of alleged criminal misconduct by U.S. forces in the 3-year-old Iraq war.

Of the 12 Marines being investigated, three or four are thought to have done the killing, according to officials briefed on the investigation. The others are being investigated for failing to stop the killings or for not reporting the incident truthfully.

Briones is the first of his unit to speak publicly about the events. His account provides background on the atmosphere and activities that day in the Euphrates River town and the traumatic memories it left in its wake.

Shortly after 7 a.m. on Nov. 19, Briones, who received a Purple Heart during a previous tour in Iraq that included fierce fighting in Fallouja, said his team of five men was called to respond to a roadside bomb explosion about 300 yards outside Kilo Company's Firm Base Sparta, located in an abandoned school.

When they arrived about 10 minutes later at the smoky, chaotic scene in a residential neighborhood, he said he saw the remains of his best friend, Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas, his body split in half, resting in the destroyed Humvee in which he had been riding.

"He had a giant hole in his chin. His eyes were rolled back up in his skull," Briones recalled of the 20-year-old Texan. Briones said he draped a poncho over the body of his drinking buddy and workout partner and said a short prayer over his body: "Rest in peace. You are my brother by another mother. I love you, man."

DOJ_NMG_0030291

After the explosion, Marines began a methodical sweep of homes looking for the bomber or people who knew his identity, according to officials briefed on the investigation. At some point during the sweep, Marines entered three nearby homes, killing the people inside.

But Briones said he didn't see any of this.

"It was such a blur. Smoky and smelled like an explosion," Briones said. "I only saw T.J. because he was right there. I practically walked into him."

He said his team evacuated two other soldiers in Terrazas' unit who were wounded in the explosion, including one, whom he identified as Lance Cpl. James Crossan of Washington state, who was pinned under the wreckage.

Briones and his team, including a Navy medical corpsman he identified as Brian Witt, evacuated the two wounded to a nearby soccer field where they were picked up by a Black Hawk helicopter. He said he and his team then returned to the Sparta home base.

"We went back to the firm base and just waited," Briones said. "A lot of people were mad. Everyone had just had a [terrible] feeling about what had happened to T.J." Still in shock over the death of his best friend, Briones said he retreated to a dark corner of the camp to collect his thoughts. Only 20 at the time, he said he didn't want his even younger 3rd Squad, 3rd Platoon team members to see that he was grieving.

He said he and his team remained at the camp until they were called back to the scene of the explosion about 5:30 p.m. the same day.

When they arrived, Briones said that most of the Marines on the site were sergeants or above, including several officers: "I remember because they didn't have enough lance corporals to deal with the bodies."

Briones said his team was assigned to mark the bodies of the victims by number and place them in body bags. He said a sergeant or a junior officer, he couldn't recall which, asked if any of the Marines carried personal cameras and that he and another Marine, whom he identified as Lance Cpl. Andrew Wright of Novato, said they did.

"You are going to be combat photographers," Briones said they were told.

Briones said he took pictures of at least 15 bodies before his camera batteries died. He said he then helped other Marines remove the bodies and place them in body bags. He said his worst moment, and one that haunts him to this day, was picking up the body of a young girl who was shot in the head.

"I held her out like this," he said, demonstrating with his arms extended, "but her head was bobbing up and down and the insides fell on my legs."

As he spoke, his mother, Susie Briones, 40, a Hanford community college teacher, who was sitting beside him at the kitchen table, silently wiped away tears.

Earlier she confided to a reporter that her son called frequently from Iraq after he experienced nightmares over the little girl.

"He called me many times," she said, "about carrying this little girl in his hands and her brains splattering on his boots. He'd say, 'Mom, I can't clean my boots. I can't clean my boots. I see her.' "

Ryan Briones said that he and other members of the cleanup crew remained at the site until about 11 p.m. When he came back he said he dropped his Olympus 3.2 megapixel camera by the unmanned Sparta base command operations center. When he returned a few hours later he said it looked like the camera had been moved so he assumed someone had downloaded the pictures and he erased them all.

But whether the photos ever reached authorities, who also have pictures from an intelligence investigation team and another source, is not clear.

Briones also said that he did not want to give the impression that he still had copies of the photographs because he did not want his possessions or those of his family searched by Navy investigators. He said there had been several examples recently of Navy investigators confiscating computers and PlayStation consoles capable of storing photographs.

The photos later became the main focus of questions by investigators who interviewed Briones for several hours in Iraq in March, shortly before he returned home. In the second interrogation, which he said took place at the battalion headquarters at Haditha Dam north of the city of Haditha, investigators showed him photographs of the bodies similar to his but shot from different angles.

"They wanted to know if the bodies had been moved or tampered with," Briones recalled. He said he had not been interviewed by Navy investigators since his return, although other Marines in his company had been interrogated repeatedly for hours at the Naval Criminal Investigative Service at Camp Horno, part of sprawling Camp Pendleton.

In early April, less than 36 hours after his return from Iraq, Ryan Briones got into serious trouble in his hometown that he and his family say was related to stress from the Haditha incident.

DOJ_NMG_0030292

Briones was charged with stealing a pickup truck, crashing it into a house, leaving the scene of the accident, driving under the influence and resisting arrest. A picture of the spectacular crash with a white Ford F-150 lodged in a Hanford living room appeared on the Hanford Sentinel's front page April 4.

Released from Kings County jail April 5 on $35,000 bond, Briones has a court date set in mid-June.

His mother said that her son has joined Alcoholics Anonymous and is being treated by a San Diego physician for his post-traumatic symptoms.

"My son saw what the Marines did, and he knew who did it before the Haditha investigations began," the mother wrote in a long letter to local authorities seeking leniency in the criminal cases.

"He saw the killings and knew who sent the word out to do the killings, he had to clean up the bodies of children who were sleeping in their beds and he saw his best friend die in front of his eyes."

Susie Briones said she is angry at what she described as the Marines' failure to adequately "decompress" him and other Marines when they come home from combat. She said she was writing a book to help other families avoid what she and her son are going through.

"I used to be one of those Marines who said that post-traumatic stress is a bunch of bull," said Ryan Briones, who has prescriptions for anti-depressants and sleeping pills. "But all this stuff that keeps going through my head is eating me up. I need immediate help."

Drone's Video May Aid Marine Inquiry (WP)

Military investigators piecing together what happened in the Iraqi town of Haditha on Nov. 19 -- when Marines allegedly killed two dozen civilians -- have access to video shot by an unmanned drone aircraft that was circling overhead for at least part of that day, military defense lawyers familiar with the case said in interviews.

It is unclear whether the video obtained from that day's flight captured the violence, said the lawyers, who have consulted with Marines who were there. One lawyer said investigators have reviewed surveillance footage taken hours after the shootings, which showed the Marines returning to the town to remove the bodies of the Iraqis.

Yesterday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said charges will be issued against troops if the evidence merits it. For now, however, "it would be premature for me to judge" the outcome of the two U.S. military investigations, Pace said on CBS's "The Early Show." "We'll get to the bottom of the investigation and take the appropriate action."

Iraqis who say they witnessed the violence in Haditha have said U.S. troops shot men, women and children at close range in retaliation for the death of a Marine lance corporal in a roadside bombing. The two investigations -- one into the incident and another into allegations that military personnel tried to cover it up -- began this year after news reports challenged an early military statement that the civilians were killed in the bombing.

People familiar with the case say they expect that charges of murder, dereliction of duty and making a false statement will be brought against several Marines.

In addition to video from the drone, investigators have records of radio message traffic between the Marines and a command center, said military defense lawyers who have discussed the investigation with Marines who were at Haditha but who have not yet been formally retained by them.

"There's a ton of information that isn't out there yet," said one lawyer, who, like the others, would speak only on the condition of anonymity because a potential client has not been charged. The radio message traffic, he said, will provide a different view of the incident than has been presented by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and other members of Congress. For example, he said, contrary to Murtha's account, it will show that the Marines came under small-arms fire after the roadside explosion.

Two of the lawyers said the message traffic will show officers in higher headquarters knew early on that a large number of civilians had been killed and that they did not raise alarms.

"The chain of command knew about it," said one, and "the number of deaths was reported" by the commander of the company involved, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion of the 1st Regiment of the 1st Marine Division.

Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, a Marine spokesman, said yesterday he could not comment on the reports of drone-aircraft video or other aspects of the case because "the investigation isn't complete." Last month, the Marines relieved of command the battalion commander, Lt. Jeffrey R. Chessani, as well as McConnell and another company commander, citing a lack of confidence in their leadership.

The presence of the drone is potentially significant because such surveillance craft are in high demand in Iraq and their use is supervised by senior officers -- which could indicate there was interest among higher officers about what was occurring in Haditha.

One of the military lawyers said Nov. 19 was the 3rd Battalion's "hottest day" in Iraq, and was unusually violent even for al Anbar Province, which is where the insurgency began and where it remains extremely active.

In addition to drone surveillance that day, AV-8 Harriers were dropping bombs, helicopters were evacuating wounded, and a large firefight occurred about one-third of a mile from the site of the civilian shootings, said several people familiar with the investigation.

Also yesterday, the Los Angeles Times reported that a Marine said he photographed at least 15 bodies after the attack, which he said he was not involved in. Lance Cpl. Roel Ryan Briones, the first member of the unit to speak publicly about the incident, told the newspaper that after he took the pictures he helped remove bodies, including that of a young girl who had been shot in the head.

Briones indicated that since returning home to Hanford, Calif., he has suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder stemming from the corpses he saw and carried that day. "They ranged from little babies to adult males and females," the Times quoted him as saying.

Less than two days after coming home he was charged with stealing a pickup truck, leaving the scene of the accident, driving under the influence of alcohol and resisting arrest, the newspaper said.

On A Marine Base, Disbelief Over Charges (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., May 29 — In this "company town" where everything and everyone caters to the well-being of the Marine Corps, there is no shortage of people, both military and civilian, who are willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the troops accused of unjustified killings last November in Haditha, Iraq.

Denial and utter disbelief are the overwhelming reaction to reports of the killings involving marines based here. If there is any truth to the accusations, some say, then the troops must have been acting on direct orders, responding as they were trained to do.

Lawrence Harper, 36, now retired, served in the Marine Corps for more than 15 years, and was in the Persian Gulf war.

"Many times you see a situation the next day and wonder, how did my brain think this was dangerous?" Mr. Harper said, while shopping for gear at G.I. Joe's, a military supply shop in Oceanside.

Mr. Harper expressed doubt that the marines knowingly committed crimes in Haditha, saying that they undoubtedly acted on instinct, as trained, in the heat of battle.

"When a bullet comes at you and you turn around and half your buddy's head is blown off, it changes the way you think forever," he said.

Jerry Alexander, the owner of G.I. Joe's and a Navy man who served with the Marines for a dozen years, had much the same perspective, saying, "If I saw my buddy laying there dead, there is no such thing as too much retaliation."

While Mr. Alexander said "unacceptable kills" should not be covered up, he worried about the unfairness of judging those who were in Haditha.

"In the heat of combat, you cannot hesitate; he who hesitates is lost," he said. "I would not prosecute these young men because they were just doing their jobs."

On this Memorial Day, in this military community, people will concede that any marine who committed illegal acts must be punished and that the Pentagon must take responsibility.

But conversation quickly returns to emotional and earnest explanations of the need for understanding for what one former marine described as "these 19-year-old kids who get paid 900 bucks a month to put their lives on the line."

The marines and several senior officers assigned to the Third Battalion of the First Marine Division are the focus of criminal investigations looking into the deaths of 24 people who lived in the Subhani district of Haditha, an insurgent stronghold in Iraq.

A preliminary inquiry indicated that the civilians were killed during a four- to five-hour sweep, led by a handful of marines angry over the death of Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, 20, of El Paso, Tex., who was killed as his patrol drove through the area.

Appearing Monday on the CNN program "American Morning," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said, "We want to find out what happened and we'll make it public."

He added, "If the allegations, as they are being portrayed in the newspaper, turn out to be valid, then of course there will be charges. But we don't know yet what the outcome will be."

DOJ_NMG_0030294

The family of Corporal Terrazas was interviewed Monday morning on "Morning Edition" on National Public Radio. His uncle, Andy Terrazas, a former marine who is now a border patrol agent, said, "I hope this is over soon so they can just let him rest in peace. I hope these marines come out clean, but I guess it's not looking too good, right?"

None of the active and former marines interviewed for this story knew Corporal Terrazas or the members of the unit at the center of the probe. But most of them had seen combat, recently or in the Gulf war.

"In Iraq, everything you do has to be cleared with a commanding officer," said Cpl. Michael Miller, 25, who has served two tours of duty and fought in Falluja and Ramadi. "You just can't go clearing houses without the permission of higher-ups."

Corporal Miller said he believed that the marines would be vindicated in the inquiry. "I just think the marines did what they had to do," he said. "I don't know why innocent people are dead, but someone must have seen a gun." Several retired senior officers agreed. Col. Ben Mittman of the Air Force, interviewed as he got his regular military buzz cut at the Beachcomber Barber Shop in Oceanside, worried that the young servicemen were being made scapegoats.

"If this thing really happened, they had to radio communication and get the go-ahead," he said. "The frontline grunts these days do not do anything without the commanders knowing, especially something like that."

The Los Angeles Times reported Friday that photographs taken by a Marine intelligence team sent into Haditha showed execution-style killings, including gunshots to the head. As more details about the Haditha deaths incident surface, it has conjured disturbing memories of the My Lai massacre in Vietnam for many former marines and in other circles of war veterans. "I would draw the same parallel," Mr. Alexander said. "The young guys took the heat for the higher-ups there too."

Most of those "young guys," the active-duty marines who are the peers of those under scrutiny in the Haditha deaths, were off base this weekend on a five-day holiday leave.

It is those marines and their leaders who were the focus of other remarks by General Pace in his interview on "Morning Edition."

"We should, in fact, as leaders take on the responsibility to get out and talk to our troops and make sure that they understand that what 99.9 percent of them are doing, which is fighting with honor and courage, is exactly what we expect of them," he said, adding, "Because regardless of where this investigations goes, we want to ensure that our troops understand what's expected of them."

Nation's Honor Requires Full Inquiry Into Haditha Killings (USAT)

USA Today, May 30, 2006

It was a hard thing to have to address on Memorial Day.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, responding to a brewing scandal over an alleged massacre of as many as 24 civilians by Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, pledged that two investigations would get to the bottom of what happened and that appropriate action would be taken.

The investigations are another painful reminder that there are no tidy wars. Young soldiers under tremendous stress don't always act honorably. Those dishonorable actions by a few tarnish the vast majority whose sacrifices and courage were marked Monday in ceremonies and remembrances across the USA.

That is all the more reason to make sure that the Haditha inquiries — into the alleged massacre and a possible coverup — live up to Pace's promise.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a former Marine and outspoken critic of the Iraq war, says the preliminary findings sketch a disturbing sequence: that after a bomb rocked a military convoy in the town Nov. 19 and killed a Marine, other Marines shot and killed unarmed civilians in a taxi and at least two homes.

Witnesses cited by The New York Times Monday say the dead included a 77-year-old man in a wheelchair and a 4-year-old boy in one home, and five children in the other.

Jumping to conclusions is, as Pace said, premature. So is any comparison to Vietnam's My Lai massacre, where hundreds died at the hands of U.S. soldiers.

But one particularly disturbing aspect is that it took reporting by Time magazine in March to reopen a quickly closed Haditha probe. Time challenged official accounts that civilians were killed in a roadside bombing or in a crossfire between insurgents and Marines.

It's understandable that military officials might have little appetite for an unvarnished investigation, which is why Congress also needs to play an active role. The war in Iraq has already damaged the image of America's military — particularly, as President Bush noted last week, the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal.

And amid all the killing, torture and violence in Iraq, the deaths of a dozen or two more Iraqis — fewer, even, than died in bombings Monday — might seem inconsequential. Many Iraqis have reacted to the reports about Haditha with the numb shrugs of those inured to brutality.

But that is not the point. Iraqi insurgents carry out premeditated slaughter of innocents with appalling regularity. The United States should never stoop to that level. It is a measure of a country's moral strength that it can face up to such horror, investigate it thoroughly and punish it appropriately.

Carbomb Kills CBS Crew, Injures Reporter (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, May 30, 2006

Baghdad -- CBS television correspondent Kimberly Dozier and her two-man crew became part of the Memorial Day story they had set out to report when a car bomb exploded Monday beside their patrol in central Baghdad, killing the two British crew members, an American soldier and an Iraqi translator.

Dozier, 39, was critically injured, and six U.S. soldiers from the patrol with which she was traveling also were hurt in the midmorning blast in central Baghdad's Karradah neighborhood, just one of a surge of bombings that ripped across the capital and its surrounding provinces, killing at least 40 people.

CBS named the dead TV journalists as veteran cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and sound man James Brolan, 42. Both based in London and veterans of many wars, they were embedded with Dozier at the time of the attack with soldiers from the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division in Baghdad, according to a statement issued by the network.

Dozier, who has been reporting from Iraq for the past three years, was in critical condition at a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad's Green Zone. She was undergoing her second surgery early Tuesday, a CBS spokeswoman said.

``Doctors are cautiously optimistic about her prognosis," the network statement said Monday.

The CBS team had set out with U.S. soldiers early Monday to gather an eyewitness account of the everyday activities of U.S. and Iraqi troops on this fourth Memorial Day in Iraq since the war began, said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a 4th Brigade spokesman.

``They wanted to know what we did to commemorate Memorial Day," Cheadle said. ``Essentially what we do is continue the mission, because every day is a little bit of a Memorial Day for us."

The three were traveling in an armored Humvee but exited their vehicle when U.S. troops got out to inspect a checkpoint, according to an account posted on the CBS Web site. Just as they disembarked, at about 10:30 a.m., a nearby car packed with explosives detonated, killing the four and setting ablaze one of the Humvees in the convoy.

The military did not name the U.S. soldier killed in the attack, the 2,466th since the war began, according to Defense Department figures.

It was not clear whether the car bomb was intended to hit the U.S. patrol or was just one of the string of bombings across Baghdad on Monday, including three others in Karradah, a Shiite neighborhood that is bombed fairly regularly.

Karradah is one of Baghdad's calmest districts, however, and U.S. soldiers rarely are attacked there, Cheadle said.

``It was an anomaly," he said. ``It isn't indicative of the state of security in Karradah at all, although obviously there are other places that we still need to work on.

``Looking at the damage, I'm not sure it would have made a difference if they had been in their vehicle," he said. ``It was a pretty large explosion.

Monday's two deaths brought to 71 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion, the overwhelming majority of them Iraqis.

The CBS team was the second U.S. television news crew to be struck by a bombing while embedded with American forces this year. In January, ABC ``World News Tonight" co-anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt were seriously injured when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol in Taji, just north of Baghdad.

``This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of CBS News and Sports, said in a statement. ``Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad also paid tribute to the crew.

``These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation," he said. ``That story must and will be told."

The attack serves as a reminder of the perils confronting soldiers and journalists alike whenever they venture out in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, spokesman for the multinational force in Baghdad.

``U.S. soldiers are going out every day and journalists are going out every day to cover them, and there are inherent risks in that," he said. ``The terrorists don't care who they kill or injure."

Withington attributed Monday's wave of bombings to ``terrorists who want to disrupt the formation of Iraq's new government."

DOJ_NMG_0030296

The attacks rolled across Baghdad starting shortly after dawn, targeting civilians and security forces and Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods in eastern and western Baghdad, sending jitters across the city.

Two car bombs killed 17 people in the Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah, and a device planted under a mini-bus just across the river in the Shiite neighborhood of Kadhamiyah killed seven, police said. Three other explosions in Karradah killed at least five people, and a bombing on the eastern edge of the city killed one person traveling in a mini-bus.

In the deadliest single attack, 14 Iraqi civilians employed on a base used by the Iranian opposition group People's Mujahedeen of Iran were killed when a bomb targeted the bus carrying them to work in Khalis, about 50 miles north of Baghdad. Also, police said they found the bodies of 10 men who had been shot in the head and dumped in garbage in the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, a police spokesman said.

The escalation in violence comes as Iraq's new government remains paralyzed by bitter infighting over whom to appoint to head the crucial Interior and Defense Ministries. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had promised he would name the ministers by last weekend, but Sunnis and Shiites still are unable to agree on candidates, meaning the two ministries with responsibility for bringing security to Iraq remain leaderless.

Car Bomb Kills Soldier, 2 CBS News Crew Members (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A car bomb on Monday killed a U.S. soldier and two CBS News crew members, and severely wounded an American correspondent.

On-air reporter Kimberly Dozier, 39, and two British crew members had embedded with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division, which was working its way through central Baghdad. Cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and soundman James Brolan, 42, died at the scene of the attack. An Iraqi contractor also died in the blast, the military said.

The CBS crew was riding through the predominantly Shiite Muslim, middle-class shopping district of Karada, and had stepped down from a Humvee when the car bomb ripped through the vehicles. It was unclear how the bomb was detonated.

The attack came as bloodshed surged across the country Monday. At least 33 people were shot dead or killed in bombings in Baghdad, as an ongoing insurgency raged and the two major Muslim sects continued to swap rounds of attacks and assassinations.

Targets for bombing attacks included the German embassy, an Iraqi police station and a parking garage.

The most deadly attack struck a bus full of day laborers on their way to work at a base belonging to Iranian dissident group Mujahedeen e Khalq. The blast north of Baghdad killed 11 workers and wounded 16 others. Most of the men were farmers and construction workers on the base; they had mixed religious backgrounds.

Another bomb targeting a patrol of Iraqi police in northern Baghdad killed eight people, most of them students from a nearby school. And Sunday night, two British soldiers died after a British patrol north of Basra was struck by a roadside bomb.

After the patrol attack, Dozier was rushed into surgery at a U.S. military hospital in the Iraqi capital. She was in critical condition, and doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis, a statement from CBS said.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of the network's news and sports divisions, said in a statement. "Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public."

McManus said Dozier was undergoing a second operation Monday evening at the military hospital in Balad and would likely be airlifted to a U.S. military base in Germany.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad rushed to the hospital Monday night to pay their condolences to CBS staffers and to monitor Dozier's condition.

Dozier, who had been reporting in Iraq for three years, had returned to Baghdad this week after taking a break to help move her elderly parents, who live in Baltimore, to an assisted living facility, said anchor Bob Schieffer.

"We're just sick to our stomachs about this," he said in an interview. "This is a reminder that this is not a reality show. We see so much of this on television that we tend to look at these things as a movie. But people are getting hurt and killed out there. This brings it home."

Schieffer said he had just spoken to Dozier last week about taking a break from the war zone.

"I was encouraging her to take some assignments where there was less risk," he said. "But she was just determined to go back to Baghdad and see the story through. It's just a heartbreaker."

The attack suffered by the CBS news crew was an eerie echo of the one sustained by ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt five months ago as they were traveling with Iraqi troops north of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0030297

On Monday, Woodruff released a statement saying he was "devastated" by the news.

"I have met both remarkable journalists Kimberly Dozier and Paul Douglas in so many different countries from Israel to Afghanistan," he said. "Their work and intelligence have always impressed me, whenever our paths have crossed. James Brolan and I were embedded together, working very closely on many difficult stories. During the Iraqi invasion in 2003 we spent more than a month on the road with the Marines, and it was often James' wonderful sense of humor that kept us going."

McManus said he had received personal calls and messages from the top executives at the other broadcast networks and cable news channels offering support.

He said he hasn't contemplated whether the network should re-evaluate how it is covering Iraq, but added, "I don't think there are any more precautions that any of us could take that we're not taking. The fact of the matter is that it is so, so dangerous and so unprecedented. It's something that every news organization is grappling with trying to cover the story."

Douglas had worked for CBS News for more than a decade in hot spots such as Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Rwanda and Bosnia. He is survived by his wife of 29 years, Linda, as well as two daughters, Kelly 29, and Joanne 26, and three grandchildren, Charlie , 8, Georgia, 4 , and Kai, 18 months.

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked for the network for a year, in Baghdad and Afghanistan, and was part of the CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club Award for its reporting on the Pakistan earthquake.

Brolan's family released a statement calling him "the best dad, the best husband and the best mate to be with in a tight spot out in the field."

He is survived by his wife, Geri, and his two children; Sam, 17, and Agatha, 12.

Roadside Bomb Kills Two CBS Journalists In Iraq, Injures Third (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Two CBS News crewmen were killed and a correspondent critically hurt in Iraq on Monday when U.S. forces they were traveling with came under attack.

A U.S. soldier and an Iraqi contractor also were killed in the attack, one of eight explosions in Iraq that killed at least 33 people and wounded dozens Monday in a wave of violence.

The CBS News journalists were on patrol in Baghdad when the U.S. troops they were with stopped to inspect an Iraqi army checkpoint, according to a story posted on the CBS News website. The journalists got out of the armored vehicle as a nearby car packed with explosives detonated. Six U.S. soldiers were injured in the attack. The death of CBS cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and sound technician James Brolan, 42, both Britons, brings to 71 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Correspondent Kimberly Dozier, 39, who has served multiple tours in Iraq, underwent surgery in a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad, where doctors were “cautiously optimistic,” CBS said.

CBS News said the three journalists were covering American troops for Memorial Day.

“These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation,” U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said. “That story must and will be told.”

News organizations said the latest attack underscored the risk of reporting in Iraq, but that the danger of the assignment would not stop them from covering the war.

ABC News anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt were injured by shrapnel from a roadside bomb while patrolling with Iraqi soldiers in January. NBC News correspondent David Bloom died from a pulmonary embolism during the invasion in 2003.

Iraq is the “single most dangerous place on earth,” said CBS News President Sean McManus. “This is going to happen again but you just hope and pray that it doesn't happen to someone who works for you.”

Monday's wave of attacks began just after dawn when a roadside bomb killed 10 in Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, the Associated Press reported. A car bomb parked near Baghdad's Sunni Abu Hanifa mosque killed at least nine Iraqi civilians.

Iraq Blast Kills Two On Crew For CBS (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Salih Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 29 -- A car bomb explosion in central Baghdad Monday killed two CBS News crew members, an Iraqi interpreter and a U.S. soldier, and severely wounded the news team's correspondent, in one of a string of attacks that killed dozens of people in Iraq over the course of the day.

DOJ_NMG_0030298

Paul Douglas, a cameraman, and James Brolan, a sound man, died in the blast, CBS News said in a statement. Both men were British citizens based in London. Kimberly Dozier, an American correspondent who has covered the war in Iraq for nearly three years, was taken to a Baghdad hospital for surgery. The network said she was listed in critical condition and that doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis.

U.S. military authorities did not identify the soldier and the interpreter who were killed. Six other soldiers were wounded, the military said in a statement.

The president of CBS News, Sean McManus, said that Dozier was undergoing a second round of surgery in Baghdad and that the network hoped she would be evacuated to Germany as soon as possible. Doctors successfully removed shrapnel from Dozier's head, but her more serious injuries are to her lower body, CBS News correspondent David Martin reported. She had been in Iraq only for a few days on this visit and was in New York last weekend, according to McManus.

The news team had been traveling in a convoy with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division, working on a Memorial Day report. On its Web site, CBS News said they had planned to stay out only a few hours in order to get back to their bureau to edit their report.

The convoy had stopped to inspect an Iraqi army checkpoint when a car bomb blew up nearby. Dozier, 39, Douglas, 48, and Brolan, 42, were outside the convoy's Humvees at the time to film the American soldiers inspecting the checkpoint. The network said it believed they were wearing helmets and body armor.

The three journalists were the latest to become casualties in a conflict that has claimed the lives of 71 reporters, most of them Iraqis, since it began in 2003, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

On Jan. 29, in the most recent incident involving Americans, Bob Woodruff, then co-anchor of the ABC News "World News Tonight," and his cameraman, Doug Vogt, suffered serious wounds when the Iraqi military vehicle in which they were traveling was struck by a roadside bomb. Both men are still recovering.

In an interview, McManus called the attack "horribly sad." Iraq is "the most dangerous place on Earth right now, and we take every precaution," he said. He added that CBS would not pull back on its war coverage. "The reporters have a very strong obligation and passion to cover this story."

"What people need to know about Paul is what an amazing human being he was, as well as a great professional," said Jim Murphy, a former executive producer of the "CBS Evening News" who worked with both Douglas and Dozier. "So many times, I watched him get us out of dangerous situations just with his body language or the right words. He projected this great strength but amazing calm at the same time."

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked with CBS News in Iraq and Afghanistan over the past year. He was part of a CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club Award for its reporting on the 2005 Pakistan earthquake.

Dozier, born in Honolulu, has been a foreign correspondent specializing in the Middle East since the early 1990s and speaks Arabic and Hebrew. She has worked in radio and print -- she was a freelance reporter for The Washington Post in 1994 -- as well as television. She won three American Women in Radio and Television Gracie Awards for her reports on violence in the Middle East, Kosovo and Afghanistan.

"Every time Kimberly left, she wanted to know when she could go back to Iraq," McManus said. "She really lived for this story. She's passionate and brave and committed."

Murphy said that she had probably spent more time in Iraq than any other single American correspondent.

This attack and others Monday underlined the gravity of the problems facing the country's nine-day-old government. As Iraqi politicians continued a long debate over who will head the country's security ministries, more than 40 people died in eight bombings and several shootings, according to police and news reports. Military authorities also reported that two British soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in the city of Basra in southern Iraq on Sunday night.

The bloodiest attack was the bombing of a bus near Khalis, a predominantly Shiite town about 40 miles north of Baghdad in Diyala province. Fifteen people died, according to police and hospital officials. The passengers worked for the People's Mujaheddin Organization of Iran, a group opposed to the Shiite government of Iraq's eastern neighbor.

The explosion ripped through the middle of the bus. One passenger, Ahmed Bilal Thyab, interviewed while recuperating at a nearby hospital from wounds to his head and right arm, said he was in the back when the bomb exploded. "I saw the others die in front of me," Thyab said. "I survived because I wasn't in the middle."

Thyab thought the bus was attacked in Khalis because "most of the people there are Shiites and hate the People's Mujaheddin."

The organization maintained a military wing in Iraq during the government of President Saddam Hussein, which was intensely hostile to Iran during and after the 1980-88 war between the two countries. After the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 ended Hussein's rule, the organization was disarmed and took a lower profile. Shiites dominate Iraq's new government.

DOJ_NMG_0030299

Another bombing, in northern Baghdad's predominantly Shiite Kazimiyah neighborhood, claimed eight lives, an Iraqi army officer said.

Maj. Abbas Khudhaiyer described what happened, in an account confirmed by another witness. A man wearing a brown tracksuit -- and a hidden explosive belt -- placed a box on the front seat of a minibus waiting on a street packed with vendors who sell clothes. A soldier, seeing the suspicious activity, ran toward the man and stopped him.

"Who are you? Why did you drop that box there? What does it have?" the soldier demanded.

"I'm just a passenger and I'm going to ride in the minibus," the man replied. "I'm going to go to Shulah," another neighborhood in Baghdad.

"Show me some identification," the soldier said.

"I don't have any identification," the man said.

The soldier grabbed him by the hand, apparently intending to take him to his officers for questioning, but then the man detonated his explosive belt, which also set off a bomb in the box.

Just before the explosion, Hussein Abdel Ghaffar, a bystander, saw a woman walking hand-in-hand with her 8-year-old boy along the street. After the detonation, the boy was gone. The mother, hysterical, couldn't find him. Ghaffar helped, and found the boy's mutilated body.

"The thing that stayed in my mind, and I will never forget it, is that mother who lost her kid," Ghaffar said. "I was only able to bring her the upper half of his body."

Surging Iraq Attacks Kill Dozens (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A wave of car bombings and shootings plagued Shi'ite and Sunni areas of Iraq yesterday, killing more than three dozen people, including two CBS crew members and a U.S. soldier. The network's correspondent was seriously wounded.

Network correspondent Kimberly Dozier, 39, was critically wounded. CBS said Miss Dozier underwent surgery at a U.S. military hospital in Baghdad. She was in critical condition, but doctors were cautiously optimistic, the network said.

As parliament discussed the nation's disintegrating security, lawmakers pressed for the appointment of defense and interior ministers -- seen as a necessary step toward Iraqi forces assuming more control so U.S.-led troops can begin withdrawing.

At least eight bombings rocked the capital in the worst wave of violence in days. A car bomb exploded as a U.S. convoy patrolled in central Baghdad, killing veteran CBS cameraman Paul Douglas, 48; soundman James Brolan, 42; and an American soldier, U.S. officials said.

The CBS crew was on patrol with the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, when the bomb exploded. The U.S. military said an Iraqi interpreter also was killed and six American soldiers were injured.

There were conflicting reports on whether the car was moving or parked when it detonated.

According to CBS and Iraqi police, the journalists were reporting outside their armored Humvee when the blast occurred just before noon in Tahariyat Square, a mixed area in south-central Baghdad. The blast collapsed the front end of the Humvee.

Dozens of journalists have been injured, killed or kidnapped in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. Before yesterday's attack killed the two Britons, the Committee to Protect Journalists had put the number killed at 69. Of those, nearly three-quarters were Iraqis, the New York-based group has said.

More than 35 other persons were killed nationwide, most of them in Baghdad.

The attacks began just after dawn, with one roadside bomb killing 10 persons and injuring another 12 who worked for an Iranian organization opposed to the Tehran regime, police said.

That bombing targeted a public bus near Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad in Diyala province, an area notorious for such attacks, provincial police said.

All the dead were workers at the Ashraf base of the Mujahedeen Khalq. The group, made up of Iranian dissidents living in Iraq, said the dead were Iraqi workers heading to their camp.

A car bomb parked near Baghdad's main Sunni Abu Hanifa mosque killed at least nine Iraqi civilians and wounded 25, said Saif al-Janabi, director of Noaman hospital. It exploded at noon in north Baghdad's Azamiyah neighborhood and disintegrated the vehicle.

A bomb planted in a parked minivan killed at least seven persons and wounded at least 20 at the entrance to an open-air market selling secondhand clothes in the northern Baghdad suburb of Kazimiyah.

Another parked car bomb exploded near Ibn al-Haitham college in Azamiyah, also in northern Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding at least five -- including four Iraqi soldiers, police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said.

DOJ_NMG_0030300

In other attacks, a roadside bomb killed two police officers and wounded three others in Baghdad's Karradah district, while one man was killed and six were wounded when a bomb hidden in a minivan exploded.

A mortar shell exploded at a Shi'ite mosque in southern Baghdad's Zafraniyah district. Shi'ite militiamen sealed off the area and prevented police from approaching, said Col. al-Mohammedawi.

Also, gunmen in separate incidents killed two police officers in western Baghdad; two police officers, identified as former Ba'athists, in Amarah, 180 miles southeast of Baghdad; and police Brig. Gen. Sadiq Jaafar Salih, director of the national ID card office in Diyala, authorities said.

Iraq's parliament debated the deteriorating security situation in the capital and some of its outlying provinces but did not set up a commission to address the problem because of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's inability to appoint ministers of defense and interior -- two posts that control the various security forces.

2 On CBS Crew Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD — A car bomb on Monday killed a U.S. soldier and two CBS News crew members and severely wounded an American correspondent.

On-air reporter Kimberly Dozier, 39, and two British crew members were traveling with the 4th Brigade Combat Team of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, which was working its way in a convoy through central Baghdad. Cameraman Paul Douglas, 48, and soundman James Brolan, 42, died at the scene of the attack.

The CBS crew was riding through the largely Shiite Muslim, middle-class shopping district of Karada and had stepped down from a Humvee when the car bomb ripped through the vehicles. It was unclear how the bomb was detonated.

The attack came as bloodshed surged across the country Monday. At least 33 people were shot dead or killed in bombings in Baghdad as an insurgency raged and the two major Muslim sects continued to swap rounds of attacks and assassinations.

Targets for bomb attacks included the German Embassy, an Iraqi police station and a parking garage.

The most deadly attack struck a bus full of day laborers on their way to work at a base belonging to the Iranian dissident group Mujahedin Khalq. The blast north of Baghdad killed 11 workers and wounded 16 others. Most of the men were farmers and construction workers on the base; they had mixed religious backgrounds.

Another bomb targeting a patrol of Iraqi police in northern Baghdad killed eight people, most of them students from a nearby school. And Sunday night, two British soldiers died after a British patrol north of the southern city of Basra struck a roadside bomb.

After the Karada attack, Dozier was rushed into surgery at a U.S. military hospital in the Iraqi capital. She was in critical condition, and doctors were "cautiously optimistic" about her prognosis, a statement from CBS said.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, president of the network's news and sports divisions, said in a statement. "Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every single day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public."

McManus said in a phone interview that Dozier was undergoing a second operation Monday evening at the military hospital in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, and would probably be airlifted to a U.S. military base in Germany.

"We're hoping and praying for a full recovery," he said. "She is in the best possible hands and is getting medical attention that is probably better than any hospital in America."

Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad rushed to the hospital Monday night to pay their condolences to CBS staffers and to monitor Dozier's condition.

Dozier, who has been reporting in Iraq for three years, had returned to Baghdad this week after taking a break in Maryland to help her parents move, said anchor Bob Schieffer.

"We're just sick to our stomachs about this," he said in an interview. "This is a reminder that this is not a reality show. We see so much of this on television that we tend to look at these things as a movie. But people are getting hurt and killed out there. This brings it home."

Schieffer said he had just spoken to Dozier last week about taking a break from the war zone. "I was encouraging her to take some assignments where there was less risk," he said. "But she was just determined to go back to Baghdad and see the story through. It's just a heartbreaker."

"This is the story that most of all she wanted to cover," McManus agreed. "She couldn't wait to get back. The amazing thing is how many of our reporters really, really have a need and a desire to report from Iraq. It's an amazing tribute to their dedication and their bravery."

DOJ_NMG_0030301

The attack suffered by the CBS News crew was an eerie echo of the one sustained by ABC anchor Bob Woodruff and cameraman Doug Vogt four months ago as they were traveling with Iraqi troops north of Baghdad.

On Monday, Woodruff released a statement saying he was devastated by the news.

"I have met both remarkable journalists Kimberly Dozier and Paul Douglas in so many different countries from Israel to Afghanistan," he said. "Their work and intelligence have always impressed me, whenever our paths have crossed. James Brolan and I were embedded together, working very closely on many difficult stories. During the Iraqi invasion in 2003 we spent more than a month on the road with the Marines and it was often James' wonderful sense of humor that kept us going."

McManus said he had received personal calls and messages from the top executives at the other broadcast networks and cable news channels offering support.

He said he hadn't contemplated whether the network should reevaluate how it was covering Iraq, but added, "I don't think there are any more precautions that any of us could take that we're not taking. The fact of the matter is that it is so, so dangerous and so unprecedented. It's something that every news organization is grappling with trying to cover the story."

Douglas had worked for CBS News for more than a decade in hot spots such as Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Rwanda and Bosnia-Herzegovina. He is survived by his wife of 29 years, Linda; as well as two daughters, Kelly, 29, and Joanne, 26; and three grandchildren, Charlie, 8, Georgia, 4, and Kai, 18 months.

Brolan was a freelancer who had worked for the network for a year, in Iraq and Afghanistan, and was part of the CBS News team that received a 2006 Overseas Press Club award for its reporting on the Pakistani earthquake.

Brolan's family released a statement calling him "the best dad, the best husband and the best mate to be with in a tight spot out in the field."

After serving in the British army, Brolan ran his own painting and decorating business before getting into TV as a sound recordist, according to his family.

"James had a natural way with people and was always in demand as the person to go with to the world's trouble spots; always putting the locals at ease, winning friends everywhere he went and always putting in his best effort," the statement read.

He is survived by his wife, Geri; and his two children, Sam, 18, and Agatha, 12.

The military had not yet released the name of the U.S. soldier killed in the blast.

With its steady bouts of kidnappings, bombings and shootouts, Iraq has proved a deadly place to practice journalism. Before Monday's attack, the Committee to Protect Journalists had said that at least 69 journalists and 29 support staff members had been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion. The vast majority of the slain reporters have been Iraqi.

"Reporters who are embedding have always had a very realistic understanding of the dangers," said Army Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a senior spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad. "They cover it every day."

Reporters who have been covering the war in Iraq for the past three years have experienced a whittling away of their ability to gather information as the violence continues to spiral. Many have been forced to rely increasingly on Iraqi colleagues and reporters traveling with the military to get an accurate view of everyday life in Iraq.

"You develop coping strategies; you develop a little cocoon — a place you feel safe," Dozier told CNN in 2004. "I still go out and report the story, but I do it in a way that gives minimum danger to me and to the team of people I'm working with. We're still trying to get the story out. I think if we would pull out, that would be a cop-out."

Before reporting from Iraq, Dozier was the chief Middle East correspondent for New York affiliate WCBS-TV in Jerusalem, covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the war in Iraq.

She also served as London bureau chief and chief European correspondent for CBS Radio News.

Among her peers, she has a reputation for kindness, collegiality and a knack for asking incisive questions.

"Kimberly is a very genuine person who wanted to go out and be with the soldiers and understand what they're doing and feeling," Johnson said. "This is exactly why she chose to do this story today."

2 At CBS News Die In Baghdad On Bloody Day (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 29 — On a day of soaring violence in Baghdad, two Britons working as members of a CBS News television crew were killed on Monday and an American correspondent for the network was critically wounded when a military patrol they were accompanying was hit by a roadside bomb.

The police said at least 31 other people were killed in bombings and shootings in one of the worst days of bloodshed in the capital for weeks.

An American soldier and an Iraqi interpreter were also killed in the attack on a joint United States and Iraqi patrol that killed the two CBS crew members, and six other soldiers were wounded, a statement by the American military command said.

DOJ_NMG_0030302

The bombing marked the first time that Western journalists embedded with United States troops have been killed as a direct result of hostile fire since 2003.

CBS News identified the two dead network employees as Paul Douglas, 48, a cameraman, and James Brolan, 42, a soundman. It said that Kimberly Dozier, 39, a correspondent who had worked long periods in CBS's Baghdad bureau in the past three years and had been a correspondent for the network's New York affiliate, sustained serious injuries and underwent emergency surgery at a military hospital in Baghdad. The statement said Ms. Dozier was in critical condition, but that doctors were "cautiously optimistic about her progress."

Later in the day, Ms. Dozier was airlifted by a Black Hawk helicopter to the main American air base in Iraq at Balad, 50 miles north of the capital, a spokesman for the United States Embassy said. Most seriously wounded Americans are airlifted aboard specially equipped transport jets directly from Balad to a military hospital at Landstuhl, Germany, and from there on to hospitals in the United States.

The Iraqi police said the attack that killed the CBS crewmen was only one of a sequence of at least eight bombings which, together with a series of drive-by shootings, killed at least 33 people and wounded dozens of others, a fresh surge in violence that has brought hundreds of deaths in the capital in recent weeks.

The police said 12 Iraqis died and 25 were wounded in a noontime car bombing outside the Abu Hanifa mosque in Adhamiya, a Sunni stronghold in north Baghdad.

They said at least seven others died and 20 were wounded when a bomb planted in a parked minivan exploded at the entrance to an open-air clothes market in Khadhimiya, a mainly Shiite area across the Tigris River from Adhamiya.

At least 25 other people were killed in bombing and shooting attacks elsewhere in the country, including 10 Iraqis working at a camp for members of an exiled Iranian Communist group who died shortly after dawn when a roadside bomb hit their minivan near Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad. Two British soldiers were killed Sunday night when an armored Land Rover hit a roadside bomb in the southern city of Basra. The British deaths brought to nine the number of British troops killed in Iraq this month, one of Britain's highest monthly tolls of the war.

The deaths of the two CBS staffers raised to more than 70 the number of journalists killed in Iraq in the 38 months since the American-led invasion, including at least 47 Iraqis.

Monday's attack marked the second time this year that a United States television network crew embedded with American troops has been hit by a roadside bomb.

On Jan. 29, the co-anchor of the ABC News program "World News Tonight," Bob Woodruff, and a cameraman, Douglas Vogt, were seriously wounded while accompanying a joint United States-Iraqi patrol. ABC has said Mr. Woodruff is still recovering from serious head and neck injuries, and Mr. Vogt has returned to his home in France to convalesce.

The American military command in Baghdad said the CBS journalists were embedded with a unit of the Fourth Infantry Division, responsible for security in wide areas in and around Baghdad, when they were hit by a car bomb.

A CBS spokesman said the journalists were filming for a Memorial Day report on American troops and were outside the armored Humvee in which they were traveling, wearing body armor, when the explosion occurred at about 10:30 a.m. in the middle-class Amina district. The site is about a mile east across the Tigris River from the Green Zone.

The statement by the United States command did not specify whether the blast took the form of a suicide attack or a bomb left in a parked vehicle.

Iraqi employees of The New York Times who visited the scene said the bomb exploded on a busy avenue just south of an intersection known as Basil Building Square, opposite a compound containing two schools. They said the blast left a crater in the road and a carpet of broken glass, and shattered windows in neighboring homes and shops.

"This is a devastating loss for CBS News," Sean McManus, its president, said in a statement issued in New York.

"Kimberly, Paul and James were veterans of war coverage who proved their bravery and dedication every day. They always volunteered for dangerous assignments and were invaluable in our attempt to report the news to the American public." He added: "Our deepest sympathy goes out to the families of Paul and James, and we are hoping and praying for a complete recovery by Kimberly."

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, issued a statement condemning the attack.

"These brave journalists risked their lives to tell the world the story of a courageous people and a proud nation," he said. "The terrorists who committed this evil crime have shown themselves for who they are. They do not want the world to see the truth of what is happening in Iraq, where a determined people are fighting for freedom and liberty."

"That story must and will be told," he said.

Ms. Dozier, who was born in Honolulu and educated at Wellesley College in Massachusetts and the University of Virginia, has spent most of the past 15 years working in Europe, the Middle East and Afghanistan for the CBS radio and television networks. For 19 months in 2002 and 2003, she was the chief Middle East correspondent, based in Jerusalem, for WCBS-TV, the network's New York affiliate. She returned to Baghdad only last week for her latest stint covering the war here.

In the past year, the risks of reporting the war have played a part in the steady reduction of the number of Western journalists based in Baghdad. The main hazard has come not from the bombings that have killed more than half of all American troops but from a rash of kidnappings, including the 82 days that Jill Carroll, an American reporter for The Christian Science Monitor, spent as a hostage of an insurgent group before being released in March.

The surge in attacks in Baghdad on Monday came as the new, four-year government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, which took office 10 days ago, continued to struggle with a step American officials here see as crucial to curbing the violence racking the country: filling the three key security posts in his cabinet, at the Ministries of Interior, Defense and National Security. The positions were left vacant when the Maliki cabinet was sworn in on May 20, with key Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish groups unable to agree on nominees.

The fresh momentum American officials have said the government needs in cracking down on the violence is unlikely to be achieved while jockeying over the security posts continues, American officials have said.

Over the weekend, one American commander said he expected to see the posts filled within two or three days. But an Iraqi official familiar with the negotiations said Monday that Mr. Maliki was considering asking each of the contending groups to submit three names for each vacant post, a process the prime minister's aide said could take another week to complete.

Iraq Is A Deadly Assignment For Journalists (NYT)

By Marc Santora And Bill Carter

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

By some reckonings, the death of two journalists working for CBS News on Monday firmly secured the Iraq war as the deadliest conflict for reporters in modern times.

Since the start of the war in 2003, 71 journalists have been killed in Iraq, a figure that does not even include the more than two dozen members of news media support staff who have also died, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. That number is more than the 63 killed in Vietnam, the 17 killed in Korea, and even the 69 killed in World War II, according to Freedom Forum, a nonpartisan free speech advocacy group.

"It is absolutely striking," said Ann Cooper, the executive director of the Committee to Protect Journalists. While cautioning that the recorded number of journalists killed in past conflicts may be inexact, she said: "We talk to veteran war correspondents who have covered everything going back to Vietnam and through Bosnia. Even those who have seen a number of different wars say they have never seen something like this conflict."

In the latest incident, a veteran cameraman, Paul Douglas, 48, and a soundman, James Brolan, 42, were killed, and a correspondent, Kimberly Dozier, 39, was seriously wounded when the United States Army unit in which they were embedded was attacked.

All three had extensive backgrounds covering wars and each had volunteered to work in Iraq.

They set out Monday morning to do what might seem simple: spend a few hours with soldiers, hoping to give the audience back in America a glimpse of what this holiday was like, far from family barbecues and beach vacations. Ms. Dozier sent a note to her colleagues before leaving, CBS News said, saying she was working on a report about an wounded serviceman who insisted on returning to Iraq.

On this day, their reporting ended less than a mile outside the fortified Green Zone when a car laden with explosives was detonated just as the crew members stepped from their armored vehicle, military officials said.

An American soldier and an Iraqi translator also died, and six more soldiers were wounded in the attack. The condition of the wounded soldiers was not available last night. Ms. Dozier was rushed from the scene to a military hospital in Baghdad, where she underwent an operation, and then was moved to a hospital north of Baghdad for a second operation. When her condition allowed it, she was to be flown to Germany for more care. She suffered extensive wounds to her legs and shrapnel wounds to her head, CBS News reported.

"Terrible is exactly the right word for this day," said Sean McManus, president of CBS News. "The ironic thing of course is that it was Memorial Day. But everyone here is a professional, and we're going to move forward and do our jobs."

Ms. Dozier has reported numerous stories for CBS from Iraq over the past three years. She had been embedded with other units and, like most reporters in Iraq, had endured close calls. "Every time Kimberly has left Iraq she has asked, 'When can I get back in there?' " Mr. McManus said. "She was particularly determined to report on Iraq. This is what really drove her."

Before going to Iraq, Ms. Dozier worked as chief correspondent for WCBS-TV in New York, based in its Middle East bureau in Jerusalem. She has covered news ranging from the hunt for Osama bin Laden to the crises in the Balkans. She was well aware of the risks involved in reporting from Iraq, recalling her frustration with the difficulty of telling the story of ordinary Iraqis during a 2004 interview with CNN.

"The last time I tried to do that — to go to someone's home and sit down with that man and say, 'Are you thinking about leaving Iraq or staying?' — the moment he saw me, blond hair and my two armored vehicles," Ms. Dozier said, "he turned white."

Her colleagues who were killed were equally experienced.

Mr. Douglas, the cameraman, had worked with CBS since the early 1990's. Based in London, he had traveled to some of the most dangerous countries in the world, including Afghanistan, Pakistan, Bosnia and Rwanda. Big and brawny, he is seen in photos released by CBS smiling and playing the ham, posing with flak jacket on, helmet under his arm and a smirk breaking through his goatee. He left behind a wife, two daughters, three grandchildren and his mother.

Mr. Brolan, a former soldier in the British Army, was a freelancer who, during the course of the past year, worked as a soundman for CBS News in Iraq and Afghanistan. Noted for his quick wit, he once made George Clooney laugh, joking about their physical resemblance during an interview, colleagues at CBS News said. Mr. Brolan was part of the CBS team that won an Overseas Press Club Award in 2006 for its coverage of the earthquake in Pakistan. He had a wife and two teenage children.

CBS, like other major news organizations, has been struggling to cover the war while providing security for its employees, including their Iraqi employees, who often go places Westerners cannot.

Still, it is Iraqi journalists who have been most at risk.

Just this month, three Iraqi reporters were killed in a two-week period, according to Reporters Without Borders. More often than not, no one is ever brought to justice for killing journalists, fostering a climate of impunity, the group said on its Web site.

In addition to those killed, at least 42 journalists have been kidnapped, according to the group.

Even the seeming security of being with the American military carries substantial risk, as it did in January, when the ABC anchorman Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt, a cameraman, suffered severe injuries in a roadside bombing in Iraq.

The death of the CBS journalists was the first time since 2003 that reporters embedded with the American military had died as a direct result of hostile fire.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, the director of the press center for the multinational force in Baghdad, is currently responsible for embedding reporters. He said the military had not changed its policy in any significant way since the start of the war, leaving the final decision to commanders on the ground.

The CBS crew, by all accounts, was wearing the standard protective gear.

"I think Kimberly just saw this as an opportunity to be on the ground with the troops on Memorial Day," he said, "to hear their thoughts, to see what they see."

U.S. Will Reinforce Troops In West Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, May 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 29 -- The U.S. military said Monday it was deploying the main reserve fighting force for Iraq, a full 3,500-member armored brigade, as emergency reinforcements for the embattled western province of Anbar, where a surge of violence linked to the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq has severely damaged efforts to turn Sunni Arab tribal leaders against the insurgency.

The insurgents have assassinated 11 tribal leaders in the Ramadi area since the end of last year, when Sunni sheiks in the city began open cooperation with the U.S. military. That alliance was heralded by U.S. commanders as a sign of a major split between Sunni insurgents and the larger Sunni community of western Iraq.

The insurgent attacks since then have all but frozen the cooperation between Sunni tribal leaders and U.S. forces in Ramadi, local leaders say.

Disclosure of the plan came on a day when insurgent bombings and other attacks killed more than 40 people around the country, including two members of a CBS News team. The team's correspondent, Iraq veteran Kimberly Dozier, was wounded and listed in critical condition. [Details, A9.]

Last week, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad conceded, in answer to a question about Ramadi in an interview with CNN, that parts of Anbar were under insurgent control. Ramadi is the capital of the overwhelmingly Sunni province. The difficulties facing stretched-thin U.S. Marines in Ramadi suggest the continuing obstacles to a reduction of American forces in Iraq.

"We hope to get rid of al-Qaeda, which is a huge burden on the city. Unfortunately, Zarqawi's fist is stronger than the Americans'," said one Sunni sheik, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of insurgent retaliation. He was referring to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, an umbrella group for many of the foreign and local resistance fighters in Iraq. Local Sunni leaders often insist that the most violent insurgent attacks are by foreign fighters, not Iraqi Sunnis.

In Ramadi, "Zarqawi is the one who is in control," the sheik said, speaking to a Washington Post special correspondent in Ramadi. "He kills anyone who goes in and out of the U.S. base. We have stopped meetings with the Americans, because, frankly speaking, we have lost confidence in the U.S. side, as they can't protect us."

Another sheik, Bashir Abdul Qadir al-Kubaisi of the Kubaisat tribe in Ramadi, expressed similar views. "Today, there is no tribal sheik or a citizen who dares to go to the city hall or the U.S. base, because Zarqawi issued a statement ordering his men to kill anyone seen leaving the base or city hall," he said.

"We are very upset. But being upset is better than mourning the death of a sheik or tribal leader," Kubaisi said. "Zarqawi has imposed himself on us. We started thinking of appeasing Zarqawi and his group, because rejecting them means death."

Gen. George W. Casey, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, has called up the 2nd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, the main standby reserve force for the roughly 130,000 American troops in Iraq, Maj. Todd Breasseale, a Marine spokesman in Baghdad, confirmed.

The call-up leaves a Marine Expeditionary Unit, which typically includes one combat infantry battalion and air and logistical support, in Kuwait as the only American reserve in the Iraqi theater, a U.S. Central Command spokesman said.

CNN reported last week that as many as two of the brigade's three battalions were headed to Ramadi. U.S. military officials would not comment then, citing security of any ongoing troop movements.

Breasseale confirmed Monday that the full armored brigade is headed to Anbar, where both U.S. Marines and many local tribal leaders -- particularly in Ramadi -- have appealed for more U.S. troops.

"Enough is never enough" when it comes to commanders on the ground wanting more troops, Breasseale said. "It might be when these guys get into position they might be in a better position to provide the force structure on the ground that would reenergize the sheiks to begin their work."

Although Anbar province is heavily Sunni, many local residents have grown weary of the presence of the foreign fighters who joined the Sunni insurgents. They have tired of the violent control the fighter groups wield over cities and towns, and of the U.S. attacks the insurgents draw.

Scores of local Sunni tribal leaders turned out for a groundbreaking meeting with U.S. Marine officers in Ramadi in November. Robed sheiks and Marine officers in camouflage faced each other in a town hall, ignoring mortar rounds that insurgents lobbed at the meeting, to start talking about the first major, open cooperation between Ramadi's sheiks and U.S. forces.

But when U.S. and Iraqi forces held the first local recruiting drive for local Sunni young men in January, bombs killed more than 60 of the Sunni tribal enlistees and others. The local residents said the bombs were set by Zarqawi's group.

The assassinations of the tribal leaders then mounted, in what was seen as a clear warning to them not to cooperate with U.S. forces. Violence surged in Ramadi in April and May. In many weeks, Marines in Ramadi have accounted for one-third to half of all American combat deaths in Iraq. U.S. forces say scores of insurgents have been killed in the same period; no full tally of the civilian toll is known.

U.S. forces have called in repeated strikes by air and by artillery on the heart of Ramadi. Marines defend a five-block area of downtown that holds the local government, now a sniper's alley where U.S. forces move at a run to elude insurgent guns.

Marines have temporarily suspended new embedding of journalists in Ramadi. Time magazine, U.S. News & World Report and the Associated Press, all with embedded reporters already in Ramadi last week, quoted both officers and the enlisted Marines at sandbag firing positions as saying that Ramadi had to have reinforcements to do more than fight insurgents to a draw around the town hall. Time quoted officers as estimating it would take three brigades, up from one.

Marine officers on the ground have been open for more than a year now about needing more troops in Anbar, whose Sunni population, remoteness and comparative lawlessness have made it a stronghold for the insurgency. Anbar borders Syria, a conduit for some of the weapons, money and fighters.

In Ramadi, people describe themselves as under siege. The fighters are moving to enforce the strictest form of Islam on the city, requiring head scarves for women and banning shorts and jeans for men, residents said.

Insurgent groups, calling themselves "Promoting Virtue and Banning Vice" regiments, have threatened households that have Internet service and warned that they will monitor rooftops for satellite dishes turned toward European satellites, said Imad Mohammed, a resident.

"Is it possible that the U.S. Marines are able to control only the government buildings, while al-Qaeda is walking freely in the streets and in the buildings with no one to deter it?" Mohammed asked. "Until the Arab fighters start to interfere with the daily, smallest and personal details of our lives?"

Residents say basic services have fallen, with electricity, water and schooling interrupted and the university closed for long periods. The imported Shiite police force, they say, has collapsed, and many doctors, professors and other professionals are fleeing.

"The city has gone back to the 14th century, if not further," said Akram Fadhil, a 40-year-old man with seven children and no job.

Rumors routinely circulate of a Fallujah-style clearing operation in Ramadi. Residents say they both hope for it and fear it. The November 2004 operation in Fallujah, a largely Sunni Arab city about 35 miles west of Baghdad, involved a major deployment of troops and sometimes intense fighting with insurgents.

"The city has become an unburnable hell," said Abdul Salam Ahmed al-Rawi, owner of a now-shuttered ice cream shop in Ramadi.

"We hope this will end soon, and that Americans will clean the city," Rawi said early last week. "But first they have to change the troops here now, and bring in more, better troops, just like a year and a half ago in Fallujah."

"For I expect if these troops were given the orders to launch a military campaign, many civilians will fall," Rawi said. "The Marines in Ramadi now are considering the whole situation as a matter of a challenge, or revenge, because of the daily strikes they get. It makes them put civilians and the al-Qaeda men all in one category."

Number Of Brigades May Fall, But Troops To Stay At 133,000 (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

U.S. troop levels in Iraq will likely stay around the 133,000 mark in the coming months even if an Army brigade or two is cut from the current number of 15 total combat brigades, defense officials say.

The officials said Army Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, may decide he does not need a replacement brigade for one going home. Yet the overall force level will likely stay the same because new training teams are entering the country to embed with units of the Iraq Security Force (ISF).

Gen. Casey is also periodically tapping an Army "call-forward" brigade of about 4,000 soldiers in Kuwait for periodic duty in Iraq, most recently in Baghdad. Such moves, when coupled with the influx of trainers, also increases the overall force level.

Still, Pentagon planners hope to see the actual combat brigade numbers decrease from 15 in the coming months. Even though the force level would remain the same, such a trade-off means fewer American troops are in direct combat and more are in the training mission.

"The broad message is the numbers are going to fluctuate even if the brigade numbers come down," one senior official said. "Brigades will likely continue to come down, but it won't mean all the numbers will come down. The bottom line is fewer brigades means less direct combat for American troops."

The 15 combat brigades are down from 20 during Iraq's elections last year, and about 6,000 U.S. military personnel embedded with Iraqi units.

The big question is whether Gen. Casey sometime this summer will recommend to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and President Bush a larger troop reduction, which could begin this fall. Officials said Gen. Casey had not made that recommendation as of last weekend.

The command has been waiting for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to name a unity government before recommending any drawdowns. That task is now nearly completed. But the new government is not yet fully able to deal with the security issues because the key posts of defense and interior ministries remain vacant.

Gen. Casey's planning staff constantly reviews force levels. They look at the timetable for when Army and Marine units are due to leave to see whether that is an appropriate time to replace it.

"Casey is mindful of when units are supposed to rotate in," said the official. The source said Gen. Casey might conclude this summer that "I don't think we need to send a replacement in right away."

That's just what happened in April, when the general decided to put on hold a brigade in Germany that was preparing to come to Iraq.

The withdrawal plan is contingent on the 260,000-strong ISF taking over more counterinsurgency missions.

A new test awaits the emerging force: the restive town of Ramadi in Anbar province, which is not fully in control of the coalition and is becoming a new safe haven for terrorists.

The U.S. command has decided it will be the ISF, not U.S. forces, who will lead a campaign to retake the city.

"It isn't a situation that we can resolve. ... The Iraqis have got to take the lead in solving this one," said Brig. Gen. Carter Ham, the Pentagon's deputy director for regional operations.

U.S. Lawmakers Urge Iraqis To Agree On Key Security Posts (AP)

By Kim Gamel

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Democratic and Republican legislators urged the nascent Iraqi government to reach agreement on key security posts and respect human rights Monday as they made a Memorial Day visit to U.S. troops in Baghdad.

A bipartisan delegation including Rep. Robin Hayes, R-N.C., had lunch with troops at the U.S. Embassy in the heavily fortified Green Zone before a planned meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, said the goal was "to ensure a strong, independent and sovereign Iraq that can stand on its own two feet and protect its people."

"It is very important for the two remaining ministries to be appointed. That will make a very important statement to the American people," she added.

Iraq's parliament debated the deteriorating security situation in the capital and some of its outlying provinces, but failed to set up a commission to deal with the problem because of al-Maliki's failure to appoint ministers of defense and interior.

Hayes, whose district includes Fort Bragg, home of the Army's Special Operations Command, said he would encourage the prime minister to promote unity among the country's myriad religious and ethnic groups.

"This is an Iraqi government ... everyone would like for the process to happen immediately and we certainly want them to be successful. You can't rush the process too quickly," he said. "The new government promoting unity ... is how security will be established."

The legislators also stressed the importance of respecting human rights amid a wave of sectarian killings after the February bombing of a Shiite shrine.

"They lived under a totalitarian regime for many years ... and any government that is formed here, if it is going to succeed, they're going to have to respect all Iraqis," Republican Rep. Jeff Miller of Florida.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., welcomed an investigation into allegations that Marines shot and killed unarmed civilians in the western city of Haditha after a bomb rocked a military convoy on Nov. 19, killing a Marine.

"We are continuing to watch the investigation unfold," she said. "I think that is a big difference with the U.S. and most of the coalition forces is that we do thorough investigations and if somebody is found guilty of a violation that they are held accountable."

The delegation traveled to Iraq after visiting a training center for Iraqi forces in Amman, Jordan. They also met with Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, as well as the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Anti-U.S. Rioting Erupts In Kabul; At Least 14 Dead (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 30, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, May 29 — A deadly traffic accident caused by a United States military convoy quickly touched off a full-blown antiAmerican riot on Monday that raged across much of the Afghan capital, leaving at least 14 people dead and scores injured.

Witnesses said American soldiers fired on Afghans throwing stones at them after the crash, though the United States military said only that warning shots had been fired in the air.

But the crash tapped into a latent resentment of the American military presence here, and violence radiated quickly through the city as rumors circulated that the crash might have been deliberate. Gunfire rang out as Afghan police officers and army soldiers tried to contain rioters who rampaged through the streets for about six hours, burning and looting a dozen offices, cars and police posts. By the end of the day at least 14 people were dead and more than 90 injured, hospital officials said. It was the bloodiest day in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in late 2001.

The Interior Ministry announced a nighttime curfew for the city for the first time in four years, from 10 p.m. until 4 a.m., and President Hamid Karzai called for calm on national television. "This country has been destroyed for years by rioters," he said, "and they are using this traffic incident as an excuse."

The speed and magnitude of the unrest was such that hundreds of police officers and soldiers struggled to contain the violence. The Afghan government and the American military authority issued statements promising full investigations of the accident.

It became clear the American military and the Afghan police and army had used their weapons to try to disperse the crowds. Scores of people were treated in hospitals for gunshot wounds.

A 7-year-old boy was among the dead, and two more schoolchildren were badly wounded, said Dr. Amin, the duty doctor at Khair Khana Hospital in the northern part of Kabul, who like many Afghans uses only one name. Four people died at the hospital, he said, and 60 wounded people were given first aid before being transferred to other hospitals.

Although the sudden explosion of violence may have been a reaction to the five deaths in the crash, it is a sign that Afghans are losing patience with the government and the foreign military presence in Afghanistan, residents said.

Ali Seraj, a businessman and a descendant of the Afghan royal family, contended that the American military showed a careless attitude toward human life that was becoming a growing problem, whether it was the bombing of villages in counterinsurgency activities in southern Afghanistan or car accidents in the capital.

"This type of attitude has created a great deal of mistrust and hatred," he said.

Just last week, President Karzai ordered an investigation of an American airstrike on a village near Kandahar in the south that killed at least 35 civilians. In another episode, the United States military said last month that it would investigate the killings of seven members of a family in an airstrike in Kunar Province in the east during an operation against insurgents.

On Monday, clashes began early in the morning when a truck leading an American military convoy smashed into 12 cars in rush-hour traffic as it went down a long hill from the Khair Khana pass just north of Kabul. Five civilians were killed and more injured in the multiple crash, a statement from Mr. Karzai's office said.

The United States military said in a statement, "A large cargo truck apparently experienced a mechanical failure." The statement continued, "This was a tragic incident, and we deeply regret any deaths or injuries resulting from this incident."

An angry crowd gathered and began stoning the American convoy, and the Afghan police when they arrived. "There are indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd," the United States military statement said. "We will determine the facts regarding the incident and cooperate fully with Afghan authorities."

Demonstrators and townspeople said the American troops had fired into the crowd as people gathered and started throwing stones.

One demonstrator, called Ahmadullah, was still shouting, "Death to Karzai!" and "Death to America!" hours after the initial event.

Demonstrators and townspeople also asserted that the American truck driver had deliberately rammed vehicles as he led the convoy from Bagram Air Base through outlying villages and then into the city. "The Americans came all the way from Bagram to Kabul and killed about 20 people along the way," said Fraidoon, a youth who was among the demonstrators.

He and other bystanders said up to a dozen demonstrators had been shot by guards as they tried to break into a British security company's compound in a downtown area.

Other protesters tried to reach the United States Embassy across town but were prevented by armed blockades of Afghan police officers and soldiers. Others attacked buildings in the commercial center of the city, and some marched on Parliament in the city's southwest, attacking a television company and pizzeria nearby.

By late afternoon the crowds had dispersed, leaving people to count the casualties and put out fires. The offices of the aid organization CARE International and the French nongovernmental organization known by the acronym Acted, a pizzeria, a Chinese guesthouse and a post office were among the buildings that were gutted by fire and ransacked.

Ground-floor windows of the newly opened Serena Hotel, Kabul's first five-star hotel, were smashed, and traffic police officers sat outside burnt roadside police posts. NATO troops evacuated diplomats and staff members from a European Commission compound downtown.

Mr. Karzai blamed opportunists and rioters for the violence. "Wherever you face these elements, do not let them destroy our home once again," he said.

In a sign of the political implications the event has for the government, the president promised to investigate the circumstances of the crash and to see that the Americans involved were punished if found to be guilty. He added that he had received a visit Monday afternoon from the United States ambassador, who had expressed his "deep regrets."

The demonstrators — overwhelmingly young men, even schoolchildren, carrying sticks and stones — were angry at the reports of deaths, but some also expressed frustration with the government, the police and the generally poor standard of living.

"Most of the demonstrators are people who have lost their jobs, and the government cannot provide the people with the basic necessities," said Mukhtar Ziayee, 33, a real estate salesman. "The people are disappointed."

But others were armed and intent on violence and robbery, residents said. Mohammed Arif Safajoy, the owner of the pizzeria that was attacked, estimated the rioters had done $50,000 damage there.

"This was just a demonstration in name," he said. "They were looters, these people who came to my restaurant." Among them were students from a nearby high school, and they carried off electric fans, dishes and antique ornaments, he said.

Riots Breach Kabul 'Island' (CSM)

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Hundreds of demonstrators rampaged through the Afghan capital Monday, torching foreign aid agencies and looting businesses in a wave of violence that killed at least 14 people and wounded another 142.

The riots brought the unrest, which has racked southern Afghanistan in recent months, within the gates of Kabul - hitherto seen as an island of stability.

The protest was sparked early Monday when a US military convoy was involved in a traffic accident with a cargo truck that had experienced a mechanical failure. The resulting 12-car pileup killed at least one person, the US military said in a statement. US soldiers fired warning shots over the top of the crowd that had gathered around the accident. However, it remains unclear whether the five people who were killed at the scene were shot by the US military or by Afghan police who arrived to control the crowds.

A survey of the city's hospitals found that at least 11 more people were killed over the course of the day's rioting, which caused millions of dollars of damage and left a trail of destruction along the route the protesters traveled.

With violence in southern Afghanistan at its worst levels since the fall of the Taliban, the Kabul riots reflect a growing nationwide resentment about the foreign military presence in the country and the glacial pace of reconstruction, say analysts and residents.

"There is a large reservoir of discontent and people are now just looking for a reason to vent their rage," says a Western diplomat who requested anonymity.

Demonstrators set the offices of CARE and other foreign aid agencies ablaze, but also torched a Chinese brothel and Afghan businesses as the demonstrations escalated into looting.

"Many people hate the NGOs [nongovernmental organizations] because they see all this money coming into the country and they have not been able to get jobs. They were waiting for a day like today," says Ehsan, an Afghan security officer.

The road accident Monday morning follows a bloody two weeks of fighting around the country that has left nearly 400 people dead. Around 30 civiliarns were killed in an airstrike in southern Afghanistan last week during a battle with the Taliban, stoking public resentment already inflamed by the way Coalition forces drive around the country.

"The US use force in the street with their cars. When Americans are in a hurry they cut people off and they don't care how they drive. We all have to wait in line behind them," says an Afghan UN employee who asked to remain anonymous. Coalition forces often move quickly as a safety precaution.

It remains unclear whether the riots were orchestrated by Islamic militants or were a spontaneous eruption of unrest.

"There was organization behind the demonstrations. They have literally been biding their time and waiting for a catalyst from Coalition forces," says a Western security source, who added that demonstrators were carrying maps with a marching route already marked. The protesters started in the north of Kabul, went through the center of the city, passed by the major hotels, the US Embassy, and the main NATO base, and ended up in the western part of the city. There were other spontaneous demonstrations around the capital.

However, diplomats and many eyewitnesses said the demonstrations have been used by criminals as a window of opportunity for looting and theft.

"Those people on the outskirts of Kabul have always been bandits and they are still thieves. They were waiting for a chance to take stuff from houses," says Rauf, a shopkeeper along the protesters' route who goes by one name.

As the demonstrations subsided, police resumed patrols but were hassling any groups of men they saw standing in the open, punching people with no explanation and shoving them into cars. Questions will now be asked about why the police were unable to contain the riots and protect businesses and aid agencies. The riots lasted a full eight hours.

Kabul Riot Targets Aid Agencies (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

About 1,000 demonstrators rampaged through the Afghan capital on Monday, setting alight the offices of foreign aid agencies and looting businesses in a wave of violence that killed at least 16 people and injured another 142.

The unrest was the worst to sweep through Kabul since 2001 and reflects growing resentment towards the foreign military presence in the country and the slow pace of reconstruction. The US has 23,000 troops and Nato a force of about 9,000 in Afghanistan.

The protest was triggered by a collision between a US military convoy and a cargo truck that caused a 12-car pile-up, the US military said in a statement.

A crowd quickly swelled around the accident in the northern Shomali district of Kabul and turned hostile, surrounding the US vehicles.

Shots were then fired either by the US military or by Afghan police who had arrived on the scene.

DOJ_NMG_0030310

"There are indications that at least one coalition military vehicle fired warning shots over the crowd," Colonel Thomas Collins, US military spokesman, said, adding that an investigation had begun.

Five people were killed during the accident and the shooting which followed, said a statement from the Afghan presidency.

A survey of Kabul's hospitals found that at least 11 more people were killed during the day's rioting. Protesters left a trail of destruction, burning down almost every police guard post they came across. Demonstrators set the offices of CARE and other foreign aid agencies ablaze, and also set civilian businesses on fire.

A group of European Union diplomats was escorted to safety by British Royal Marines after they had requested evacuation from their compound in central Kabul.

The main protest, composed mostly of young men, spawned smaller riots at other locations across the capital. "There is a large reservoir of discontent and people are now just looking for a reason to vent their rage," said one western diplomat.

The road accident followed an air strike by the US during a battle with the Taliban in southern Afghanistan last week, in which about 30 civilians were killed.

Opinion remains divided over whether the disturbance was orchestrated by Islamic militants or was a spontaneous eruption.

"The riots were organised," said a western security source working with Afghan police. "They have been waiting for a catalyst from the coalition forces and biding their time."

He added that he had seen demonstrators carrying maps with a route drawn out. "They are after martyrdom. They are calling the people who got killed in the accident martyrs," he said.

However, diplomats and eyewitnesses said the demonstrations had been used by criminals as an opportunity for looting and theft.

"They were thieves. They were waiting for a small opportunity to steal and loot from the houses," said Jan Ali, a 50-year-old shopkeeper in downtown Kabul.

As the streets of Kabul grew calmer, police started to resume control and were harassing groups of men standing in the open.

An Afghan reporter said: "Soldiers are picking up groups of people in the street, punching people with no explanation and shoving them in cars."

Traffic Accident Sparks Kabul Riots (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 30, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Violent anti-foreigner protests raged across the capital yesterday after a U.S. military truck crashed into traffic, touching off the worst rioting since the Taliban's ouster in 2001. At least eight persons died and 107 were injured before Kabul's streets calmed.

Chanting "Death to America," rioters stoned the U.S. convoy involved in the accident, then headed to the center of town, ransacking offices of international aid groups and searching for foreigners in a display of rising resentment over civilian deaths in the war against insurgents.

Gunfire, at times intense, rang out across Kabul as hundreds of young men looted shops and set fire to police cars and station houses. Some people said U.S. and Afghan troops fired on the crowds.

The U.S.-backed Afghan government decreed a nighttime curfew, and the city quieted before sunset. Yousuf Stanizai, an Interior Ministry spokesman, warned that anyone found outside between 10 p.m and 4 a.m. would suffer "serious measures."

President Hamid Karzai went on television yesterday to decry the outbursts, branding the rioters as troublemakers who should be resisted and linking their violence to the long years of conflict that wrecked Afghanistan.

"We will recognize as the enemy of Afghanistan these people who do these things," Mr. Karzai said. "You should stand up against these agitators and not let them to destroy our country again."

Patience with the 23,000 U.S. soldiers and other foreign troops in Afghanistan is fraying amid recent civilian deaths, including at least 16 persons killed by an air strike targeting Taliban fighters in a village last week.

The civilian deaths have come during some of the fiercest fighting since a U.S.-led coalition drove the Taliban religious militia from power at the end of 2001, after the regime refused to hand over terror leader Osama bin Laden and close al Qaeda camps after the September 11 attacks.

Much of the bloodshed is in the south, where officials reported a battle yesterday killed six militants and wounded five Canadian soldiers. Elsewhere, warplanes of the U.S.-led coalition bombed a suspected Taliban meeting late Sunday and dozens of militants were reported killed, Afghan authorities said.

Although most Afghans support the presence of foreign troops to stabilize a country devastated by a quarter century of war and civil conflict, many also harbor resentment at the outsiders.

Those feelings have surfaced with increasing regularity in the past year, during violent protests over accusations that the Koran was desecrated at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the publication in European newspapers of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad.

"We don't want Americans in our country. They don't care about poor people. They killed innocent people today, and this is not the first time," said Abdul Shakoor, a 28-year-old who joined in the protests after yesterday's traffic accident. "They do it all the time, and in the end, they say it was a mistake. It's not acceptable to us anymore."

The U.S. military expressed regret for the crash, which it said occurred when a mechanical malfunction sent a large cargo truck careening into about a dozen vehicles at an intersection. The military was investigating the incident.

The U.S.-led coalition said at least one person was killed and six injured in the crash, while Afghan authorities gave higher but differing tolls. A statement from Mr. Karzai's office said five died in the accident. Police said three were killed and 16 were injured.

"This was a tragic incident, and we deeply regret any deaths or injuries resulting from this incident," a U.S. military spokesman, Col. Thomas Collins, said.

Kabul Police Chief Sher Shah Usafi said another person was killed when U.S. troops fired into a crowd of stone-throwing protesters soon after the crash. U.S. military officials said they couldn't confirm that.

Abdullah Fahim, a Health Ministry spokesman, said eight bodies were delivered to hospitals in Kabul and 107 Afghans were treated for injuries. He had no details on how the casualties occurred, and it wasn't clear whether the toll included people from the traffic accident.

General: Desertions Plague Afghan Army (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, May 29, 2006

Desertions from Afghanistan's U.S.-allied army have dropped sharply, but more than 10 percent of the troops still go AWOL, a U.S. general said Monday.

Maj. Gen. Robert Durbin, who heads the effort to train Afghan soldiers and police, said a focus on replacing unfit commanders has cut desertion rates from their peak a few months ago, when almost a quarter of all Afghan troops absconded for varying periods.

"Where you have higher AWOL rates is where you have weaker leaders," Durbin told The Associated Press during a visit to Dubai. "We're trying to trade out those weaker leaders."

More than 2,500 Afghan soldiers are still absent without leave. The army has a total of 35,000 forces, including those in basic training.

In January, a top-level committee headed by Afghan Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak began enforcing a plan to cut desertions by replacing commanders whose units suffered high AWOL rates and by improving food and living conditions.

U.S. and Afghan officials have said soldiers desert for several reasons, including a reluctance to fight alongside foreigners against countrymen and a need to earn money for families in remote villages.

The desertion rate dropped from as high as 25 percent in January to about 13 percent now, Durbin said. The goal, he said, is to cut desertions to below 10 percent.

"Perhaps that is alarming by international standards," said Durbin, 52, of Connellsville, Pa.

But, he said, Afghan fighters traditionally have joined militias that permitted long periods of leave. Many return after unexplained disappearances, and those who do not are scrubbed from active-duty rosters.

Durbin compared the concept to American militiamen who returned home at harvest time during the Revolutionary War.

"That behavior wasn't looked down upon," Durbin said. "But that's different from what you have in a professional force."

Afghan army recruiters employing pressure tactics — including reporting deserters to religious and community leaders — have persuaded 1,120 deserters to return to their bases, Durbin said.

The U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, said last week during a visit near Kabul that the Afghan army had two tasks.

"One is the fight. The second is to be an enduring symbol for the people of Afghanistan of national unity," he said.

But that army will require U.S. and NATO support for years to come, said Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"The numbers still remain very, very low relative to the size of the country and size of the mission," Cordesman said. "They're simply too small to deal with Afghanistan's security problems."

DOJ_NMG_0030312

Durbin, who took command of the training mission in December, said Afghan government troops were taking far fewer casualties than their adversaries — former Taliban militias and opium traffickers — in heavy fighting in the south.

More than 350 people, mostly anti-government rebels, have died in less than two weeks of heavy fighting, according to Afghan and coalition figures. U.S. airstrikes have killed many of them. A May 21 airstrike killed 16 civilians, U.S. and Afghan figures show.

Durbin said the heavy fighting in the south is related to Afghan security forces' efforts to assert control in a region outside the government's orbit.

"In my mind it's a sign of progress but, unfortunately, it will result in casualties on both sides," Durbin said.

Neo-cons Question Bush's Democratisation Strategy (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, May 30, 2006

President George W. Bush has likened the "war on terrorism" to the cold war against communism.

Addressing military cadets graduating from West Point, Mr Bush reaffirmed at the weekend that the US "will not rest until the promise of liberty reaches every people in every nation".

But as the US struggles to assert itself on the international stage, the president's most radical supporters now dismiss this as mere rhetoric, and traditional conservatives are questioning the wisdom of a democratisation strategy that has brought unpleasant consequences in the Middle East.

Administration officials speak privately of a sense of fatigue over the worsening crisis in Iraq that has drained energy from other important policy issues. Senior officials are leaving – not so unusual in a second term, but still giving the sense of a sinking ship run in some quarters by relatively inexperienced crew.

Neo-conservative commentators at the American Enterprise Institute wrote last week what amounted to an obituary of the Bush freedom doctrine.

"Bush killed his own doctrine," they said, describing the final blow as the resumption of diplomatic relations with Libya. This betrayal of Libyan democracy activists, they said, came after the US watched Egypt abrogate elections, ignored the collapse of the "Cedar Revolution" in Lebanon, abandoned imprisoned Chinese dissidents and started considering a peace treaty with Stalinist North Korea.

The neo-conservatives offered no explanation for desertion of the doctrine, other than a desire to make quick but transitory short-term gains. "The president continues to believe his own preaching, but his administration has become incapable of making the hard choices those beliefs require," they wrote.

But the ranks of the neo-conservatives are also being depleted. In his new book, America at the Crossroads, Francis Fukuyama, perhaps the movement's most outstanding intellectual force, confirms his defection from the brand concepts of "pre-emption, regime change, unilateralism and benevolent hegemony as put into practice by the Bush administration".

"It seems to me better to abandon the label and articulate an altogether distinct foreign policy position," he writes.

Advisers to the White House say it would be premature, however, to write off the doctrine of pre-emption, which was restated in the National Security Strategy released in March. But on Iran, for example, they believe the Bush administration is moving towards a cold war-style strategy of containment and deterrence with as broad an international coalition as possible.

Graham Fuller, former diplomat and intelligence officer, suggests the US is suffering from "strategic fatigue" brought on by "imperial over-reach".

"The administration's bark is minimised, and much of the bite seems gone," he writes in the Nixon Center's National Interest journal. "Has superpower fatigue set in? Clearly so, to judge by the administration's own dwindling energy and its sober acknowledgment that changing the face of the world is a lot tougher than it had hoped."

Short-term economic costs of the empire have been bearable, says Mr Fuller, but long-term indicators show it is not sustainable – massive domestic debt, growing trade imbalances, an extraordinary gap in wealth between rich and poor Americans, the growing outsourcing of jobs.

More immediately, the unprecedented unilateral character of the US exercise of global power has proved its undoing.

Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, has tried to redress this in Mr Bush's second term, but key allies – Britain's Tony Blair, for example – are also suffering from weakened credibility.

In contrast, Russia, which Mr Bush saw as a declining power when he came to office in 2001, is asserting itself on the international stage. So is China.

Neither wants to declare itself explicitly at odds with the US, but they share a common agenda and ability to stymie Washington's will. This is seen in their policies towards Iran, North Korea, Syria, the new Palestinian government led by Hamas, and Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0030313

"In the last few years, diverse countries have deployed a multiplicity of strategies and tactics designed to weaken, divert, complicate, limit, delay or block the Bush agenda through a death by a thousand cuts," says Mr Fuller.

Even some traditional Republicans are challenging the concept that the global "war on terror" is the paramount issue for generations to come.

Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate's powerful foreign relations committee, suggested that "there are a good many who would feel that the possibilities for devastation of countries, including our own, may come much more from our myopia in terms of energy policy than our ability to track down the last of the al-Qaeda cells".

Robert Jervis, professor of international politics at Columbia University, argues in the Washington Quarterly that the US system does not have the commitment to sustain the prolonged efforts required by Mr Bush's "transformationalist" agenda.www.ft.com/us

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy's Lawyer Says Lay Strategy Was Wrong (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Convicted former Enron chief Kenneth Lay was a "dream client" hobbled by a fundamentally flawed approach to his defense, says one lawyer who knows how to defend top executives from criminal charges.

"Ken Lay would have been a dream client," says Donald Watkins, the Alabama lawyer and businessman who last year engineered the acquittal of former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy of charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion accounting fraud.

Months ago, before prosecutors from the Enron Task Force had even finished presenting their case against Lay and his co-defendant Jeff Skilling, Watkins predicted the two men were going down. Last Thursday, a Houston jury found Lay and Skilling guilty on multiple charges.

"There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest," Watkins told USA TODAY for a story published March 7. "In this contest, these guys have lost."

In an interview following the Enron trial, Watkins called Lay's strategy wrong from the start because the former Enron CEO began his defense by hiring a team of big-name trial lawyers. What Lay needed first, Watkins says, was a strategist with a broader view of what was needed to keep such a high-profile defendant out of prison.

"Lawyers are technicians," Watkins says. "They're like painters, plumbers and sheet-rockers."

In the Scrushy case, Watkins' strategy was to attack and harass the government at every turn, while building up Scrushy's stature as a civic and religious leader in Birmingham, Ala.

For an entire year leading up to the HealthSouth trial, Scrushy hosted a religious TV show each morning on a local Birmingham station, bringing in a variety of local ministers to discuss the Bible.

Scrushy's media campaign was so powerful that the U.S. attorney complained to the judge about it. "The government tried to get a gag order against us," Watkins said. "The U.S. government said it could not get a fair trial."

In Lay's case, when it became clear that he was the target of a criminal investigation, he didn't launch a massive public relations campaign. Instead, he adopted the posture that most lawyers recommend: silence. After Enron collapsed into bankruptcy in December 2001, and Lay was forced out of his job a month later, the former CEO clammed up, asserting his Fifth Amendment right to keep silent at a congressional hearing, and circling the wagons with his legal team.

For Lay, whose civic and charitable contributions to the Houston community dwarfed Scrushy's good deeds in Birmingham, the early silence was a blown opportunity, Watkins says.

"The first trial is always in the court of public opinion, and it comes down to community support and good will. If you've been a pillar of the community for decades, you've got to energize that."

Once you've set the overall strategy for fighting the government, Watkins says, then you can prepare for the trial. That's when you hire lawyers, he says.

In Scrushy's case, Watkins wanted two attorneys with different skill sets. He brought a former prosecutor, Art Leach, on board, to serve as the "designated objector" to everything the government tried to do.

Then, just three months before the HealthSouth trial began, Watkins hired Jim Parkman, a country lawyer whose previous clients were much more likely to be those accused of being drunken drivers and petty thieves than prominent businessmen. Watkins says he wanted someone who could “connect” with jurors.

Finally, Watkins says, Lay should not have testified. “You never, ever put the CEO on the witness stand,” Watkins says.

“When you do that, you're leaving it to him to save himself. That telegraphs that everything you have done has failed.”

Enron Case A Grueling Trial For Its Lawyers (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 29, 2006

With No Key Evidence, Skill Was at a Premium

HOUSTON, May 28 -- The unyielding preparation, the sleepless nights spent in a dingy room far from his wife and four children, whom he visited only twice in six months, all came down to this: a few hours of questions in the case of a lifetime.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston strode briskly into the courtroom with his eyes on a man he had pursued with unusual intensity for more than two years, former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay.

The Southern California prosecutor, who has a compact build and a gleam in his eye, squared his shoulders and steeled himself for a fight. In the hour that followed, including a court break in which he maintained his focus by doing push-ups in his office, Hueston, 42, accused Lay of contacting witnesses during the four-month trial in an effort to "get your story straight."

Hueston's chilly persistence left the once-genial corporate chieftain, who had been expected to flash his charm like a get-out-of-jail card, stammering and angry, drawn for the jury in a few quick strokes as a micromanager who thought he could talk his way out of trouble with a handful of well-placed phone calls. Jurors said that "controlling" attitude stuck in their minds as they found Lay guilty of a half-dozen conspiracy and fraud charges Thursday.

A smiling Hueston appeared before camera crews at an outdoor news conference after jurors handed up their resounding decision, saying that Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, who was also found guilty, had sealed their fates with lie after lie. The following day, Hueston flew home to California and took his children go-karting, leaving behind the sign in his temporary Houston office that urged him: "Play like a champion today" -- a University of Notre Dame invocation.

The trial, the capstone of the government's efforts to hold corporate executives accountable for fraud that occurred while they were in charge, required both sides to be at the top of their games. In a case that featured no smoking-gun documents or "gotcha" moments, the skill of the advocates on both sides took on special importance, said experts who followed the trial.

The single-minded pursuit of Lay and Skilling ended in success for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. But the four-year drive was not without conflicts over strategy and personal style for lawyers on both sides of the monumental effort, one of the most complicated corporate cases in history.

The government team stayed on course largely under the guidance of task force director and Chicago prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz, a marathon runner who turned 39 two days after the verdict. Colleagues call Berkowitz unflappable, and he behaved true to form, even when government projection specialists stumbled and failed to find documents quickly as he cross-examined Skilling. Berkowitz parceled out key witnesses to members of his team without considering his own ego.

He was the man who also made peace among squabbling colleagues and delivered the final -- and, according to jurors, the convincing -- rebuttal argument in a smooth baritone, snapping his fingers for emphasis. Paraphrasing a line from the Jack Nicholson character in the film "A Few Good Men," Berkowitz told the jury that Lay and Skilling resorted to falsehoods because "Enron couldn't handle the truth."

Berkowitz, who pokes fun at his bald spot and rides motorcycles in his spare time, overrode the occasional interpersonal conflicts over resources and speaking roles among the team of nine lawyers, 15 agents, five paralegals and six others. He pushed -- despite opposing views -- to strike a plea deal only weeks before the trial with former Enron accounting chief Richard A. Causey. That helped slash more than a half-dozen witnesses from the case and also deprived Skilling and Lay of a scapegoat to blame if things started to go sour.

The government victory was by no means a sure bet. Skilling's lead defender, Daniel M. Petrocelli, an entertainment lawyer from Century City, Calif., appearing in his first criminal trial, outtalked everyone else on his side of the courtroom, including highly touted and far more experienced advocates hired by Lay, according to lawyers who watched the trial. Petrocelli, 52, emerged as a clear leader of Skilling's defense as he marshaled help from more than a dozen junior lawyers, three law partners and a team of paralegals and support staff, including Skilling's wife Rebecca Carter, his younger brother Mark and his longtime assistant Sherri Sera. A separate unit of three document specialists set up an aluminum table bearing laptop computers directly outside the courtroom and often raced in with papers and opposition research to help the lawyers in the middle of the action.

Surprisingly to Houston's legal community and trial watchers who had mostly underestimated him, Petrocelli's command of the facts equaled his theatrical style, as he rattled off arcane measurements of financial risk and accounting rules without glancing at notes. He left the eight-women, four-men jury smiling -- and left a series of government witnesses withering under his strong-armed attack. Juror Doug Baggett said that during much of the case, he felt like a "Ping-Pong ball," as his opinions vacillated back and forth after incisive questions by the defense team.

A man who keeps his salt-and-pepper hair and his fingernails as carefully manicured as some of his movie-star clients', Petrocelli won praise from hard-bitten U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, who is not known for being a fan of defense lawyers. Government witness Ben F. Glisan Jr., Enron's former treasurer, acknowledged Petrocelli's talent even as the defense lawyer sought to rip apart his testimony. Even jurors who ultimately convicted Skilling on 19 of 28 criminal charges against him praised Petrocelli, who walked out of the courthouse looking ashen and shell-shocked after the verdict. Inside the building, however, elementary school principal Freddy Delgado told reporters that if he ever ran afoul of the law, he would hire Petrocelli, "if I had the money." His fellow jurors erupted with laughter.

Petrocelli's law firm, O'Melveny & Myers LLP, received a $23 million retainer from Skilling, but the defense lawyer said the defense spent many millions of dollars more, though he would not say how much. He received crucial support from partner M. Randall Oppenheimer, 53, whose most visible courtroom role involved questioning accountants and technical experts but who performed important strategic work behind the scenes. Oppenheimer, a gray-bearded private pilot and the son of a film director who once visited the trial, combined razor-sharp intellect with a mild-mannered, dignified delivery. His understated manner won him respect from the government team and greater leeway from the judge, who coined "the Oppenheimer rule," which allowed lawyers in the long trial to get in "just one more question" after their opponents' objections.

Perhaps the O'Melveny team's greatest accomplishment was keeping in check the mercurial temper of its client. Skilling, 52, followed his lawyers' advice and generally remained cool over eight days on the witness stand, in the face of expectations that his emotions might detonate and come back to hurt him with the jury.

As they maintained control of Skilling, his defense lawyers also successfully cultivated an important alliance with Lay's team, which resisted the temptation to blame Skilling for Enron's misfortunes. That O'Melveny picked up the tab for experts and other pricey legal bills likely helped preserve goodwill between the defense teams. But it also took no small amount of Petrocelli's persuasion.

If Skilling's legal team rose above expectations, Lay's failed to live up to them. Lead lawyer Michael W. Ramsey, 66, armed with a string of victories in murder and public-corruption cases in his four-decade career, sat on the bench for nearly the entire defense case after doctors implanted stents to open his clogged arteries. But Ramsey, who received $2 million from Lay, had run into trouble even before his health deteriorated.

In his opening statement Jan. 31, Ramsey twice called on securities lawyer and fellow Lay defense lawyer Bruce Collins to confirm facts in the case. The judge took Ramsey to task for asking the government's first witness irrelevant questions, prompting Lay to pull him aside during a courtroom break. And in his cross-examination of former chief financial officer Andrew S. Fastow, Ramsey shouted when Fastow, who has a hearing problem, said he could not understand the lawyer's inquiries. Jurors and spectators flinched at the spectacle. Ramsey later told reporters that he was worried he had had a heart attack during the Fastow episode.

With Ramsey out of the game, the Lay defense was in chaos and eventually settled on appellate lawyer George "Mac" Secrest to lead the questioning of Lay. That decision was made only a few days before Lay's turn on the witness stand, the most important turning point in the trial. Lay, who kept firm control of his legal team, balked when Secrest asked him to talk about his personal finances and other issues, once asking his own lawyer, "Where are we going with this, Mr. Secrest?"

After news reports criticized the performance, Lay's daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, a lawyer who sat next to him every day and helped coordinate his defense, told reporters Secrest had done a "fabulous" job. Vittor did not question any witnesses in the trial and instead appeared to serve as a behind-the-scenes advocate for her father, who had amassed $100 million in debt in 2001, the year Enron filed for bankruptcy, and who spent less on his legal defense than Skilling.

It remains unclear whether Ramsey's presence would have helped Lay. During cross-examination, prosecutors used some of Ramsey's negative comments from earlier in the trial about government witnesses against Lay. And there is little doubt that Lay's strong emotions about Hueston, whom he has accused of leading a vendetta against him, would have boiled over when the two men faced off anyway. During closing arguments, Chip B. Lewis, a young, goateed defense lawyer for Lay who could fill a doorway with his solid frame, stood over Hueston and bellowed, "Don't come to Houston, Texas, and lie to us."

In the end, in a contest of will between prosecutors and defendants Skilling and Lay, the jury found the government more believable.

As Berkowitz confronted Skilling with evidence that one of his investments violated Enron's ethics code, Skilling shot back: "What does this have to do with fraud at Enron?"

The prosecutor was ready with a potent answer: "When we started this testimony, we agreed, that the one thing, the most important thing the jury had to rely upon here was your word."

Enron Verdicts Good For Investors (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, May 30, 2006

NEW YORK — The bedrock of free markets — trust, confidence, integrity — that was undermined by the fraud that led to Enron's 2001 collapse, took another step toward rehabilitation with the conviction of the energy company's two former CEOs, Wall Street experts say.

To be sure, last week's guilty verdicts against disgraced Enron executives Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling in Houston do not rule out the possibility of future corporate fraud cases, or erase the financial and emotional pain of shareholders and employees hurt by the scandal.

But the convictions did mark a symbolic end to an era of corporate malfeasance that flourished in the aftermath of the 1990s stock market bubble and resulted in many regulatory reforms, such as the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act. More important, it sent a key message to investors: Corporate crooks will pay for their crimes.

The verdicts will "add to investor confidence," says Gary Gensler, former undersecretary of the Treasury who was a senior adviser to Maryland Sen. Paul Sarbanes during drafting of the law. "Too often, investors have reason to believe the market is not fair. Fortunately, this one went the right way."

Many Wall Street watchers say that had Lay and Skilling been acquitted, it would have resulted in huge damage to investors' psyches and reinforced the belief that the system is rigged against the little guy.

"Had it been not guilty, oh, boy, I don't think it would have gone over well," says Henry Herrmann, chief investment officer at Waddell & Reed. "There would have been a public outcry. The markets would probably have gotten beaten up for a day or two."

Instead, the verdict coincided with a nice two-day rally on Wall Street, which helped halt a skid that began May 10 and knocked stock prices down across the board. The Dow Jones industrials gained a combined 161 points Thursday and Friday, finishing up 1.2% for the week at 11,279.

"The markets were relieved that these two powerful, wealthy corporate leaders wouldn't be able to walk away from such a big scandal," says Michael Chasnoff, CEO of wealth management firm Truepoint Capital. "There was a little bit of relief to know that there is accountability in the financial markets system."

But Chasnoff adds that the psychological boost to the market will be short-lived, as investors refocus their attention on corporate earnings, interest rates and inflation.

Short-Lived Lessons From An Enron Short (WSJ)

By Jim Chanos

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

The convictions of Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling are less than a week old, and yet conclusions are already being drawn about whether "corporate wrongdoing" is a thing of the past. As someone with more than a passing interest in the Enron story -- I was, to quote Ken Lay's bizarre testimony, one of the "short-sellers that were organized and working together and conspiring together" against Enron -- I feel a need to examine what lessons those of us who slog it out daily in the corporate trenches might gain from Enron's spectacular collapse. I propose to offer the top 10 lessons from Enron that executives, investors and lawyers will soon forget:

1. The Enron scandal shows a need for a standards-based accounting system, rather than a rules-based one.

Wait a minute, you must be saying -- in the wake of Enron, don't we need more accounting rules to cover every possible situation, not some mushy "standards"-based guidelines?

No. It is precisely our "check-the-box" accounting rules that get written for every type of transaction that helped create the financial monster that was Enron. By having armies of clever bankers and lawyers pretzel-twist uneconomic deals into profit sources that conformed to GAAP ("Generally Accepted Accounting Principles," or "Good As Actual Profits" as it's sometimes known), dishonest management teams always hide behind the disclaimer that their accounting has been blessed by their auditors. The problem is, I can think of no major financial fraud in the 25 years I've been on Wall Street that did not have audited financials that conformed to GAAP! Yet reasonable independent auditors and audit committees, using the "standard" of economic common sense, would have unmasked most of the financial chicanery that became apparent at these companies only after their collapse.

2. Mark-to-Market accounting was not the problem at Enron, Mark-to-Model was.

Many casual observers of the Enron saga have pointed to the shortcomings of the Mark-to-Market (MTM) method of accounting that Enron used for its trading assets (i.e., the act of recording the price or value of a security, portfolio or account to reflect its current market value rather than its book value). But MTM is entirely appropriate -- and necessary -- for trading assets held at financial firms. How else would one handle valuation for assets that trade on verifiable exchanges and/or electronic networks?

In Enron's case, however, non-exchange traded assets and illiquid private deals were treated similarly, with today's "prices" derived by computer models that estimated future prices and volatility. The "estimates" in these models were helpfully provided by . . . Enron itself! As any capable financial economist will point out, today's market prices offer only a starting point for estimating future prices and volatility, which are, by definition, unknowable. In an MTM system with no independent source of current prices, when one feeds the "unknowables" of future prices and volatility, and the "probable" of time, into a computer, a "certain" current price is calculated! Neat, huh?

3. Off-balance-sheet deals and entities are "off" the balance sheet for a reason.

One would think that this concept would be pretty obvious, given the LJM, Jedi, Chewco, Deathstar, Jabba the Hut (OK, I made that last one up) monikers used to describe off-balance-sheet entities at Enron. One would be wrong. Yet it is my experience, pre- and post-Enron, that such accounting is used by companies to hide things they don't want investors to see. Pre-Enron saw silliness such as the Coca-Cola/Coca-Cola Enterprises "two-step," while today one can ponder the off-balance-sheet "land banking" that exists at the publicly traded U.S. homebuilders. If a company is determined to keep a significant aspect of its business off its books, investors should simply ask why.

4. Wall Street analysts don't "do" complex.

Isn't that what securities analysts are for, you might ask? Silly reader . . . analysis is for kids! Literally. At most large Wall Street firms, the tedious job of constructing financial models and answering client accounting queries is handled by the junior analyst on the team. It still shocks me today that when meeting with a team of "sell-side" Wall Street analysts from a firm to discuss a particular company, the senior analyst invariably concedes the answer to a complex financial question to a junior analyst working for him.

In a post-Eliot Spitzer world, how can this be? Simple. Senior analysts still spend most of their time on the road making client presentations. That is, of course, if they aren't playing golf with the CEO or organizing the menu at the next investor conference in Las Vegas. The recent attempts by certain companies to discourage hard-hitting independent research will only serve to maintain the chasm between those that "do the numbers" and those with, hopefully, the experience to know what the numbers mean.

5. The rating agency system breaks down when most needed. Rely on it at your own peril.

Time and again, when confronted with negative financial "surprises" by corporate issuers during the last decade, the "independent" ratings agencies fell down on the job. This kept slow-on-the-uptake investors dancing on the decks of numerous financial Titanics, while those heeding other signals (such as the burgeoning market for credit-default derivatives) prepared to man the lifeboats.

Whether it was the hubris of not wanting to precipitate a run on the bank (as if it wasn't happening already!), or the incompetence of one ratings agency analyst admitting to not having read the company's SEC filings, the shortcomings of an analyst-based ratings agency system became apparent in the Enron fiasco. Market-based price-discovery agents, such as short sellers in the equity market and purchasers of credit-default insurance in the bond/derivative markets, supplanted the Big Three ratings agencies as accurate predictors of Enron's financial distress.

6. Beware of, and question, unexpected executive resignations.

This lesson should seem obvious, but cognitive dissonance assures that it isn't. When Jeff Skilling resigned abruptly after six months as Enron's CEO, alarm bells should have been going off on Wall Street, as they were in Houston. But mindful of the still-bountiful fees Enron promised the Street, virtually every analyst covering Enron told his/her clients "all was well"! Didn't anyone find it disconcerting that despite claiming (the still undisclosed) "personal reasons" for his resignation, Mr. Skilling admitted on the front page of this newspaper the next day that if Enron's stock price had stayed up, "I don't think that I would have felt the pressure to leave"?

By asking the right questions, investors in August 2001 (with Enron's stock still at $40) might have been able to deduce that Enron's stock was not just a barometer of its financial health, but was also an actual component (through the investor-guarantee mechanism in the Fastow partnerships) of its health, as this newspaper's reporters would so convincingly point out two months later. Mr. Skilling hid the road map to Enron's future collapse on the front page of The Wall Street Journal, but few noticed.

7. Whistleblowers aren't whistleblowers if they blow their whistles inside the company walls.

Someone should inform Time magazine's Person-of-the-Year Department that writing a "cover-your-behind" memo to your boss about financial irregularities within the firm is not "whistleblowing." Having the guts to risk your job and reputation, by bringing evidence of those irregularities to the proper financial authorities, is. Enough said.

DOJ_NMG_0030318

8. Special investigations by corporate boards are almost always a waste of time/money, and often prove highly misleading.

As a corollary to Lesson No. 7, when questions are raised internally about possible financial improprieties, corporate boards often hire counsel to conduct investigations on their behalf. This is done foremost for their own protection ("We investigated once we knew!"), and only incidentally to uncover unpleasant facts that such boards, charged with oversight as a duty, should've known about already. Many boards, in a wonderful example of willful blindness, simply don't want to know. In fact, one well-regarded Washington law firm forensic accounting SWAT team, headed by a former SEC enforcement director, managed to not find much wrong at either Enron or Tyco, despite abundant internal documents at their disposal. Such incompetence is highly rewarded in future corporate assignments. Rely on these reports at your own risk.

9. Character cannot be compartmentalized.

This lesson may be the most important of all. Investors and outside advisors often seem preoccupied with analyzing the formal propriety of specific corporate transactions, and the associated financial accounting. Questionable deals and disclosures are analyzed discretely, and not as part of any disturbing pattern of dubious corporate policies. Yet one had only to read the history of Ken Lay's involvement in the Valhalla energy-trading scandal at Enron in 1987 to detect a harbinger of scandals yet to come. That bad guys have a pattern of dishonest behavior should seem obvious, but it's not.

And, finally, 10: Friends do not let (possibly guilty) friends take the stand in criminal trials.

Let's face it, the Enron trials of Lay and Skilling had it all; greed, arrogance, an incompetent defense strategy (oh, how I wish short sellers had the power that Enron's defense team claimed we have!) and, of course, larger-than-life corporate villains. One would assume the high profile nature of the trial itself might underscore this observer's list of lessons learned from Enron's spectacular collapse. But thankfully, I'm pretty confident that they will be forgotten soon.

Mexico's TV Azteca Owner Seeks To Settle SEC Suit (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Ricardo Salinas Pliego, the billionaire Mexican businessman who for more than a year has parried U.S. Security and Exchange Commission efforts to bring him to court, is seeking to settle what was the first lawsuit brought against an executive of a foreign company under the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law.

Mr. Salinas Pliego and his co-defendant in the case, Pedro Padilla, have presented a proposed settlement with the SEC, according to a statement last night by Mr. Salinas Pliego's flagship television company, TV Azteca SA, of Mexico. The proposed settlement came after discussions with the SEC, which TV Azteca expects will respond to the overture within 90 days, the statement said. Under it, Messrs. Salinas Pliego and Padilla would pay all fines personally, precluding a financial burden to TV Azteca.

SEC officials couldn't be reached to comment. A TV Azteca spokesman declined to disclose details, such as the terms of the settlement.

The SEC filed civil suit against Mr. Salinas Pliego early last year, accusing him and Mr. Padilla of fraud by hiding their role in a debt transaction that netted Mr. Salinas Pliego $109 million at the expense of shareholders in a cellphone company Mr. Salinas Pliego controls. The two have denied doing anything improper. The SEC got involved because Mr. Salinas Pliego's television company, a major stockholder in the cellphone company, traded on the New York Stock Exchange at the time.

At stake for the SEC in the case is its ability to reach across international borders to enforce its rules. Since the lawsuit, Mr. Salinas Pliego has delisted the shares of all of his companies from U.S. exchanges, and swapped dollar debts into pesos, in order to remove himself from SEC jurisdiction. International treaties, and the chaotic bureaucracy of Mexican courts, frustrated many SEC attempts to serve Mr. Salinas Pliego with a summons in the case, which had stagnated.

Mr. Salinas Pliego has much at stake. Like many Mexican businessmen, he is seeking to expand his business into the U.S. and tap the spending power of the increasing U.S. Hispanic middle class. TV Azteca has television stations in 46 major U.S. Hispanic markets -- including Houston, New York, Miami, and has a plan to double its market share to 10% in 18 months. The SEC case puts a wrench in the works. The lawsuit prevented Mr. Salinas Pliego from traveling to the U.S., because he was concerned that he could be forced into court by U.S. Marshals.

The proposed settlement is a turnaround for Mr. Salinas Pliego, who had vowed never to reach a deal with the SEC on the grounds that the U.S. had no jurisdiction over a Mexican. Mr. Salinas Pliego, whose personal fortune is estimated at around $1 billion, controls banks, retail shops and cellphone companies that serve the working class, an often overlooked market. His business practices have earned him a tough reputation. In 2002, he sent armed commandos to occupy a rival television station during a contract dispute.

CRIMINAL LAW:

How The Jefferson Search Put Bush In A Bind (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff, Holly Bailey And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, May 29, 2006

President George W. Bush's intervention in the dispute between Congress and the Justice Department over the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's office infuriated many senior law-enforcement officials. Bush's directive to temporarily remove the documents from FBI custody was an implicit rebuke not just of FBI Director Robert Mueller but of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales—both of whom signed off on the search of Jefferson's office before it took place. "What is he [Bush] saying? His own Justice Department was wrong?" said one senior law-enforcement official who, like other senior officials NEWSWEEK spoke to, asked not to be identified because of the political sensitivity of the case. "People are livid about this." FBI officials say the search was undertaken only after the Louisiana Democrat failed to turn over records subpoenaed by a federal grand jury nine months ago. The bureau was seeking material relating to an African business deal Jefferson allegedly helped promote in exchange for bribes—including $90,000 apparently stuffed in his freezer. Once it became clear Jefferson would not comply—reportedly on Fifth Amendment grounds—federal prosecutors got the green light from Gonzales to seek a search warrant. A lawyer for Jefferson called the search "outrageous" and said his client "has consistently maintained his innocence."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert erupted in fury over the search, demanding that the FBI return the material. "I've never seen Denny Hastert as mad," said a senior Bush aide, declining to be named. Hastert twice complained directly to Bush that the FBI search of a congressman's office was unprecedented and an unconstitutional violation of the separation of powers. When Dick Cheney chief of staff David Addington backed Hastert, tempers flared. DOJ officials floated the idea that Gonzales and Mueller might even resign over the issue. That put Bush in a bind—either to back up his old friend Gonzales or placate a speaker the White House badly needs on immigration reform and other matters. To cool passions, Bush ordered the seized materials transferred to the office of Solicitor General Paul Clement. "The White House was looking to give Hastert some cover," said one administration official, requesting anonymity. The official said Hastert's position was "out of sync" with a public increasingly fed up with corruption. In talking points distributed to GOP House members last week, Hastert and other House leaders conceded the perils of their position. "Is this a smart battle for Congress to fight?" the talking points asked. "Perhaps not. Defending Constitutional principles—particularly those related to institutional balances of power—is often not politically expedient and often results in bad publicity."

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, May 28, 2006

The battle between the FBI and Congress over documents seized in a raid on the office of Congressman William Jefferson, a Democrat from New Orleans, turned Washington upside down last week. The FBI, which has long been investigating allegations that Jefferson accepted money in exchange for helping businessmen secure deals in Africa, says it had already found $90,000 wrapped in foil in the freezer of Jefferson's apartment and had a videotape of him allegedly accepting $100,000 in bribe money. But when federal agents, who had been trying to get documents from Jefferson for nine months, obtained a warrant and searched his Capitol Hill office, they found an unlikely adversary: House Speaker Dennis Hastert. The Illinois Republican argued that the search violated the separation of powers between the Legislative and Executive branches and demanded that the FBI return the seized documents.

Hastert grew even angrier when ABC News, quoting unnamed federal law-enforcement officials, reported that Hastert was being investigated in another corruption case, involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The Justice Department denied the story, but Hastert, suspicious of the report's timing, accused the FBI of trying to "intimidate" him.

As Hastert led congressional appeals to the White House, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller made clear that they would not comply with any presidential order to return the seized materials--and were willing to risk being fired for their defiance, says a law-enforcement source. So the President instead ordered the FBI to hand over the documents to the Solicitor General's office, which is not involved in the probe. The documents will be sealed for 45 days while Congress and the Administration seek agreement on what prosecutors may view.

Bush's order didn't totally calm a jittery Capitol Hill. Two other corruption investigations by the Justice Department could implicate members of Congress: the Abramoff case and a probe of defense contractors' ties to several lawmakers. The FBI says it's just doing its job. "We go where the evidence takes us," says a senior official. "Why should a Congressman be off limits?"

U.S. News and World Report, May 29, 2006

In case you haven't heard, Washington's been hit by a Category 5 constitutional crisis. No, it's not over domestic eavesdropping or those secret CIA prisons. This one's so big, it's got Democrats embracing Republicans like long-lost cousins and both parties pillorying the White House for--hold on to your hats--infringing on the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches. Heavy stuff. A bit of history: Way back in 1642, King Charles I launched his considerable person upon the House of Commons with the foul purpose of arresting five of its members. Thereupon followed, in right short order, the English Civil War. So impressed by these facts were the framers of our own Constitution (never mind their aggravation over the infernal meddling of George III's colonial governors), they enshrined the separation-of-powers doctrine prominently in the hallowed document.

Well. The instant cause for last week's constitutional kerfuffle was a tad more pedestrian, having to do with a congressman who found a novel use for some Tupperware and several Glad freezer bags. Turns out the things are just dandy for hiding stacks of $100 bills in the deep freeze. Who knew? FBI agents discovered the greenbacks, $90,000 worth, in the icebox of a Louisiana lawmaker named William Jefferson. The constitutional issue arose when the FBI decided to take a peek and see what other things of interest might be lurking in Jefferson's congressional office. That's when, as the saying goes, all hell broke loose.

Folks who should know say the whole constitutional thing is overblown, if not arrant nonsense, but that didn't stop President Bush from entering the fray, ordering the papers taken from Jefferson's office stashed in a neutral safe for 45 days so everyone could cool off. It was that kind of week in Washington, crazy. The president, appearing with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, even admitted to having made a passel of mistakes in Iraq. Not to be outdone, Blair fessed up to some of his own pratfalls there. Neither man, though, said a single thing about Charles I.

Frist Breaks With Others In G.O.P. Over Raid (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 28 — Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, on Sunday defended the raid by federal agents on a Democratic lawmaker's Capitol Hill office, breaking with senior House Republicans who had said the search was unconstitutional.

Mr. Frist, Republican of Tennessee, said agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation had acted appropriately when they searched the office of the lawmaker, Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, as part of a bribery investigation.

The House speaker, Dennis J. Hastert, Republican of Illinois, criticized the raid last week and demanded that the F.B.I. immediately return the materials from Mr. Jefferson's office. Mr. Hastert even issued a rare joint statement with Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, saying that F.B.I. officials had not notified them before the raid and that the search violated the constitutional principle of the separation of powers.

Mr. Frist disagreed, shifting his position from last week when he had expressed concern about the search.

"No, I don't think it abused separation of powers," said Mr. Frist, who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008, during a "Fox News Sunday" appearance. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

Mr. Frist said that "nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," and that federal agents had gone through appropriate procedures to obtain a search warrant for Mr. Jefferson's office.

During the raid on May 20, F.B.I. agents carried away computer records and files as part of the bureau's inquiry into whether Mr. Jefferson accepted bribes in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa.

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert, on Sunday reiterated the House speaker's opposition to the raid.

"Clearly there is a difference between what the Congressional leadership think and what Senator Frist thinks about what is and is not constitutional," Mr. Bonjean said.

After lawmakers angrily denounced the raid last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III; and other senior law enforcement officials told associates that they were prepared to resign if the White House ordered them to turn over the seized evidence.

Instead, President Bush ordered that all the records taken from Mr. Jefferson's office be sealed for 45 days — an effort to ease tensions over what had been developing into a constitutional crisis.

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate, said Sunday that the raid was the first time that the F.B.I. had searched a Congressional office. He said, however, that federal agents in the past had searched a judge's chambers.

"So it appears that there's been some precedent for this," said Mr. Durbin, who also appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Both Mr. Frist and Mr. Durbin said the Senate should begin examining the exact authorities the executive branch has to carry out such searches, to reduce the chances of another constitutional dispute. And Mr. Bonjean said House leaders were working with the Justice Department to determine proper procedures for any future searches.

Some House Republicans have not backed off their opposition to the F.B.I. raid. Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., a Wisconsin Republican who is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said Sunday that Congress must be able to do its job "free of coercion from the executive branch."

"I don't think that it would be right for a House committee to issue a subpoena to the president's office and send the Capitol Police rummaging through files, taking everything, and then deciding what wasn't relevant by themselves and returning it to the president," Mr. Sensenbrenner said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press."

Mr. Sensenbrenner's committee plans to hold a hearing this week about the constitutionality of the F.B.I. search.

Frist Backs Search Of Congressman's Office (AP-Y2)

In a break with his counterparts in the House, the Senate's leader said Sunday the FBI was within its right to search the office of a congressman under investigation in a bribery case.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said.

Frist, R-Tenn., was responding to the search conducted May 20-21 in the office of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record), D-La. FBI agents carted away computer and other records in their pursuit of evidence that Jefferson accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa.

It was the first time that a warrant had been used to search a lawmaker's office in the history of the Congress.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded with a rare joint statement, protesting that the FBI had not notified them and that the search violated the Constitution's separation of power protections.

Frist said he examined the provision closely and talked the issue over with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Frist said on "Fox News Sunday.

"I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, which plans a hearing Tuesday on the constitutionality of the search, said the FBI overstepped its authority. Rep. James Sensenbrenner compared the search of a congressman's office to a Capitol Police raid of the Oval Office.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Sensenbrenner said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "He cannot use the constitutional immunity of Congress to shield himself from that or any evidence of that. But it is about the ability of the Congress to be able to do its job free of coercion from the executive branch."

Hastert complained directly to President Bush and demanded that the FBI return the materials. Bush struck a compromise Thursday, ordering that the documents be sealed for 45 days until congressional leaders and the Justice Department agree on what to do with them — a move that Frist said he supported "to let things settle down."

Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, said there needs to be "hard look" at whether the FBI violated the Constitution. But he said the FBI has raided judge's chambers before, so there is precedent for crossing branches of government for searches.

He also said he wasn't sure the "speech and debate" protections in Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution were violated, as some of have argued.

That section states that members of Congress "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

"I'm not sure that you can stretch it to apply to this situation," Durbin said. "In the next several weeks, we ought to take a hard look at it. I'm not going to rule it in or out at this moment."

Before Bush's compromise, the showdown last week led the House leaders to threaten budgetary retaliation against the Justice Department, a senior administration official told The Associated Press on Saturday. Justice officials, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, raised the prospect of resigning if the department were asked to return documents that FBI agents took from Jefferson's office.

Frist Defends Raid On Hill Office (WT)

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday broke with the two top House leaders, asserting that the FBI was within its right to search the office of a congressman under investigation in a bribery case.

"No House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," the Tennessee Republican said. "I think there's allegations of criminal activity, and the American people need to have the law enforced."

In the overnight hours last weekend, FBI agents seized computer records and other documents from the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat. It was the first time in U.S. history that an elected federal official's Capitol Hill office was subject to a warrant.

The FBI filed documents last week asserting that Mr. Jefferson was videotaped accepting money in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa. In a search of the congressman's home, agents found $90,000 in his freezer.

House SpeakerJ. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, a Republican, and Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California responded with a rare joint statement, protesting that the FBI had not notified them and that the search violated the Constitution's separation of power protections.

Mr. Frist said he examined the provision closely and talked the issue over with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He concluded that the FBI acted appropriately.

"I don't think it abused separation of powers," Mr. Frist said on "Fox News Sunday."

But the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, which plans a hearing tomorrow on the constitutionality of the search, said yesterday the FBI overstepped its authority. Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. compared the search of a congressman's office to a Capitol Police raid of the Oval Office.

"This debate is not over whether Congressman Jefferson is guilty of a criminal offense," Mr. Sensenbrenner, Wisconsin Republican, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Raiding Capitol Hill (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2006

With the separation of powers, the Founders created a system with inevitable tension between Congress and the executive. Congress has been the biggest offender in stealing power from the executive in the modern era, but the May 20 FBI raid on the legislative office of William Jefferson (D., La.) seems a case in which the Justice Department has gone overboard, and even been insubordinate.

Both Republican and Democratic leaders in the House have protested, prompting media clucking that Members aren't "above the law." Having spent years trying to get Congress to live by the laws it imposes on the rest of us, we couldn't agree more. However, Congress is uniquely protected in one vital sense -- in its act of legislating, under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution. In the most obvious case, this protects Members as they consider legislation on the House or Senate floor. This also arguably includes papers and other material in Member offices that are related to legislating.

In the case of Mr. Jefferson, Justice clearly had reason to consider a search. The Congressman is suspected of taking bribes, individuals have already pleaded guilty to paying him and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, and a search of his home found $90,000 in his freezer. Mr. Jefferson says he has done nothing wrong, but we doubt he has found the miracle of an icebox that pays interest on deposits.

Yet with all of this evidence in hand, the question is why prosecutors also felt the need to raid Mr. Jefferson's office in the middle of the night -- the first such raid in the history of Congress. They surely knew the raid would prompt embarrassing headlines, and for ambitious prosecutors that motive can never be ruled out. With Congress currently low in opinion polls, Justice officials may also have felt they could indulge in this kind of intimidation. If they really believe Mr. Jefferson is running a criminal enterprise out of his Capitol Hill office, they could always negotiate the parameters of such a search with House leaders.

Justice also hasn't helped its case with its bullying behavior after Speaker Denny Hastert denounced the raid. Someone leaked to ABC News that Mr. Hastert was himself a target of a Justice probe, and while it was quickly and officially denied, this kind of media ambush is typical of prosecutorial payback.

Someone also leaked that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Deputy AG Paul McNulty had threatened to resign if President Bush returned material confiscated in the raid. So here we have someone at Justice trying to intimidate not just the House Speaker but also President Bush. If we were Mr. Bush, we'd have accepted both resignations on those grounds alone.

One of the sillier criticisms is that Mr. Bush is out of line for having intervened in this dispute. He has decided to seal the confiscated materials for 45 days while Justice works out a compromise with House officials. Federal prosecutors work for the President, and if there is ever a case where the White House should intervene it is one that involves a Constitutional clash between the branches. It's revealing that the same media voices that want Congress to limit the President's war powers also want to limit his ability in this case to control federal prosecutors. They seem to want a feeble Presidency.

Another, and related, bad argument is that the FBI raid was kosher because it was approved by a judge. But judicial warrants can never trump core Constitutional powers -- whether they are the rights of Congress under the Speech and Debate Clause, or the executive's ability to conduct warrantless wiretaps against al Qaeda under Presidential war powers. This willingness of modern liberalism to confer vast new authority on the judiciary is itself a violation of the separation of powers. The Founders designed a system in which each branch had to defend its own prerogatives, not one in which some local or district court judge was the final arbiter in such disputes. Congress and the President are ultimately accountable to the voters, while judges are not.

Mr. Bush's sensible decision to seal the Jefferson evidence has had the useful effect of calming this dispute down. If it turns out that Justice has to prosecute its case without evidence obtained from Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office, so be it. Prosecutors have to work around such limitations all the time. Congress's right to legislate without being intimidated by the executive is a core element of the Constitution, and bullying prosecutors shouldn't be allowed to violate it.

Jefferson's Alleged Misdeeds May Strand Louisiana Yet Again (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, May 30, 2006

Days before the official start of this year's hurricane season, an ill wind hit New Orleans. Not another massive storm like the one that devastated the Big Easy nine months ago. This one was no act of Mother Nature. It was man-made.

And the man who made it, federal investigators contend, is Rep. William Jefferson, the Democratic congressman whose New Orleans district was the epicenter of the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina last year.

Jefferson, Louisiana's most prominent black politician, is the target of a federal criminal investigation. Though he has yet to be charged with a crime, the FBI said in an affidavit used to get a warrant to search his office that the eight-term congressman engaged in widespread criminal conduct. The 83-page document accuses Jefferson, among other things, of fraud and attempting to bribe a foreign official.

The G-men claim to have secretly tape recorded and videotaped some of Jefferson's alleged bad acts.

As a member of the House of Representatives' powerful Ways and Means Committee, Jefferson is well positioned to help the mostly black residents of his congressional district, many of whom have been forced out of their homes — and out of New Orleans — by Katrina's floodwaters. But if the FBI's accusations are true, Jefferson spent a lot of time before and after the hurricane struck New Orleans trying to feather his own nest.

The FBI's account

In the affidavit, the FBI recounts how Jefferson was recorded negotiating an increased share of the expected profits of a company he was helping to establish in Nigeria and Ghana.

While scribbling several figures on a piece of paper during a dinner meeting on May 12, 2005, with the woman who controlled the firm, whom the FBI identified only as a "cooperating witness," Jefferson allegedly revealed his criminal intent.

DOJ_NMG_0030324

"I make a deal for my children. It wouldn't be me," Jefferson said as he pushed the woman to give a larger share of her Nigerian business venture to Global Energy & Environmental Services, LLC, a firm owned by his children and run by a son-in-law.

All of this convinced a federal judge to give the FBI a warrant to search Jefferson's Capitol Hill office, an extraordinary action that has enraged both congressional Democrats and Republicans. The search, they say, tramples upon the separation of powers doctrine.

Last week, President Bush ordered the Justice Department to seal the documents seized from Jefferson's office for 45 days to give federal lawyers and lawmakers a chance to avoid a constitutional crisis.

Silence, for now

Jefferson has refused to discuss the facts surrounding his case. "There will be an appropriate time and forum when that can be explained and explicated," he said last week at a news conference.

But that's not good enough.

Jefferson is accused of using his elected office for criminal purposes. The FBI said they have videotape of him accepting a $100,000 bribe last July. They said they later found $90,000 of that money hidden in the freezer of his Washington apartment.

Then in September, five days after Katrina hit, Jefferson had the Louisiana National Guard take him through the flooded streets of New Orleans so he could recover some items from his home, which the FBI had searched earlier. Whether this had anything to do with his criminal investigation is unclear.
